

✓ 109022

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE,
DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

==
109022

VOLUME 165

JULY 5, 1947, to DECEMBER 27, 1947

==

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, INC.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7

INDEX TO VOLUME 165

JULY 1, 1947, to DECEMBER 30, 1947

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

- A Art
- Arc Architecture
- C Correspondence
- CH Chart
- Cartoon
- D Drama
- E Editorial Article
- EP Editorial Paragraph
- M Music
- MP Moving Pictures
- S Poetry
- S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages	Pages
1-28 July 5	325-366 October 4
29-56 July 12	367-396 October 11
57-84 July 19	397-430 October 18
85-112 July 26	431-458 October 25
113-132 August 2	459-486 November 1
133-152 August 9	487-514 November 8
153-172 August 16	515-542 November 15
173-192 August 23	543-570 November 22
193-212 August 30	571-606 November 29
213-240 September 6	607-634 December 6
241-268 September 13	635-662 December 13
269-296 September 20	663-690 December 20
297-324 September 27	691-710 December 27

A

PAGE

A. D. A. See Americans for democratic action
A. F. of L. See Labor—American federation of labor
A.V.C. See American veterans' committee
Abbas, M. Baradei
Letter on Teller article on Palestine...689;
see also S	364
Abrams, Charles
Race bias in housing:
1. Great hypocrisy, the; S.....67;	110
EP.....58; C.....122
2. Will interracial housing work? S.....120
3. Our chance for democratic housing; S.....122
Africa; king of Bekom and his collection of wives; EP.....665
Agee, James
On inquiry into "communist" Hollywood writers; Catholic Veterans and Chaplin; S.....706
Reviews of motion pictures:
Black narcissus.....209
Brute force.....264
Copacabana.....209
Crossfire.....129
Devil's envoys, the.....264
Down to earth.....209
Frieda.....320
Great dawn, the.....129
Great expectations.....79
Hucksters, the.....129
I know where I'm going.....264
Try.....172
Kiss of death.....264
L'Atalante.....51
Life with father.....209
Long night, the.....209
Macomber affair.....209
Miracle on 34th Street.....209
Moss rose.....172
New Orleans.....129
Old man out.....129
Perils of Pauline.....129
Red house, the.....209
Roosevelt story, the.....264
Secret life of Walter Mitty, the.....209
Shoeshine.....264
Swinging the muses.....320
Tawny pipit, the.....209
Thunderbolts.....209
To live in peace.....655
Torment.....209
Unfaithful, the.....209
Woman on the beach, the.....209
Zéro de conduite.....23, 51
Agencies, government. See names of agencies; United States
Agriculture; gambling in grain prices. K. Hutchison; S.....338
See also Food
Aid for convicts. D. Dellinger; A. Hassler; G. Houser; B. Rustin; W. Sutherland; C.....541
Aid for Europe. See Europe—Aid for; Europe—Marshall Plan
Alabama; "white primary" law contains an educational qualification. R. Bendiner; S.....330
Alaska
Arms again. R. L. Neuberger; S.....91
Fire guts valuable timber on Kenai peninsula; EP.....115

Fish and politics. R. L. Neuberger; S.....199;
C. 351; C. 352; C. 456; C.....486
Mediakatla: tribal town. R. L. Neuberger; S.....66
Native minority fighting discrimination. R. L. Neuberger; S.....254
Aliens; case of Dr. E. Vera, the; C.....266
"All my sons"; army bans showing of play in Germany, Austria, and Japan; EP.....176
Allegro, J. W. Krutch; D.....567
Allegro, B. H. Haggin; S.....512
Altgeld, John Peter, centenary; EP.....691
Altman, Jack
Communists right sometimes; C.....514; see also 204; C.....238; C.....428
Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
Antwerp conference on socialism; S.....650
Democracy east and west; S.....446
Dilemma of the left; S.....101
Divided French socialists, the; S.....204; C.....428
East-west conference, needed; C.....585
Fascist phoenix, the; S.....17
France three years after liberation; S.....259
Germany—a self-portrait; S.....185
Marshall plan. Haggin; S.....31; S.....230
Prosperity is indivisible; S.....380; 331; EP.....395
Versus eastern socialism; S.....380
Versus western socialism; S.....339; 456
Why Molotov went home; S.....145
Reaction, inter-American; S.....504
Revival, economic, in Great Britain; S.....703
Russia most conciliatory in the United Nations; S.....557
Spain; number 18 on the K. L. agenda; S.....410
Strength of the French left; S.....314
Vamberg of Hungary; S.....476
Vatican and democracy, the; S.....45
Victory on Spain, in the United Nations assembly; S.....573
Will De Gaulle come back? S.....286
America. See United States
American federation of labor. See Labor
American legion
Annual convention; EP.....214
Blocks efforts of the A.V.C. in Tampa, Florida, to obtain county-owned land for headquarters; EP.....369
American veterans' committee
American legion in Tampa, Florida, blocks efforts of A.V.C. to obtain county-owned land for headquarters; EP.....369
Milwaukee convention, the. D. James; S.....14; C.....238
Americans for democratic action, and the Marshall plan. J. Loeb, Jr.; C.....456; see.....339
Anderson, Clinton P.
Favored by Truman as chairman of Democratic national committee; EP.....175
Plan for increase in food production. H. H. Collins, Jr.; S.....669; correction.....692
Anderson, Ewing
Courtesy or truth in the American press? C.....266
Of food and crops; C.....541
Antony and Cleopatra; W. Krutch; D.....654
Antwerp conference. See Socialism
Arab league
Could the Arabs stage an armed revolt against the United Nations? EP.....372
Mutti, the, and his opponents. J. L. Teller; S.....364
Relations with King Farouk of Egypt. M. Ferro; S.....362
Arab. See Arab league; Palestine
Argentina
And the Inter-American defense conference. R. Bendiner; S.....177
Hires E. S. Fenton to "sell" Perón government to Americans; EP.....154
Perón opens war on peace; EP.....270
Army, United States. See United States—Army
Art (articles by C. Greenberg)
Reviews of exhibitions:
Contemporary British artists.....389
Gottlieb, Adolph.....629
Pepsi-Cola's "paintings of the year".....481
Pyramid group of artists.....687
Barber, Albert Pinkham.....538
Shah, Ben.....481
Atomic energy
Aftermath of the Canadian spy trials. B. W. Penzell; S.....376
Canvass to discredit civilian scientists and return scientific research to army. L. Engel; S.....117
Commission of U. N. the object of a congressional witch hunt; E.....60
Control, possible; L. Engel; S.....577
Hiroshima deadhead; E.....116
Progress in research on peace-time use; EP.....213
Progress report of the U. N. commission; EP.....135; EP.....213; 373 Automobile workers' convention; Reuther victory; EP.....545

Baldinger, Wilbur H.
On political justice in Eastern Europe; C, with reply for F. Kirchwey.....605;	369
Pattern for union-business; S.....529; correction.....606
Baldwin, Roger N.
Our blunder in Korea; S.....119;	238
Balkan states
Eastern bloc, the. C. Poulos; S.....64; EP.....57
Political justice in eastern Europe. F. Kirchwey; S.....369
Regional planned economy, a. C. Poulos; S.....11
U. N. Balkan commission, the; EP.....30; EP.....57; EP.....113; EP.....133; 196; 200; 219; E.....244; EP.....269; 301; 331; EP.....367; 372; 462
United States agrees to drop guilt charge against Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Albania in Greek border dispute. J. K. Gordon; S.....372; EP.....367 Ball, Alice D.
Appeals for books for American book center for war-devastated libraries; C.....83
Ball, Sarah B.
Importance of public libraries; C.....514; see also.....384
Baller, Russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggin; S.....52
Ballet theater. B. H. Haggin; S.....81
Barker, Michael
Panama on the seven seas; S.....444
Barkin, Solomay
Who's to blame for high prices? S.....163
Barrett, Frank; proposes bill for abolition of Jackson Hole monument; EP.....433
Barrett, Jack
Crossword puzzles.....27, 55, 83
Barsky, Edward K., convicted for contempt of House Un-American affairs committee. I. F. Stone; S.....223
Bas, Robert
Thomas Garrigue Masaryk; S.....283
Beginning, the. W. Stevens; P.....412
Bekom, king of, and his collection of wives; EP.....665
Bell, Daniel
Seeks material on American Socialist party; C.....55
Bender committee report on prices; I. F. Stone; S.....576
Bendiner, Robert
Lining up the Americas; S.....177
Politics and people:
Disaffected Democrats return to Truman camp.....218
Eisenhower build-up, the.....218
Fish, H., launches new magazine, To day's world 330
G. O. P. ebb tide; S.....519
Ikkes, H. L., reported backing Taft candidacy.....435
N.A.A.C.P. plans legal test of "white primary" laws.....330
Political void in Oregon; S.....520
Reuther, W., suggested as running mate for Taft.....435
Senate race in Mississippi.....611
Stassen, the what-is-it? S.....611
Wallace, Henry A.; S.....668
Beracha, S.
Can private capital go abroad? S.....382
Berk, Oscar
"Zoo"; drawings.....622
Bethlehem steel corporation; union-busting. W. H. Baldinger; S.....529; correction.....606
Bevan, Aneurin; a portrait. R. T. McKenzie; S.....140
Bilbo, Theodore G.
Death; EP.....195
Rankin, J. E., to seek his Senate seat. R. Bendiner; S.....330
Birkman, Barry
Comments on "Socialism, communism, and the west" by M. Marshall; C.....349; see.....246
Birth control
British decision on failure to consummate marriage as insufficient ground for annulment; EP.....695
Law, Massachusetts, petition for amendment; EP.....637
Black narcissus. J. Agee; MP.....209
Blanshard, Paul
Articles on the Roman catholic church: Education; S.....525; correction.....606
Medicine, the; S.....466
Sexual code; S.....498
Interest in articles causes demand for The Nation ; EP.....545
Letters of commendation and condemnation.....659, 661
Blum, Léon
Soviets say "no" to Marshall plan; S.....63

- Bolivia; problem of the Indians. J. H. Groel; 310
- Bolles, Blair
Dollars or socialism; S. 197
- Bonneville dam. See Power, public
- Bopp, what keeps the price high? M. Gumpert; S. 384
- Books and bookkeeping in America. M. Gumpert; S. 384; C. 514
- Boston freeing of Curley; EP. 607
- Boyle, Ray
British members of parliament protest executions in Spain; C. 110
- Faces of Spain; S. 35
- Isabelita's trial; C. 393
- Bradley, Lynahtook, convicted for contempt of House un-American affairs committee. I. F. Stone; S. 223
- Brewster, Owen, and the investigation of Hughes plane contracts; EP. 153
- Brink family, See California
- Brooklyn Tablet; attack on B. J. Stern; EP. 664
- Brooks, Van Wyck
Comments on "Socialism, communism, and the west" by M. Marshall; C. 350; 246
- Brown, La Rue
Comments on "Tribal town" by R. L. Neuberger; C. 151; see 66
- John G. Winant; S. 521
- Browne, Waldo
Backward glance in history, a; S. 256
- Views of Mark Twain on loyalty; C. 269
- Brute force. J. Agee; MP. 684
- Bryan, Helen; awaits trial for contempt of House un-American affairs committee. I. F. Stone; S. 223
- Bugbee, Helen
Comments on Nation's Palestine supplement; 55
- Bulgaria; N. Pettiford convicted as traitor. F. Kirchwey; S. 369
- Burgess, David S.
Comments on "King Cotton strikes again" by A. G. Mezercik; C. 82
- Burma; U Aung San and members of interim government assassinated; U Saw's nationalist party suspected; EP. 114
- Burnside, Norman
Urges formation of anti-huckster party; C. 324
- Bushey, Fred E. See Congress
- Business
Can private capital go abroad? S. Beracha; S. 382
- Economic outlook; S. 59
- Latin American trade troubles. K. Hutchison; S. 144
- Prices:
And wages, cycle of inflation; EP. 635
- Anal; inflation; balloon. O. Nichols; S. 98
- Gambling in food. K. Hutchison; S. 338; EP. 369
- How to check inflation; E. 272
- In the book field. F. C. Melcher; C. 54
- Inflation, measures for control, proposed. K. Hutchison; S. 681
- Inflation, message by President Truman; E. 665
- Inflation, Republican bill; EP. 691
- Meatless days urged to bring down meat prices. W. Ross; C. 27
- National association of manufacturers pronouncements on inflation; EP. 635
- Restoration of price controls urged to check inflation; E. 272; EP. 297
- Steel set for a sharp rise; E. 59; 98; EP. 134; EP. 135; 165
- Taft's "eat-less" formula; E. 299
- Too much money. K. Hutchison; S. 505
- Truman address on restraint of credit; EP. 608
- Truman anti-inflation proposals; political effects; E. 574
- Truman calls special session of Congress on inflation and foreign aid; E. 461
- Truman rejects return to rationing and price-control as "police-state" methods. I. F. Stone; S. 436
- Who is to blame for high prices? S. Barkin; S. 163
- Profit-sharing under the Welch plan. K. Hutchison; S. 472
- Profits, advances in. K. Hutchison; S. 532
- Prosperity—how long will it last? F. Sternberg; S. 307
- Scarcity preferred; I. F. Stone; S. 613
- Scotsavers divided on prospects of recession. K. Hutchison; S. 18
- Trade agreement signed at Geneva; EP. 518
- Truman vetoes the wool price-support bill; EP. 1
- C
- C.C.F. See Cooperative commonwealth federation
- C.I.O. See Labor—Congress of industrial organizations
- California
Solve for a relief case by ending the Brink family back to Oklahoma; EP. 176; C. 296
- Wallace splits the Democrats. C. McWilliams; S. 6
- Canada
Aftermath of atomic-spy trials. B. W. Penzell; S. 376
- Canadian broadcasting corporation. C. A. Siepmann; S. 15; C. 322
- Labor and political action. E. Forsey; S. 42
- Carrier, Constance Journey; P. 168
- Cartoons (Schloss)
Communism and anti-commintern stores. 401
- Handle with care. 274
- No exit. 62
- Optimists, the. 639
- Outlook for 1948. 695
- Progress, 1947. 517
- Razor's edge; the. 159
- Seventeenth guest, the. 125
- Too many cooks. 575
- World serious. 332
- X-raying de Gaulle. 491
- Catholic church, Roman. See Roman catholic church
- Catholic veterans and C. Chaplin. J. Agee; S. 707
- Chaplin, Charles, and the Catholic Veterans. 707
- Charter, new, for freedom; E. 487
- Chiang Kai-shek. See China
- Chicago. See Illinois
- Children; how the states care for dependents. S. Laue; S. 381
- China
Manifesto of Shanghai professors in behalf of arrested students. Yang Wen-Pei; C. United States reported considering new loan. E. 433
- Wedemeyer report. M. S. Stewart; S. 277; E. 433
- Why I broke with Chiang. Feng Yu-Hsiang; S. 522
- Church, catholic. See Roman catholic church
- Civil rights
Action in cases of "potential security risks"; EP. 573
- Backward glance in history, a. W. R. Brown; S. 256
- "Dear Mr. Hoover" by F. Luscomb; C. 428
- Forum held by P.C.A.; EP. 459
- House un-American affairs committee versus joint anti-fascist refugee committee. I. F. Stone; S. 223
- Loyalty check of federal employees begins. F. Kirchwey; S. 173
- President's committee, report; E. 487
- See also Un-American activities, committee on
- Civil service commission; congressmen protest the inclusion of their names in a special security file; EP. 396
- Clark, Michael Fights, the; S. 70
- Clayton, William L.; sees east-west trade in Europe on increase; EP. 395
- Coal
Anglo-British conference on Ruhr output. F. Sternberg; S. 158
- Contract negotiations will test Taft-Hartley law. A. Friendly; S. 9; EP. 1
- E. 31; EP. 61
- Mine operators seek price boost. O. Nichols; S. 98
- See also United mine workers of America
- Cohn, Werner
Public radio rather than a code; C. 513
- Cole, Margaret
Stafford Cripps; S. 555
- Coleman, David. See Illinois
- Collins, H. H. Jr.
Increase in food production; Anderson plan; E. 669; correction 398
- Collins, L. G. J. Lawton, may succeed Eisenhower as chief of staff. H. W. Kelley; C. 266
- Columbia Concerts, control of musicians. M. Smart and M. Fox; S. 670
- Columbia university General Eisenhower accepts presidency; E. 3
- Comay, Michael S.
Race and politics in South Africa; S. 305
- See Congress
- Command decision. J. W. Krutch; D. 480
- Commerce. See Business
- Committee on un-American activities. See Un-American activities, committee on
- Committee to aid convicts. E. Dellinger; A. Hassler; G. Houser; B. Rustin; W. Sutherland; C. 541
- Communism
Nine European parties set up new "Comintern"; E. 398; C. 401
- Communist party, United States
Anti-communism, through one-way street; EP. 665; see also EP. 636
- Army bans showing of "All my sons" in Germany, Austria, and Japan following protest that play is communist propaganda; EP. 176
- Communists right sometimes. J. Altman; C. 514; see also A. B. Lewis. 204; C. 238
- Dennis case, the. I. F. Stone; S. 223
- House un-American activities committee holds hearing on Communist activities in Hollywood; EP. 459
- See also Un-American activities, committee on
- Loyalty check of federal employees begins. F. Kirchwey; S. 173
- Marzani case. I. F. Stone; S. 333
- What are we afraid of? F. Kirchwey; S. 666
- Community Concerts, control of musicians; M. Smart and M. Fox; S. 670
- Compacts, three on every dressing table; EP. 490
- Condon, Edward U.; outstanding scientist attacked as communist. L. Engel; S. 117
- Conference, east-west, needed. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 585
- Conference, foreign ministers', at London. See London conference of foreign ministers
- Conference, sixteen-nation. See Paris conference
- Congress
Dworshak, H., (Rep., Idaho) misuses public funds; EP. 135
- Emergency session of Senate for top-gear relief for Europe; E. 244; EP. 269
- E. 371; E. 461
- Hoffman, Representative Clare E.; summoning to his bar of justice; EP. 573
- Raskin, J. E. campaigns for Senate seat of late T. Bilbo. R. Bendiner; S. 330
- Record of first session; EP. 85; E. 115
- Representatives Hoffman and Busbey protest inclusion of their names in a special security file of Civil service commission; EP. 396
- Congress of industrial organizations. See Labor
- Conscientious objectors on strike. H. Schoenfeld; S. 407
- Contracts, war; congressional probe of plane contract to H. Hughes; EP. 153
- Convicts. See Committee to aid convicts
- Cooperative commonwealth federation; Canadian labor and political action. E. Forsey; S. 42
- Cooperatives
National grape cooperative association, the. K. Hutchison; S. 472
- Father Tompkins of Cape Breton. L. Lania; S. 202
- Greenbelt consumer service adjudged monopoly by House small-business committee; EP. 194
- Copacabana. J. Agee; MP. 209
- Cordon, Guy; fights L. Stockman, fellow Republican from Oregon, over Bonneville power administration budget; EP. 176
- Cornet, Marshall. See Oregon
- Cost of living. I. F. Stone; S. 576
- Council of economic advisers; report to President; EP. 490
- Council of foreign ministers, meeting in London. See London conference
- Credit; Truman message on restraint; EP. 608
- Cripps, Stafford; how Chancellor of exchequer; career. M. Cole; S. 555; EP. 543
- Cronin, Kathleen
Refugees from Spain, in Oregon; C. 709
- Crossfire. J. Agee; MP. 129
- Crossword puzzles
111, 132, 157, 171, 191, 211, 239, 267, 295, 323, 351, 393, 513, 429, 457, 485, 542, 570, 606, 634, 661, 710
- Curley, James M. See Boston
- See also S. 199; C. 351; C. 352; C. 456; C. 486
- Czechoslovakia
Masaryk, J., urges east-west cooperation. K. Gordon; S. 301
- Masaryk, T. G.; by R. Bass; S. 283
- Reverses decision to attend Paris economic conference; EP. 57
- D
- D. P.'s. See Displaced persons
- Dalton, Hugh; indiscretion costs chancellorship of exchequer; EP. 543
- Dance, the (articles by B. H. Haggin)
Ballet theater. 81
- Monte Carlo Ballet Russe. 52
- Davis, Melton S.
Who's a Nazi in Bavaria? S. 142
- Dawson, H. S.
Comments on "Radio: tool of reactionaries" by C. A. Siepmann; C. 322; see 15
- Deane, Hugh
Death of Lyuh Woon-Hyung; S. 228
- Korean diary; S. 469
- De Gaulle, Charles. See France
- De Lima, Agnes
Seeks material on Randolph Bourne; C. 324
- Dellinger, Dr. A. Hassler, G. Houser; B. Rustin; W. Sutherland; C. 541
- Committee to aid convicts; C. 541
- Del Vayo, Julio Alvarez. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
- Delson, Robert, and S. W. Sanders
Viet Nam celebration; C. 296
- Demarest, Michael
Race-bias in housing; C. 110

- Democratic party
McGrath, J. H., new national chairman; charges against Republicans; EP..... 490
Truman favors C. P. Anderson as chairman of national committee; EP..... 175
Wallace splits party ranks in California. C. McWilliams; S..... 36
Denham, Robert. See National labor relations board..... 340
Dennis, Eugene. See Communist party.....
De Sherbinin, Michael J.
Planning without headlines; co-operation in Europe; S..... 701
Despres, Leon M.
On legal talent in Chicago fire case; C..... 690; see also..... 551
Devil's envoys, the. J. Agee; MP..... 264
Dewey, Thomas E.; speech on Marshall plan; EP..... 515
Discrimination, racial. See Negroes
"Disloyalty" cases. See United States — State department.....
Displaced Americans; E..... 637
Problem for United Nations; EP..... 29
Truman urges passages of Stratton bill; EP..... 85
Divorce
Jackson, R. H., urges Supreme court to rule on validity of various state laws; EP..... 432
Dominican republic; expedition to overthrow Trujillo; T. Sawyer a member; EP..... 544
Down to earth. J. Agee; M.P..... 209
Drama. See Krutch, J. W., for reviews
Dworshak, Henry. See Congress
- E
ERP (European recovery program). See Europe, aid for Eagleton, J.
Spanish canvas; C..... 294
East-west conference, needed. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 585
Eastward in Eden. J. W. Krutch; D..... 628
Ecker, Frederick H.; award to him for achievements in housing protested. C. J. Lynn; C..... 618
Economic commission for Europe. M. J. De Sherbinin; S..... 701
Economics, Hazlitt book advocating laissez faire; K. Hutchison; S..... 699 Education
Gary school strike, the. P. L. Klein; S..... 335; EP..... 326
National student federation. C. Farrar; S..... 279
Roman catholic church and the schools. See Blanshard, P.
St. Louis school strike, the; EP..... 326
Egypt
Bids for power. M. Ferro; S..... 362
Brings Sudan issue to United Nations. H. J. Laski; S..... 355; 362
Eidus, Arnold. B. H. Haggin; M..... 512
Eisenhower, General Dwight D.
Accepts presidency of Columbia university; E..... 3
Boomed for presidency. R. Bendiner; S..... 218, 435
Election, 1948. W. Presidential campaign of 1948
Engel, Leonard
Atomic energy, possible? S..... 577
Campaign to discredit civilian scientists and return scientific research to army; S..... 117
Case for a national science foundation, the; S..... 275; C..... 456
Scope of biological warfare, the; S..... 93
English, Horace B.
Comments on "E. Socialism, communism, and the west" by M. Marshall; C..... 349; see 246
"Enterprise, free." See Laissez faire
Espionage; aftermath of Canadian atomic-spy trials. B. W. Penzell; S..... 376
Esprit; French monthly publishes special issue on Germany. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 185 Europe
Aid for:
Crisis; aid from United States. H. J. Laski; S..... 548; see also ERP goes to congress; I. F. Stone; S..... 696
Economic conference; self help. M. J. De Sherbinin; S..... 701
European recovery program. F. Kirchwey; S..... 693
Harriman committee report; EP..... 515
Hester committee report on foreign aid. I. F. Stone; S..... 576
Hester committee report; scarcity preferred. I. F. Stone; S..... 613
Republican party's position; EP..... 515
Without strings; Marshall plan. F. Kirchwey; S..... 546
See also Europe
Cooperation in planning without headlines. M. J. De Sherbinin; S..... 701
Economic commission conference. M. J. De Sherbinin; S..... 701
Scarcity preferred; I. F. Stone; S..... 613
Marshall plan
American prosperity — how long will it last? F. Sternberg; S..... 307
- Anglo-British conference on Ruhr coal. F. Sternberg; S..... 158
C.I.O. resolution on post-war rehabilitation; EP..... 432
Can private capital go abroad? S. Beracha; S..... 382
Czechoslovakia reverses its decision to attend the Paris conference; EP..... 57
Defended by G. Bidault. J. K. Gordon; S..... 300
Dewey, Thomas E., speech on plan; EP..... 515
Dilemma of the left. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 101
Emergency session of congress urged to provide immediate stop-gap relief; E..... 244; EP..... 269; E..... 371; E..... 461
European customs union. K. Hutchison; S..... 383, 411
Europeans skeptical about American aid. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 230
Italian reactions. M. Rossi; S..... 252
Krug report on American resources, the; EP..... 431
Lange, O., warns that prosperity is indivisible. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 380; 381; EP..... 327
Molotov goes to Paris; EP..... 1; E..... 32
No exit. E. Schloss; C..... 62
Problem of Germany; EP..... 113, 145
Report of Paris conference; EP..... 327
Report on, by Council of economic advisers; EP..... 490
Ruhr becomes keystone. F. Kirchwey; S..... 88; C..... 125; 145
Russian view. J. K. Gordon; S..... 400; C..... 401
Schedules; Taft criticism of plan; EP..... 489
Soviets say "no." L. Blum; S..... 63
Versus socialism. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 339, 380; C..... 64; EP..... 57
Will it aid eastern Europe? C. Poulos; S..... 57
Socialism, communism, and the west. M. Marshall; S..... 246; C..... 349, 350
United Nations. E. Anderson; S..... 541
Everybody's business; articles. K. Hutchison; see specific headings under Hutchison Exodus 1947. See Palestine
- F
Farben I. G. See Germany
Farrar, Curtis
National student federation; S..... 279
Farrell, Bob. See Oregon
Fascism. See Italy
Fast, Howard; convicted for contempt of House un-American affairs committee. I. F. Stone; S..... 223
Feister, Irving
Comments on "Atomic bombs or atomic plenty" by L. Engel; C..... 456; see 275
Feng Yu-Hsiang. See China
Fenton, Edward S.; hired by Argentina to "sell" Peron government to Americans; EP..... 154
Ferro, Maurice
Egypt's bid for power; S..... 362
Films. See Motion Pictures; also, Agee, J. for reviews
Finance, public
Inflationary implications of tax-reduction bill; E..... 59
Magill committee report on proposed revision of federal taxation. K. Hutchison; S..... 558
Object lesson for Taber committee on appropriations; EP..... 115
Taxation and prices; tax reduction bill to be placed before congress; EP..... 489
Taxation, plans, Wall street. K. Hutchison; S..... 558
Taxation reduction bill. Republic; EP..... 505
Too much money. K. Hutchison; S..... 603
First Mrs. Fraser, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 330
Fish, Hamilton; launches new magazine, Today's world. R. Bendiner; S..... 689
Flagged, Kirsten; objection to. L. Goldstein; C..... 689
Flamm, Irving
Newspaper control through postal laws; C..... 486
Flanders committee report on prices. I. F. Stone; S..... 576
Food
Emergency session of congress urged to provide immediate stop-gap relief for Europe; E..... 244; EP..... 269; E..... 371; E..... 461
Intense production; Anderson plan for. H. H. Collins, Jr.; S..... 669; correction
Report of Cabinet committee on world food programs; EP..... 29
Self-rationing urged to release more food for Europe; EP..... 325; EP..... 297; 338
Foreign aid, special committee on. See Aid for Europe Foreign ministers' conference in London. See London conference of foreign ministers
Forsey, Eugene
Canadian labor and political action; S..... 42
Fox, Muriel, and Mary Smart
Control of musicians; S..... 670
- France
Bidault defends Marshall plan. J. K. Gordon; S..... 301; 300
De Gaulle; will he come back? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 286
De Gaulle repudiates democracy. J. K. Robbins; C..... 54
De Gaulle, X-raying. Schloss; C..... 491
De Gaulle's victory analyzed. L. Levy; S..... 439
"Insurrection" in. F. Kirchwey; S..... 693
Labor; split in federation; EP..... 691
Municipal elections; EP..... 431; 463
Politics; strikes; EP..... 543
Problems confronting foreign investors. S. Beracha; S..... 382
Ramadier government in politico-economic crisis. M. Clark; S..... 70
Socialist house divided. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 204; C..... 238; C..... 428
Strength of left in coming elections. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 314
Three years after liberation. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 259
Francois, Samson. B. H. Haggin; M..... 630
"Free enterprise." See Laissez faire
"Free speech" in Philadelphia. M. Vaynsky; C..... 605
Frieda, J. Agee; MP..... 209
Friederich, H. J.
Comments on "Vetoes and other tools" by Kirchwey; C..... 457; see 196
Friendly, Alfred
Coal — test of Taft-Hartley law; S..... 9; EP..... 1; E..... 31; E..... 61
Furlan, Boris. See Yugoslavia
- G
G. O. P. See Republican party
Geneva conference on tariffs; results; EP..... 518; E..... 573
Germany
Aid for; proper use of; EP..... 87, 101; And the Marshall plan; EP..... 57; 88; 101; EP..... 113; C..... 125; 145; 158
Anglo-British conference on Ruhr coal. F. Sternberg; S..... 158; 217
Recent photo; J. Alvarez del Vayo; E..... 121
Government, plans for, at London conference; EP..... 607
Recovery, economic, obstacles in way. K. Hutchison; S..... 586
Rerations from K. Hutchison; S..... 586
Self-portrait; special issue of Esprit; J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 185
Trial of I. G. Farben executives; EP..... 213
Who's a Nazi in Bavaria? M. S. Davis; S..... 142
Gold, K. Hutchison; S..... 651
E. Bevin proposes redistribution of Fort Knox gold; EP..... 241
Goldstein, Leon
Objection to K. Flagstad; C..... 689
Goodall, P. Denis
Requests addresses for exchange of Nation and New Statesman and Nation; C..... 82
Gordon, J. King
Duel in U.N. assembly; S..... 301
Fair and cooler at U.N.; S..... 331
German independence; S..... 500
Liberation limited (South Africa); S..... 438
Little assembly; S..... 372
Palestine and other disputes; S..... 400
Two-world debate; S..... 384
United Nations box score; S..... 464
Who's a warmonger? S..... 619
Wind-up at Flushing; S..... 531
World health organization; S..... 629
Gottlieb, Adolph, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. 629
Government agencies. See names of agencies; United States
Great Britain
Activities of Mosley and other fascists on increase; EP..... 368
Anglo-American relations
Bevin, E., proposes redistribution of Fort Knox gold; EP..... 241
Britain's dollar crisis; E..... 154; EP..... 193; 197; 215; 221; 442
Britain's import tax on American films; E..... 154; E..... 176
Anglo-Egyptian relations
Sudan case in United Nations. H. J. Laski; S..... 355; 362
Anglo-Palestinian relations
Anti-Jewish riots in Britain follow murder of British soldiers. A. Vallance; S..... 157
Britain announces willingness to relinquish mandate. F. Kirchwey; S..... 635
British attack and turn back refugee ship. Exodus 1947; EP..... 113; EP..... 242
British opportunity, and failure; E..... 545
Palestine and oil. F. Kirchwey; S..... 345
Power politics spells war. H. J. Laski; S..... 5
Rule by British military. L. Shultz; S..... 156, 182
Stimulation of Arab violence; EP..... 663
Two British soldiers slain in wave of reprisals; EP..... 134; 156; 157
Anglo-Soviet relations
Speculation in Moscow. A. Werth; S..... 678
Art of planning. K. Hutchison; S..... 447

- Audacity of A. Bevan. R. T. McKenzie; S. 140
 Budget. A. Vallance; S. 618
 Budget and taxation; EP. 544
 Cabinet shake-up. A. Vallance; S. 442; EP. 395
 Cost-of-living figures; EP. 326
 Cripps new chancellor of exchequer; EP. 543; S. 555
 Cuts newsprint imports; EP. 85; EP. 154; C. 159
 D-day for stung. K. Hutchison; S. 46; EP. 193; 197
 Dalton out as chancellor of exchequer, due to indiscretion; EP. 543
 Directive on labor mobilization issued; EP. 241
 Elections:
 Labor wins by-election in Liverpool; EP. 271
 Labor victory at Gravesend; EP. 607
 Faces economic crisis; E. 136; EP. 221
 Industrial charter of Conservative party approves large measures of government control; EP. 368
 Industry not decadent. K. Hutchison; S. 621
 Legislation proposed to limit powers of House of Lords; EP. 460
 London newsrel. A. Vallance; S. 617
 Marriage, decision on; See Birth control
 Marriage, economic; J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 703
 Socialism, communism, and the west. M. Marshall; S. 246; C. 349, 350
 Great dawn, the. J. Agee, MP. 320
 Great expectations. J. Agee; MP. 79
 Greece
 American success story. F. Kirchwey; S. 462
 Poulos; S. 614
 Government arrests 2,800 to prevent "communist coup"; EP. 57; EP. 86; 101
 Griswold mission:
 Flasco in Greece. C. Poulos; S. 614
 Only chance. A. W. Sheppard; S. 616
 Maximos government resigns; Tsaldaris to form new cabinet. F. Kirchwey; S. 196
 Non-existent "international brigade"; EP. 86
 Power politics spells war. H. J. Laski; S. 353
 Sophoulis, T., heads new cabinet; EP. 242
 U. N. Balkan commission, the; EP. 30
 EP. 57; EP. 113; S. 133; 136; 200; 219; E. 244; EP. 269; 301; 331; 462
 United States agrees to drop guilt charge against Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Albania at United Nations; EP. 367; 372
 United States plans to help to equip a national army to restore internal order; EP. 37; EP. 153
 What is America's game? C. Poulos; S. 200
 Greenbelt consumer service; adjudged monopoly by House small-business committee; EP. 194
 Greenberg, Clement
 Reviews of art exhibitions:
 Contemporary British artists. 389
 Gottlieb, A. 629
 Haurer, Alfred. 687
 Pepsi-Cola's "paintings of the year" 481
 Ryder, Albert Pinkham. 539
 Shahn, Ben. 481
 Griller quartet. B. H. Haggin; M. 631
 Griswold, Dwight. See Greece
 Groel, John H.
 Bolivia's two worlds; S. 310
 Gumpert, Martin
 Books and bookkeeping in America; S. 514
 884; C. 558
 Hay fever, arthritis longevity; S. 646
 Rebirth of general medicine; S. 646
 H Haentzschel, Ad.
 Is Maritain a reactionary? C. 190; see also C. 53; C. 111
 Haggin, B. H.
 Articles on music:
 Allegro. 512
 Eldus, Arnold. 512
 Francois, Samson. 630
 Griller quartet. 631
 High-button shoes. 512
 New York City opera company. 130
 Rosenfeld, P., and W. J. Turner. 25
 Scherman, Thomas. 631
 Stravinsky, I. 512
 Graham, Gretchen. 631
 Articles in the dance:
 Ballet companies owe public dependable information about casts and programs. 130
 Ballet theater. 81
 Monte Carlo Ballet Russe. 52
 Music, recorded. 25, 52, 81, 109, 130, 150, 321, 427, 455, 482, 539, 568, 604, 656, 688, 708
 Hallett, George H., Jr.
 Figs for "B. B. S." 475
 Hamilton, Thomas J.
 Washington and the United Nations; S. 219
 Hankin, Bernard
 American Jewish joint distribution committee appeal for funds for D. P. camps; 83
 Harriman committee report on aid to Europe; EP. 515
 Hassler, Alfred. See Dellinger, D.
 Hazlitt, Henry
 Laissez faire, book advocating "free enterprise"; K. Hutchison; S. 629
 Health organization, world. J. G. King; S. 529
 Hearst press, advocacy of film censorship; EP. 617
 Heirst, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 425
 Heptasis. See New York Herald Tribune
 Herreros, fig. for, by Reverend M. Scott; J. K. Gordon; S. 500
 Herter committee. See Europe, aid for Hickman, James. See Illinois
 High-button shoes. B. H. Haggin; M. 631
 Hiroshima. See Atomic energy
 Hoffman, Clare E. See Congress
 Hollywood. See Un-American activities, committee on Hook, Sidney
 Comments on "Socialism, communism, and the west" by M. Marshall; C. 350; see 246
 Hoover, Herbert
 Repudiates America's role in the war. R. Bendiner; S. 273
 Houser, George. See Dellinger, D.
 Housing
 Amendments before New York state voters; EP. 461
 "Jim Crowism" in Metropolitan Life projects; EP. 517
 McCarthy, J. R., acknowledges problem of a housing shortage; EP. 243
 Near race-riot at Chicago's Fernwood project; H. A. Jack; S. 250; correction. 458
 Prayer for landlords; EP. 59
 Ries in housing. C. Abrams; S. 67, 122, 160; EP. 58; 90; C. 110; C. 486
 Chicago fire-shooting case. H. A. Jack; S. 51
 Restrictive covenants. C. Abrams; S. 67; EP. 58; 90
 Trump signs housing and rent act; E. 31
 Washington Square site for New York university law school opposed. B. Worthington; C. 430
 Howell, Ronald T.
 Exchange of The Nation for The New Statesman and Nation; C. 514
 Hucksters, the. J. Agee; MP. 129
 Hughes, Asa M.
 Peloponnesian war and American foreign policy; J. R. 331
 Hughes, Howard; congress investigates wartime plane contracts; EP. 153
 Humphries, Rolfe
 Jaded, the. P. 77
 Hungary; Rustem Vambery, new minister to Washington. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 476; EP. 59; EP. 396
 Hussein, Haj Amin (Mufti). See Palestine
 Hutchison, Keith
 Art of planning, the; P. 447
 British "loafers"; S. 621
 Congress sugar daddies; S. 126
 D-day for sterling; S. 46
 European customs union; S. 383, 411
 Gambling in food; S. 378
 Grapes without wrath; S. 472
 Golden tide; S. 651
 Hazlitt book advocating laissez faire; S. 629
 Inflation, measures, proposed, for control; S. 144
 Latin-American trade troubles; S. 532
 Profits; S. 586
 Reparations from Germany; S. 586
 Russia's vicious circle; fourth five-year plan; S. 75
 Soothsayers divided on prospects of recession; S. 18
 Steel: too little and too dear; S. 165
 Tax plans, Wall street; S. 558
 Too much money; S. 505
 World bank on Wall street; S. 102
 Hymes, Dell
 Comments on "Our blunders in Korea" by R. N. Baldwin; C. 238; see 119
 I
 I. T. O. See International trade organization
 I know where I'm going. J. Agee; MP. 264
 Ickes, Harold L., and the Alaskan fish monopoly; S. 199; C. 351; C. 486
 Reported backing Taft's candidacy. R. Bendiner; S. 435
 Illinois
 Near race-riot at Chicago's Fernwood housing project; H. A. Jack; S. 250; correction. 458
 Racial discrimination, Chicago; fire and Hickman-Coleman shooting case; H. A. Jack; S. 551; C. 690
 Immigration. Truman urges passage of Stratton bill; EP. 85
 In the camp there was one alive. R. Jarrell; P. 477
 In the wind. 74, 162, 180, 340, 474, 587, 702
 India
 Unionism, new, and Pakistan; to sign a pact Grapples with freedom. S. Rao; S. 179; EP. 175 Hindu "brown shirts." A. Roth; S. 377
 Kashmir, trouble in; E. 518
 Referendums on partition. S. Rao; S. 38
 Rice and riots in Malabar. A. Roth; S. 403
 Seeks seat on Security council of U.N. J. K. Gordon; S. 372
 Sikh-Moslem communal strife. A. Roth; S. 280; EP. 213; E. 271; 377
 Indians, American
 Metlakatla, tribal town in Alaska. R. I. Neuberger; S. 66
 Navajo poverty; need for relief; E. 637
 See also Alaska; Bolivia
 Indo-China
 Viet Nam celebrates second anniversary. R. Nelson and S. W. Sanders; C. 296 Indonesia
 Dutch launch full-scale military action in Java and Sumatra. C. Wolf, Jr.; S. 124
 France vetoes a proposal for further U.N. action. T. J. Hamilton; S. 219
 Unilateral intervention by United States. F. Kirchwey; S. 196; C. 133; 196
 United Nations orders cease-fire; EP. 196
 Industrial union of marine and shipbuilding workers of America; busting of union. W. H. Baldinger; S. 525
 Inflation. See Business - Prices
 Ingersoll, Robert. See mental association founded. E. I. Wakefield; C. 295
 Inter-American defense conference; to be limited to formal defense treaty. R. Bendiner; S. 177
 International bank for reconstruction and development; first bond offering proves success. K. Hutchison; S. 102
 International committee for the study of European questions; reports on revival of fascism. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. 17
 International socialist conference at Antwerp. See Socialism
 International trade organization; Geneva conference draws up draft charter; EP. 193
 International union of students. C. Farrar; S. 279
 Iran; rejects proposed Russian oil concession in Azerbaijan; EP. 459
 Issawi, Charles
 Comments on Nation's Palestine supplement; 484
 Italy
 Chances for Socialist unity. M. Rossi; S. 333
 Election in Rome; significance. M. Rossi; S. 501
 Fascism, new. M. Rossi; S. 579
 Mediterranean coming elections, the. M. Rossi; S. 252 Report on reconstruction. M. Rossi; S. 73
 Riots, political; EP. 543
 Widespread strikes against high prices and food shortages; EP. 298
 Ivy, J. Agee; MP. 172
 J
 Jack, Homer A.
 Fire in Chicago; racial discrimination; Hickman-Coleman shooting case; S. 551
 Negroes and whites battle at Chicago's Fernwood housing project; S. 250; correction. 458
 Jackson, Robert H. See Supreme court, United States
 Jackson Hole; Barrett bill proposes abolition of national monument; EP. 433
 Jaded, the. R. Humphries; P. 77
 James, Daniel
 A.V.C.'s big chance; S. 14; C. 238
 Japan
 Record of American occupation. M. S. Stewart; S. 95; EP. 87
 United States urges conference to discuss peace treaty; EP. 87
 Jarrell, Randall
 In the camp there was one alive; P. 477
 Sears Roebuck; P. 506
 Jews; in South Africa. M. S. Comay; S. 305
 See also Palestine
 "Jim Crowism." See Negroes
 Jinnah, M. A. See Pakistan
 Johnson, Joseph E.
 What keeps them apart? Soviet-American relations; S. 373
 Joint anti-fascist refugee committee
 Sixteen members of executive board convicted for contempt of House Un-American activities committee. I. F. Stone; S. 223
 Jordan valley authority. See Palestine
 Journey. C. Carrier; P. 168
 Judson, Arthur. See composers
 Smart and M. Fox; S. 670
 K
 Kashmir. See India
 Kelley, Helen Wallace
 Catholic church and American army; C. 266
 Kenny, Robert W.
 Committee on un-American activities; S. 494; EP. 489
 Kentucky; 1947 new deal. A. G. Mezerik; S. 40
 Kingdon, Frank. on H. A. Wallace. R. Bendiner; S. 668
 Kirchwey, Freda
 Aid for Europe, without strings; Marshall plan. S. 546 American success story in Greece; S. 462

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Breakdown of Council of foreign ministers; S.	693	Landau, F.		McCann, Irving; counsel for House subcommittee assault; J. Padway, AFL attorney; EP	193
Communism; what are we afraid of? S.	666	Protestant treatment of colored peoples in South Africa; C.	458	McCarthy, Joseph R., acknowledges existence of housing problem in America; EP	243
Federal loyalty check; S.	173	Lands, public; exploitation, threatened, by private interests. R. L. Neuberger; S.	673	McKenzie, Robert T.
"Insurrection" in France; S.	638	Lange, Oscar. See Europe — Marshall plan		Audacity of Bevan, the; S.	140
Marshall proposal for "little assembly"; S.	301	Land, Leo		McWilliams, Carey	581
Oil and Palestine; S.	300	Father Tompkins of Cape Breton; S.	202	Earl Warren; S.	6
Political justice in eastern Europe; S.	369	Laski, Harold J.	641	Wallace in the west; S.	6
see also C.	605	America — 1947; S.	641	Medicine
Reply to W. H. Baldinger's letter on political justice in Eastern Europe.	603	At Antwerp socialist conference. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.	650	And the Catholic church. P. Blanshard; S.	466
see also	369	European crisis; aid from the United States; S.	548	Hay fever, arthritis, longevity. M. Gumpert; S.	258
United nations vote for partition of Palestine; S.	610	Power politics in middle east spells war; S.	355	Rebirth of general medicine. M. Gumpert; S.	646
Vetoes and other tools; S.	457	L'Aalante. J. Agee; M.	51	United States to make radio isotopes available for research abroad; E.	243
Watch Mr. Marshall on Palestine; S.	328	Late summer, the. R. Humphries; P.	341	Melcher, Frederic C.
What plan for Germany? S.	88	Latin America		Comments on "Fair trade for whom" by K. Hutchison; C.	54
Kirschten, Ernest	139	Inter-American defense conference. R. Bendiner; S.	177	Metropolitan life insurance company
Kiss of death. J. Agee; MP.	264	Reaction, inter-American. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.	504	Award to F. H. Ecker for achievements in housing protested. C. J. Lynn; C.	486
Klass, J., and G. Nickolaides	690	Trade troubles. K. Hutchison; S.	144	Excludes Negroes from Stuyvesant town housing project. C. Abrams; S.	518
Klein, Paul L.	335	Laue, Gilbert	381	EP	58; C.
Gary school strike, the; S.	640	Leonard, Bernstein. B. H. Haggin; M.	630	Leases apartments to white employees of U. N. J. Tallmer; S.	486
Knicker, Maynard	111	Lerner, Caldwell. See Pennsylvania		by WOR; EP	271
Replies to J. M. Martinez's criticism of an article by J. Maritain; C.	190	Levy, Louis		Meysers, General Bennett E.; malfeasance in office; EP	572
see also C.	54	French municipal elections; triumph of De Gaulle; S.	463	Profiteering; crackdown on him by army officers; E.	609
Korea		Lewis, Albert Baker		Merkel, A. G.
Communists profit by mistakes of American policy. R. N. Baldwin; S.	238	Comments on "Socialist house divided" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C.	238	Kentucky's 1947 new deal; S.	40
Death of Lyuh Woon-Hyung. H. Deane; S.	500	see 204; C.	428	Negroes at U. N.'s door; S.	664
Independence postponed. J. K. Gordon; S.	469	Lewis, Frank W.		Middle east
Korean diary. H. Deane; S.	469	Crossword puzzles	457, 485, 634, 661	And Palestine; E.	353
Krug, Julius A. See Europe — Marshall plan		Lewin, John L.; "disaffiliation" from A. F. L.; EP	664	Inside Arab politics. J. L. Teller; S.	364
Krutch, Joseph Wood	567	Dropped from council of A. F. of L.; EP	433	Power politics spells war. H. J. Laski; S.	355
Reviews of plays:		Fights Taft-Hartley law; EP	1; 9	See also names of countries; Arab league
Allegro	480	E.	31; E.	What price Arab oil? J. F. Stone; S.	358
Anthony and Cleopatra.	628	Liberal organizations; list of dangerous designations. W. Maslow; C.	387	Miners, coal. See United mine workers of America
Command decision	603	Liberation, limited (South Africa). J. K. Gordon; S.	500	Miracle on 34th Street. J. Agee; MP.	209
Eastward in Eden	425	Libraries, public, importance of. S. B. Hall; C.	384	Mississippi; selection of Stennis to the senate; EP	516
First Mrs. Fraser, the	434	Lichtenwalter, Franklin H. See Pennsylvania		Rankin, J. E. campaigns for Senate seat of late. B. H. Haggin; S.	330
Heiress, the	509	Life with father. J. Agee; MP.	209	Missouri valley authority
Man and superman	686	Lilly, Joseph		What a regional authority could do for Missouri basin. E. Kirschten; S.	139
Medea	568	La Guardia; S.	336	Money
Street car named desire	480	Literature; notes by the way. M. Marshall; S.	47, 166, 558	Can private capital go abroad? S. Beracha; C.	382
This time tomorrow	537	Little assembly. See United nations		D-day for sterling. K. Hutchison; S.	46
Under the counter		Living, cost of. See Cost of living		World bank. See International bank for reconstruction and development
Winslow boy, the		Llob, Rodolfo. See Spain		See also Finance, public
L		Loeb, James, Jr.		Monquiu, Luis	239
Labor		A. D. A. and Marshall plan; C.	456	For action on Spain; C.	239
American federation of labor:		London conference of foreign ministers		Monopolies; Greenbelt consumer service adjudged monopoly by House small-business committee; EP	194
"Disaffiliation" of Lewis and U. M. W. A. EP	664	Breakdown of conference. F. Kirchwey; S.	693	Monroe, Carlo Bat. Russe. B. H. Haggin; S.	52
Drops J. L. Lewis from the council; EP	433	Plans for government of Germany; EP	607	Moore, J. Hayden, Sr.
Sets up an educational and political league for coming election; EP	432	Uncertainties; EP	571	Communists can be right; C.	428
Versus J. L. Lewis over Taft-Hartley anti-communist affidavit; EP	397	London newsreel. See Great Britain		see also 204; C.	238
Congress of industrial organizations:		Long night, the. J. Agee; MP.	209	Morris, William H.
Decides against support of third-party movement; EP	432	Lopinsky, Frances		Comments on "Fish and politics" by R. L. Neuberger; C.	352
Overhauls P. A. C. for coming elections; EP	432	Lowdermilk, W. C.	486	Mosley, Sir Oswald. See Great Britain
Passes foreign-policy resolution on post-war rehabilitation of Europe; EP	432	Palestine — the land and the people; S.	360	Moss rose. J. Agee; MP.	172
Remington-Rand union case; EP	636	Loyalty check. See Civil rights		Movie pictures
Reuther victory at Automobile workers' convention; EP	545	Luscomb, Florence		Britain's import tax on American films; C.	154
Thomas, R. J., loses his seat as a vice-president; EP	433	Lynn, Conrad J.		Censorship of Hollywood advocated by Hearst press; EP	517
France. See France		Protests award to F. H. Ecker for achievements in housing; C.	486	See also Agee, J., for reviews; un-American activities, commission on National labor relations board. See National labor relations board		Lyuh Woon-Hyung. See Korea		Mufti of Jerusalem. See Palestine
Strikes:		M		Music
Bethlehem Steel versus C. I. O. shipworkers; EP	525	M. V. A. See Missouri valley authority		Articles by B. H. Haggin:
Industrial union of marine and shipbuilding workers of America; petition for union-busting. W. H. Baldinger; S.	395	Macomber affair, the. J. Agee; MP.	209	Bernstein, Leonard	630
Taft-Hartley law:		Magill committee. See Finance, public		Rosenfeld, P., and Turner, W. J.	25
Anti-communist provisions, the; E.	195	Man and superman. J. W. Krutch; D.	454	Rupp, Frank	511
EP	269; E.	Marcus, J. Anthony		Control of musicians. M. Smart and M. Fox; S.	670
Coal: a test case. A. Friendly; S.	9	Comments on "Socialism, communism, and the west" by M. Marshall; C.	350	Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
EP	1; E.	Marine and shipbuilding workers. See Labor — Strikes		NAACP. See Negroes
Communist-oath provision; effect of, in Remington-Rand C. I. O. case. EP	636	Marriage. See Birth control		NLRB. See National labor relations board
Labor and management evade provisions; E.	195	Marshall, Annette V.		Nation, The
Lewis versus A. F. of L.; EP	397	Marshall, Margaret	110	Demand for Blanshard articles; suppression of copies; EP	545
NLRB faces problem of administration; E.	397	Notes by the way; S.	47, 166, 558	Exchange for The New Statesman and Nation. R. T. Howell; C.	513
NLRB revises its ruling on anti-communist affidavit; E.	397	Socialism, communism, and the west; S.	345, 350	Nation associates, the
Public urged to fight for changes. G. H. Taylor; C.	82	Marshall plan. See Europe — Marshall plan		Holds dinner forum on Palestine question; S.	399
Unions seek ways to operate outside its scope; E.	61	Martinez, J. M.		Submits document to U. N. entitled "Could the Arabs stage an armed revolt against the United Nations?" EP	367
UAW rejects merger with farm equipment workers; E.	61	Comments on "A faith to live by" by J. Maritain; C.	111	National association of broadcasters. See Radio
Unions; busting, pattern for. W. H. Baldinger; S.	606	Marzani, Carl Aldo; victim of Washington witchhunt. J. F. Stone; S.	33	National association of manufacturers; inflation, pronouncements on; EP	635
Wages, and prices; cycle of inflation; EP	535	Masaryk, Jan, and Thomas Garrigue. See Czechoslovakia		National labor relations board
La Guardia, Fiorello H., death. J. Lilly; S.	297	Massachusetts, petition for birth-control law amendment; EP	637	Denham, general counsel, plays god in NLRB employees' grievance case. P. Klein; S.	640
Laissez faire, Hazlitt book of advocacy. K. Hutchison; C.	699	Maurer, Alfred. C. Greenberg; A.	687
		Maurer, George
		Comments on "Socialism, communism, and the west" by M. Marshall; C.	349

Pages	Fact problem of administering Taft-Hart-	PAGE	Earl Warren — a likely dark horse. C.	PAGE
3	law; E.	3	McWilliams; S.	581
269	Lewis opposes A. F. of L. surrender to ruling on anti-communist affidavit; EP.	269	Eisenhower build-up. R. Bendiner; S.	218, 435
279	National student federation, C. Farrar; S.	279	For show Democrats' chances improving; EP.	241
	Navajos. See Indians, American		Progressive Citizens of America decision to name ticket; EP.	693
	Negroes		Republican ebb tide. R. Bendiner; S.	611
644	At door of U. N.; A. G. Mezerik; S.	644	State, the. See Bendiner, R. Bendiner; S.	611
	Discrimination against; Chicago fire and shooting; Hickman-Coleman case. H. A. Jack; S.	690	Taft, rumor, and Eisenhower. R. Bendiner; S.	435
326	Gary school strike. F. L. Klein; S.	326	Wallace, H. A.; indecision of. R. Bendiner; S.	668
	In South Africa. M. S. Comay; S.	305; C.	Wallace, on the west. C. McWilliams; S.	668
458	"Jim Crowism" in Metropolitan Life housing projects legal; EP.	517	President's committee on civil rights. See Civil rights
330	NAAACP plans legal test of the "white primary" laws in force in several southern states. R. Bendiner; S.	330	Prices. See Business
	Near race-riot at Chicago's Fernwood housing project. H. A. Jack; S.	551	Profiteering. See Meyers, Bennett H.
	Correction.	458; see also	Prisoners. See Committee to aid convicts
551	Race bias in housing. C. Abrams; S.	551	Profits. K. Hutchison; S.	532
	Rankin, J. E., opposes federal measure banning race segregation in national cemeteries; EP.	298	Progressive; suspends publication; EP.	397
326	St. Louis school strike; EP.	326	Progressive Citizens of America and Wallace. R. Bendiner; S.	668
	Urges freedom for white men in south. M. H. Tyne; C.	267	Decision to name third-party ticket; EP.	693
	Nenni, H. Bonawit; S.	650	Holds forum on cultural freedom and civil liberties; EP.	459
	Netherlands		Proportional representation; retention at stake in several municipal elections. G. H. Hallett; J. R.	473
124	Hornets' nest in Indonesia. C. Wolf, Jr.; S.	124	Psychoanalysis; Monsignor Sheen versus Catholic psychiatrists; E.	115
133	United Nations cease-fire in Indonesia; EP.	133	Public domain. See Lands, public
	Neuberger, Richard L.		Public finance. See Finance, public
91	Alaska arms again; S.	91	Public schools. See Education
254	Alaska's native minority fights racial discrimination. S.	254	Puerto Rico; citizenship problems. Dr. E. Vera; C.	267
486	Fish and politics; S.	486	Pyramid group of artists. C. Greenberg; A.	686
673	Save the public domain; S.	673
303	Tribal town; S.	303
129	Who was Bonawit? S.	129
514	New Orleans. J. Agee; MP.	514
475	New Statesman and Nation, The, exchange for The Nation. R. T. Howell; G. H. Hallett; S.	475
512	New York City opera company. B. H. Haggins; M.	512
636	New York Herald Tribune, Hextipax opinion on Committee on un-American activities; EP.	636
461	New York state: three housing amendments before voters; EP.	461
430	New York university; Washington Square site for law school opposed. B. Worthington; C.	430
664	New York World Telegram; attack on B. J. Stern; EP.	664
	Newspapers
266	Courtesy or truth between editors? E. Anderson; C.	266
486	Newspaper control through postal laws. I. H. Flamm; C.	486
98	Nichols, Osgood	98
69	Coal's inflationary balloon; S.	69
695	Nikolaides, George, and J. Klass	695
695	Nineteen hundred and forty-eight, outlook for; E. Schloss; Ct.	695
558	Notes by the way; articles by M. Marshall	558
	O
79	Odd man out. J. Agee; MP.	79
	Oil
358	American reserves. I. F. Stone; S.	358
4	And Palestine. F. Kirchwey; S.	4
459	Iran rejects demand for Russian concession in Azerbaijan; EP.	459
355	Power politics in middle east spells war. H. J. Laski; S.	355
358	What price Arab oil? I. F. Stone; S.	358
414	On pilots who destroyed Germany in spring of 1945. S. Spender; P.	414
639	Optimists, the. E. Schloss; Ct.	639
520	Oregon, deaths by accident of Governor Snell, Secretary of state Farrell, and President Truman. R. Bendiner; S.	520
689	Organizations, liberal; list of dangerous designations. W. Maslow; C.	689
541	Ortega y Gasset, Jose, quoted on unity of Europe. E. Anderson; C.	541
	Osinaki
295	Comments on "Socialism, communism, and the west" by M. Marshall; C.	295
	Outlook for 1948; E. Schloss; Ct.	695
	P
	P. R. See Proportional representation
193	Padway, Joseph; AFL attorney assaulted by counsel for House subcommittee; EP.	193
	Pakistan
196	Admitted to United Nations. F. Kirchwey; S.	196
175	Grapples with freedom. S. Rao; S.	175
647	New republic of Jinnah. A. Roth; S.	647
38	Referendums on partition. S. Rao; S.	38
271	Sikh-Moslem communal strife. A. Roth; S.	271
	Pakistan
353	And oil. F. Kirchwey; S.	353
439	And the middle east; E.	439
434	And world peace. S. Welles; S.	434
484	Arab case, the.	484
434	Britain announces willingness to relinquish mandate. F. Kirchwey; S.	434
242	British attack and turn back refugee ship, Exodus 1947; EP

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Rukseyer, Muriel		Victory on, in the United Nations assembly;		Teller, J. L.
Seeks material on life of F. Boas; C.....	240	J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	557; EP.....	Inside Arab politics; S.....	364; see also C.....
Rupp, Franz, B. H. Haggin; M.....	511	Spender, Stephen		Theater. See Krutch, J. W., for reviews
Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics		On the pilots who destroyed Germany in		Third party. See Progressive Citizens of
Rustin, Bayard. See Dellinger, D.		the spring of 1945; P.....	414	America
Ryder, Albert Finkham. C. Greenberg; A.....	539	Spiegel, Edward		This time tomorrow; D.....	568
Ryder, Mildred		Statute forbids race discrimination in Massa-		Thomas, R. J. See United automobile workers
"Free speech" in Philadelphia; C.....	605	chusetts; C.....	82	Thomas committee. See un-American activities,
		Standard, living. See Cost of living		committee on
		Stassen, Harold E.		Thunderbolts, J. Agee; MP.....	209
S		Courted by Taft as running mate. R. Ben-		Disillusion; condemnation by F. Sullivan of
Sacco and Vanzetti; twentieth anniversary; F.		diner; S.....	435	Blanshard articles	661
Kirchwey, S.....	173	The what-is-it? R. Bendiner; S.....	611	To live in peace. J. Agee; MP.....	655
Sanders, Sol W., and R. Nelson		State department. See United States — State		Today's world; new magazine launched by
Viet Nam celebration; C.....	296	department		H. Fish, R. Bendiner; S.....	330
Santo Domingo. See Dominican republic		Steel, manufacturers seek price boost; E.....	59;	Tompkins, Father, L. Lania; S.....	202
Sartre, Jean-Paul		98; EP.....	134; EP.....	Torment, J. Agee; MP.....	209
Americans and their myths; S.....	402	Stennis, John C., election as senator from		Trade. See Business
Sawyer, Thomas. See Dominican republic		Mississippi; EP.....	516	Trade agreements
Scherman, Thomas, B. H. Haggin; M.....	631	Stern, Bernard J., attack on; EP.....	665	Draft charter of International trade organi-
Schiller, Albert		Sternberg, Fritz		zation; EP.....	193
Tree for Frederic W. Goudy, a; C.....	152	Battle of the Ruhr, the; S.....	158	European customs union. K. Hutchison;
Schloss, Ezekiel (cartoons)		Prosperity — how long will it last? S.....	307	S.....	383; 411
Comintern and anti-comintern stores.....	332	Stevens, Wallace		Trujillo, President. See Dominican republic
Handle with care.....	274	Beginning, the; P.....	412	Truman, Harry S.
No exit.....	62	Stewart, Maxwell S.		Administration
Optimists, the.....	639	Record in Japan; S.....	95; EP.....	Dissent. See Democrats return to fold for
Outlook for 1948.....	695	Wedemeyer report on China, the; S.....	277	1948. R. Bendiner; S.....	218
Progress, 1932-1847.....	519	Stockman, Lowell; Oregon Republican opposes		Housing and rent act signed, message
Seymour's edge, the.....	157	Bonneville power administration budget;		attacks it; E.....	31
Seventeenth guest, the.....	125	EP.....	176	Message on inflation; EP.....	608; E.....
Too many cooks.....	575	Stocks; Chicago board of trade issues new		Tolls slow popularity rising slowly; EP.....	241
World serious.....	332	ruling on grain margins. K. Hutchison;		Rejects return to rationing and price-con-
Schoenfeld, Howard		S.....	338; EP.....	trol as "police-state" methods. I. F.
Conscientious objectors on strike; S.....	407	Stone, I. F.		Stone; S.....	436
Schools. See Education		Committee on un-American activities; grand		Should call special session of Congress on
Schwab, Armand, Jr.		inquisition; S.....	492; EP.....	European relief; E.....	371; E.....
Switzerland; neutrality pays off; S.....	406	European recovery program in congress;		E.....	244; 461
Science		G.....	696	Veto of the National science foundation a Campaign to discredit civilian scientists and		G. O. P. discovers poverty; S.....	576	blunder. L. Engel; S.....	275; C.....
return research to army. L. Engel;		Is the constitution un-American? S.....	223	Veto of wool price-support bill; EP.....	1
L. Engel; S.....	117; 275	Mr. Truman's police state; S.....	436	Truman doctrine. See Greece
Case for a national science foundation, the		Scarcity preferred; aid to Europe; S.....	613	Trusts. See Monopolies
L. Engel; S.....	275; C.....	What price Arab oil? S.....	358	Tsaldaris, Constantin. See Greece
Scope of biological warfare. L. Engel; S.....	93	Witch-hunt in Washington; case of Marzani		Turner, W. J., music critic. B. H. Haggin; M.....	25
United States to make radio invites avail-		S.....	33	Twain, Mark, on loyalty. W. R. Browne; C.....	689 able for research abroad; E.....	243	Storeh, Phil A. See Pennsylvania		Tynes, Morris H.
Scott, Reverend Michael; fight for South		Stratton, Bill. See Displaced persons		Time to free white men in south; C.....	267
African natives; S.....	500	Stravinsky, I. by B. H. Haggin; M.....	512
Sears Roebuck, R. Jarrell;		Street car named desire, a. J. W. Krutch; D.....	686
Secret life of Walter Miller, the J. Agee; MP		Strikes. See Labor
Sexual code, Catholic. See Roman catholic		Strong, Hugh church		Comments on "Fish and politics" by R. L.
Shahn, Ben, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	481	Neuberger; C. 456; see 199; C. 351; C.....	352
Sheen, Monsignor Fulton J.; attacks psycho-		Stuyvesant town excludes Negroes. C. Abrams; analysts; E.....	115	S.....	67; EP.....
Sheppard, A. W.		Sudan. See Egypt
Grievous mission in Greece; only chance;		Sugar; new bill. K. Hutchison; S.....	126
S.....	616	Sullivan, Frank
Sherbinin, Michael J. de		Condemnation of Blanshard articles.....	661
Planning without headlines; cooperation in		Sultan, Greta, B. H. Haggin; M.....	631
Europe; S.....	701	Summer, L. Colin
Shipbuilding workers. See Labor — Strikes		Comments on "Socialism, communism, and Shipping; American ships under foreign regis-		the west" by Marshall; C.....	350; see
try. M. Barker; S.....	444	Supreme Court, United States.....	246
Shoesline, J. Agee; MP.....	264, 390	Decides to review two state court decisions
Shoshone, Little		upholding restrictive covenants; EP.....	58
Palestine fight — inside story; S.....	675	Justice Jackson urges ruling on divorce
Palestine; rule by riot; S.....	156, 182	law; S.....	432
Siepmann, Charles A.		Sutherland, William. See Dellinger, D.
National association of broadcasters issues		Sutton, Horace radio. S.....	312	Later summer in the parks; S.....	100
Radio growing up; S.....	697	Vacation in Bermuda; S.....	285
Radio: tool of reactionaries; S.....	15; C.....	Swinging the muses. J. Agee; MP.....	209
Simpson, Frank		Switzerland; neutrality pays off. A. Schwab,
What to do about labor laws; C.....	323	Jr.; S.....	406
Sixteen-nation conference. See Paris conference
Smart, Mary, and Muriel Fox
Control of musicians; S.....	670
Snell, Earl. See Oregon
Social security
Aid to dependent children. G. Laue; S.....	381
Taft opposes new legislation; E.....	299
Socialism; international conference, Antwerp.
J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	650
South, the Kentucky's 1947 new deal. A. G. Mezerik;
S.....	40
Time to free white men of the south. M. H.
Tynes; S.....	267
South, Africa
Liberation, limited. J. K. Gordon; S.....	500
Race politics. M. S. Comay; S.....	305; C.....
South America. See Latin America
Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Spain
Executions protested by British members of parliament. K. Boyle; C.....	110
Franco's plebiscite on law of succession;
29
Has two faces. K. Boyle; S.....	35
Impressions of an American student. J.
Bayleton; C.....	294
Isabella's trial. K. Boyle; C.....	393
Refugees from, in Oregon. K. Cronin; C.....	700
Jobs government in exile resign; E.....	155
Need for U.N. action; EP.....	29; C.....
EP.....	270; 410
Underground communists announce first open battle with government troops; EP.....	325

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Unions, labor. See Labor		Problem of displaced persons; EP.....	29	W
United automobile workers		Russia most conciliatory. J. Alvarez del	557	WOR drops M. Lerner as news commentator;	271
Charges in election fight between Reuther		Vayo; S.....	372	EP..... and Thomas factions; EP.....	298	Security council seat contested by India	372	Wages. See Labor Rejects merger with farm equipment work-		and Ukraine. J. K. Gordon; S.....	372	Wakefield, Eva Ingersoll
ers; E.....	87	Spanish case, the; EP.....239; C.....	573	R. G. Ingersoll memorial association
Reuther, W., suggested as running mate for		EP.....270; 410; 557; EP.....	457	founded; C.....	295
Taft. R. Bendiner; S.....	435	Vetoes and other tools. F. Kirchwey; S	457	Wall street tax plans. K. Hutchison; S.....	558
Reuther, W., victory at convention; EP.....	544	196; 219; E.....244; 300; 301; C.....	400	Wallace, Henry A.
Thomas, R. J., loses seat as a vice-president		Vishinsky versus Marshall. J. K. Gordon;	457	And the coming campaign. R. Bendiner; S	668 of C.I.O.; EP.....	433	S.....301; 373;	29	Progressive Citizens of America decision to
United mine workers		Who's a warmonger? J. K. Gordon; S.....	641	name ticket in 1948; E.....	693
Contract negotiations will test Taft-Hartley		United nations relief and rehabilitation admin-	641	Splits California Democrats. C. McWil-law. A. Friendly; S.....9; EP.....1;		istration; its work comes to end; EP.....	29	liams; S.....	6
E.....31; E.....61; 98		United States	641	Walstein, Leonard M., Jr.
"Disaffiliated" by J. L. Lewis; EP.....	664	America — 1947. H. J. Laski; S.....	641	Justice in the army; S.....	71
United nations		And China:		War, cold; EP.....	487
Atomic progress report; E.....135;		State department reported considering new	433	War crimes; trial of I. G. Farben execu-
EP.....213; 373		loan; E.....	433	tives; EP.....	213
Box score. J. K. Gordon; S.....	584	Wedemeyer report. M. S. Stewart; S	433	Warren, Earl. C. McWilliams; S.....	581
Economic commission should administer		277; E.....	433	Washington Square site for New York uni-
Marshall plan; EP.....1;	145	And Great Britain:		versity law school opposed. B. Worthing-
General assembly, wind-up. J. K. Gordon;		Knox gold; EP.....	241	ton; C.....	430
S.....	619	British import tax on American films;		Wayne, L. G.
Greek border dispute:		E.....154; E.....	176	California versus Brink family; C.....296;
Balkan commission submits report; EP.....	30	British dollar crisis, the; E.....154;	442	Wedemeyer, Lt. Gen. Albert Coady. See	176
Permanent international border commis-		EP.....193; 197; 215; 221;	246	United States — And China
sion recommended; EP. 57; EP. 113;		Socialism, communism, and the west.		Welch grape juice company. K. Hutchison;
EP.....133; 200; 219; E.....244;		M. Marshall; S.....	373	S.....	472
EP.....269; 301; 331; 372; 400		And the Soviet Union:		Welles, Sumner
Soviets veto Australian compromise pro-		What keeps them apart? J. E. Johnson;	373	Palestine and world peace; S.....439; E.....	434
posal. F. Kirchwey; S.....	196	S.....		Werth, Alexander
Spaak, P. H., demands speedy settlement		Army:		Poland today:
J. K. Gordon; S.....	372	Bans showing of "All my sons" in Ger-	176	1. Reconstruction and progress; S.....	137
United States agrees to drop guilt charge		many, Austria, and Japan; EP.....	266	2. Trade and planning; S.....	181 against Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Al-		Collins, Lt. Gen. J. L., rumored as pos-	71	3. Foreign and domestic politics; S.....	226
bania; EP.....	367; 372	sible successor to Eisenhower. H. W.	59	4. New lands, the; S.....	308
Indonesian case; EP.....133; 196; 219		Kelley; C.....	33	Return to Russia; S.....	553
Issues before the General assembly; E.....	244	Report of Vanderbilt committee on mili-	91	Russia and Britain; S.....	678
Italian treaty revision opposed by Vishin-		tary justice. L. M. Wallstein, Jr.; S.....	690	Comments on "Socialism, communism, and sky. J. K. Gordon; S.....	331	Economic outlook, the; E.....		the west" by M. Marshall; C.....350; see	246
Leases apartments from Metropolitan Life		Military preparations in Alaska. R. L.		Wilson, Charles E.; report as chairman of
for its white employees. J. Tallmer; S.....	90	Neuberger; S.....		President's committee on civil rights
Little assembly. F. Kirchwey; S.....300;		State department; Marzani case. I. F. Stone;		Winant, John G., death. L. Brown; S.....	521
301; 400; 438		S.....		Winslow boy, the. J. W. Krutch; D.....	537
Masaryk, J., urges east-west cooperation. J.		United youth of America. J. Klass and G.		Wolf, Charles, Jr.
K. Gordon; S.....	301	Nickolaides; C.....		Hornets' nest in Indonesia; S.....	124
Adoption of modified proposal. J. K.				Wolfson, Martin
Gordon; S.....	531			Hesiod on parasitism; C.....	190
Negroes at U. N.'s door. A. G. Mezerik;				Woman on the beach, the. J. Agee; MP.....	209
S.....	644			Wool; Truman vetoes price-support bill; EP
New members; EP.....153; 196				World bank. See International bank for re-
Palestine:				construction and development.
Arab case, C. Issawi; C.....	484			Worthington, Beatrice
Britain announces willingness to relin-				Opposes Washington Square site for New quish mandate. F. Kirchwey; S.....328;				York university law school; C.....	430
331; E.....	434
Disorders following partition decision.
EP.....	635
UNSCOP's report; E.....216; 219;
EP.....242; E.....244; E.....353; 355;
EP.....367; E.....399; 439; EP.....	460
United States and Soviet Union both back partition. J. K. Gordon; S.....400;
E.....	399; E.....
Vote for partition. F. Kirchwey; S.....	610
Watch Mr. Marshall. F. Kirchwey; S.....	372
328; EP.....269; EP.....	372
Plans for permanent headquarters. T. J.
Hamilton; S.....	219

V

Y

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

- B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- A. P. Giannini: Giant in the west. A biography. J. Dana; B. 317
Abigail Adams. J. Whitney; B. 416
Abinger harvest. E. M. Forster; B. 598
Across the wide Missouri. B. DeVoto; B. 602
Adams, Abigail, biography. J. Whitney; B. 416
Adams, Brooks
America's economic supremacy. With a new evaluation by M. W. Childs; B. 421
Adams, Mildred; R. 406, 451
Administrative behavior. Study of decision-making processes in administrative organization. A. H. A. Simon; B. 478
Affelder, Paul
How to build a record library; R. 566
Age of anxiety, the. W. H. Auden; B. 424
Age of reason, the. J.-P. Sartre. Translated by E. Sutton; B. 146
Alain-Fournier, Henri
Vanderer, the (Le Grand Meaulnes). Translated by F. Delisle; B. 207
Alexandra, G. Schmitt; B. 533
Amberg, George
Art in modern ballet; B. 264
Ambruster, Howard W.
Comments on E. M. Forster's review of his book, "Treasure's peace"; C. 191
America's economic supremacy. B. Adams. With a new evaluation by M. W. Childs; B. 421
America's needs and resources. A Twentieth-century fund survey which includes estimates for 1950 and 1960. J. F. Dewhurst and others; B. 287
American farmer, the. L. Fryer; B. 206
American radio, the. L. White; B. 260
Amory, Cleveland
Proper Bostonians, the; B. 624
Anderson, Maxwell
Off Broadway: Essays about the theater; B. 207
Appreciation: Painting, poetry, and prose. L. Stein; B. 261
Art in modern ballet. G. Amberg; B. 264
Arvin, Newton; R. 418
Assault, the. A. R. Matthews; B. 450
Aths, Daphne
Weather of the heart, the; B. 50
Atkinson, Oriana
Over at Uncle Joe's: Moscow and me; B. 107
Atlantic harvest. Memoirs of the Atlantic. Compiled by E. Sedgwick; B. 418
Atkinson, the million. M. L. Edinoff and H. Ruchlis; B. 263
Auden, W. H.
Age of anxiety, the; B. 424
Axe of Wandsbeck, The. A. Zweig. Translated by E. Sutton; B. 596

B

- Baldwin, James; R. 78
Balkans, the: frontier of two worlds. W. B. King and F. O'Brien; B. 104
Barea, Arturo
Fong of a rebel, the; B. 76
Barker, George
Love poems; B. 288
Barrett, William
What is existentialism? B. 449
Barrie, J. M., letters of. Edited by V. Meynell; B. 508
Bates, Ralph; R. 76, 319, 341, 388, 450, 479, 566
Baudelaire, Charles
One hundred poems from Les fleurs du mal. Translated by C. F. MacIntyre; B. 232 Baudelaire, Rimbaud, Verlaine (Selected verse and prose poems). Edited with an introduction by J. M. Bernstein; B. 232
Bazelon, David T.; R. 148
Beethoven, quartets of. D. G. Mason; B. 562
Béguin, Albert
Léon Bloy: A study in impatience; B. 262
Bemmelans, Ludwig
Dirty Eddie; B. 205
Benedict, Agnes E.; R. 148
Benedict, Ruth; R. 507
Bendiner, Robert; R. 507
Bernstein, David
Philippine story, the; B. 451
Betjeeman, John
Sick but not streamlined. Poems and short pieces selected by W. H. Auden; B. 316
Bill, Alfred Hoy
Rehearsal for conflict; B. 534
Blanc-Ross, René; R. 207, 232, 478

PAGE

- Blanshard, Paul
Democracy and empire in the Caribbean; B. 385
Bloy, Léon
Pilgrim of the absolute. Selections by R. Maritain; B. 170
Bloy, Léon, biography. A. Béguin; B. 262
Bogan, Louise; R. 412
Bolles, Blair; R. 448
Bolté, Charles G.; R. 167
Books of 1947; selected list. 632, 657
Bower, Anthony; R. 19, 261, 508
Boyer, Richard O.
Dark ship, the; B. 147
Bratoy, Bjarne; R. 478, 534, 603, 652
Brazilians, the. H. Tavares de Sá; B. 479
Brebner, J. B.; R. 706
Bretton, André
Young cherry trees secured against hares; B. 50
Brod, Max
Franz Kafka: A biography; B. 47
Brooks, Van Wyck
Diary of a visit to England in 1775. Newly edited from the MS by J. L. Clifford; B. 292
Brown, Alan Willard
Metaphysical society, the: Victorian minds in crisis, 1869-1880; B. 315
Brown, W. Norman; R. 452
Buchler, Eustus; R. 449
Buckley, James F.
Speaking frankly; B. 448
C
California gold. R. W. Paul; B. 386
Campbell, Dr. Thomas
Diary of a visit to England in 1775. Newly edited from the MS by J. L. Clifford; B. 292
Canada: A political and social history. E. McInnis; B. 706
Central planning and control in war and peace. Sir Oliver Frank; B. 447
Cervantes "Don Quixote" and the novel. P. Salinas; B. 682
Chamberlain, Henriqueta
Where the Sabia sings. Sketches by K. Chamberlain; B. 48
Children of the Cumberland. C. Lewis; B. 148
Choice of English romantic poetry, a. Edited with an introduction by S. Spender; B. 129
City of women, the. R. Landes; B. 128
Clare, Evans; R. 48
Coale, Ansley J.
Problems of reducing vulnerability to atomic bombs, the; B. 263
Cold war, the. W. Lippmann; B. 652
Coleman, McAllister; R. 706
Collected tales of E. M. Forster; B. 160
Collis, Maurice
Foreign mud. Being an account of the opium imbroglio at Canton in the 1830's and the Anglo-Chinese war that followed; B. 388
Comant, James B.
On understanding science. An historical approach; B. 169
Compton, Ralph
Future of freedom in the Orient, the; B. 127
Conrad, E. M.
Jim Crow America; B. 20
Consider the lilies of the field. E. Verissimo. Translated by S. Putnam; B. 106
Continent in limbo. E. Sulkin; B. 534
Cooperative challenge, the. B. B. Fowler; B. 205
Corbière, Tristan
Poems. Translated by W. McElroy; B. 424
Counts, George S.; R. 626
Cox, Sidney
Indirections for those who want to write; B. 167
Croft-Cooke, Rupert
Miss Allick; B. 22
Cuban counterpoint: Tobacco and sugar. F. Ortiz; B. 535
Cultural approach, the: Another way in international relations. R. E. McMurry and M. Lee; B. 260
D
Dana, Julian
A. P. Giannini: Giant in the west. A biography. J. Dana; B. 317
Danger from the east. R. E. Lauterbach; B. 600
Dangerefeld, Royden, and D. L. Gordon
Hidden weapon, the; B. 107
Dark ship, the. R. O. Boyer; B. 147
Davidson, David
Steeper cliff, the; B. 188
Dean, Vera Michele
The United States and Russia; B. 603
De Guingand, Major General Sir Francis
Operation victory; B. 319
Democracy and empire in the Caribbean. P. Blanshard; B. 385
Denby, Edwin; R. 566
Dent, Edward J.
Mozart's opera; B. 561
Design for aggression. The inside story of Hitler's war plans. P. de Mendelssohn; B. 187
DeVoto, Bernard
Across the wide Missouri; B. 602

PAGE

- Dewhurst, J. Frederic, and others
America's needs and resources. A Twentieth-century fund survey which includes estimates for 1950 and 1960; B. 287
Dirty Eddie. L. Bemmelans; B. 205
Dr. Campbell's diary of a visit to England in 1775. Newly edited from the MS by J. L. Clifford; B. 292
"Don Quixote" and the novel. P. Salinas. 682
Dostoevsky, A study. J. Lavrin; B. 22
Doughty, Howard, Jr.; R. 595
Douglass, Frederick, autobiography. S. Graham; B. 78
Downs, Brian W.
Ibsen: The intellectual background; B. 186
Dupee, F. W.; R. 477, 685
E
Eagle on the plain, the. V. Wolfson; B. 188
Edman, Irwin; R. 103
Eidinoff, Maxwell Leigh, and H. Ruchlis
Atomics for the million; B. 263
End of a Berlin diary. W. L. Shirer; B. 341
Engel, Leonard, and E. S. Filler
World aflame; B. 208
Europe without Baedeker. E. Wilson; B. 592
Existentialism. J.-P. Sartre. Translated by B. Frechtman; B. 449
F
Fairbank, John K.; R. 127, 422, 600
Farrell, Charles B.; R. 168
Fausset, Hugh L'Anson
Poets and pundits. A collection of essays; B. 208
Feuchtwanger, Lion
Froud destiny; B. 348
Field family, "The Marshall Fields." J. Tebbi; B. 536
Fine of 200 francs, a. E. Triolet; B. 478
Fischer, Louis
Cathari and Stalin; B. 625
Five prose pieces. Translated by C. Niemeyer from Volume IV of the "Gesammelte Werke" of R. M. Rilke; B. 108
Flynn, Edward J.
You're the boss; B. 417
Foner, Philip S.
History of the labor movement in the United States; B. 290
Footnotes on nature. J. Kiernan. Wood engravings by N. S. Unwin; B. 234
Foreign mud. Being an account of the opium imbroglio at Canton in the 1830's and the Anglo-Chinese war that followed. M. Collis; B. 388
Fong of a rebel, the. A. Barea; B. 76
Forster, E. M.
Abinger harvest; B. 598
Collected tales; B. 160
Fowler, Bertram B.
Cooperative challenge, the; B. 205
Frank, Sir Oliver
Central planning and control in war and peace; B. 447
Franz Kafka: A biography. M. Brod; B. 47
Freedom of the movies. R. A. Inglis; B. 148
From Caligari to Hitler. Psychological history of the German film. S. Kracauer; B. 104
Frost, Robert. R. Jarrell. 588
Fryer, Lee
American farmer, the; B. 206
Future of freedom in the Orient, the. R. Compton; B. 127
G
Gamov, George
One two three... infinity; B. 479
Gandhi and Stalin. L. Fischer; B. 626
García Lorca, Federico
Three tragedies; B. 705
Geissman, Berta
Two worlds of music; B. 264
Geneva. Cymbeline refurnished, and good King Charles. B. Shaw; B. 388
Georgics of Virgil, the. Translated by C. D. Lewis; B. 152
Giannini, A. P., biography. J. Dana; B. 317
Gide, André
Journals. Volume I: 1889-1913. Translated, with an introduction and notes, by J. O'Brien; B. 412
Gilbert, G. M.
Nuremberg diary; B. 231
Gordon, David L., and R. Dangerefeld
Hidden weapon, the; B. 107
Graham, Shirley
There was once a slave. The heroic story of Frederick Douglass; B. 78
Great snow, the. H. M. Robinson; B. 22
Greek plays in modern translation. Edited with an introduction by D. Fitts; B. 423
Guam and its people. L. Thompson; B. 109
Guérard, Albert; R. 128, 170, 231, 256, 596
Guide to recorded music. I. Kolodin; B. 293

H	PAGE	L	PAGE	M	PAGE	N	PAGE	O	PAGE	P	PAGE	Q	PAGE	R	PAGE
Hacker, Louis M.		Lament for the sleepwalker. D. Thompson; B.	288	Major trends in Jewish mysticism. G. G.	319	Mosier, Richard D.	706	O'Brien, Frank, and W. B. King	104	Parkman, Francis, the journals of. Edited by	595	Quartets of Beethoven, the. D. G. Mason; B.	562	Ramus, C.F.	533
Shaping of the American tradition, the.		Landes, Ruth		Making of yesterday, the: The diaries of		Moss, Howard	79	Or Broadway: Essays about the theater. M.	207	M. Wade; B.	595	When the mountain fell; B.	533	Randall, J. G.	509
Documents edited by L. M. Hacker and		City of women, the; B.	128	Raoul de Roussy de Sales; B.	705	Muller, Herbert J.	287	Anderson; B.	207	On music and musicians. R. Schumann. Edited	168	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
H. E. Zahler. Two volumes; B.	342	Last days of Hitler, the. H. R. Trevor-Roper;		Making the American mind. R. D. Mosier; B.	706	Thomas Wolfe; B.	652	On	168	K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Haggin, B. H.; R. 171, 189, 211, 237, 264, 293, 561		Lauterbach, Richard E.	600	Man in the divided sea, a. T. Merton; B.	50	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Haldane, J. B. S.		Danger from the east; B.	600	Many and the few, the. H. Kraus; B.	147	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Science advances; B.	318	Lavrin, Janko	22	March of freedom, the. W. H. Hale; B.	149	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hale, William Harlan		Dostoevsky; A study; B.	22	Marshall, Margaret; R.	166	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
March of freedom, the; B.	149	Lazarus, H. P.; R.	129, 288, 598	Marshall Fields, the: A study in wealth.	536	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hamilton, Thomas J.; R.	187, 624	Lee, Muna, and R. E. McMurtry		McNeill, William H.; R.	104	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Harder they fall, the. B. Schulberg; B.	236	Cultural approach, the: Another way in		McWilliams, Carey; R.	20, 234	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hardwick, Elizabeth; R.	652	international relations; B.	260	Melville, Herman, and W. Whitman. The	598	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Harrow, Benjamin; R. 108, 169, 208, 263, 318, 479		Lehrman, Hal	683	Melms of Van Wyck Brooks; B.	598	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hazlitt, Henry		Leichtentritt, Hugo		Mendelssohn, Peter de		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Will dollars save the world? B.	699	Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston symphony		Design for aggression. The inside story of		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Heden, Worth T. Tuttle		orchestra, and the new American music; B.	211	Merton, Thomas		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Other room, the; B.	188	Léon Bloy: A study in impatience. A. Béguin;		Man in the divided sea, a; B.	50	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hegeudus, Adam de		B.	262	Metaphysical society, the: Victorian minds in		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Patriotism or peace? B.	166	Letters of Edwin Arlington Robinson to Harry		crisis, 1869-1880. A. W. Brown; B.	315	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hennissart, Paul; R.	102	Forest Smith (1890-1905). Edited by Viola		Missouri valley, land of drought, flood, and	419	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Henry the navigator, E. Saneau; B.	229	Denham Sutcliffe; B.	506	promise. R. Kernal; B.	50	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Herbst, Josephine		Letters of J. M. Barrie. Edited by Viola		Montgomery; A biography. A. Moorehead; B.	49	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Somewhere the tempest fell; B.	653	Shaw; J. B.	559	Moore, Bucklin		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Heretics, the. H. Slater; B.	452	Levin, Jack, and E. Kefauver		High cost of prejudice, the; B.	234	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hidden danger, the. J. Stern; B.	19	Twentieth-century congress, a; B.	105	Moore, Harriet, and H. G. Pratt		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hidden weapon, the. D. L. Gordon and R.		Lewis, Claudia		Russia. A short history; B.	188	Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Dangerfield; B.	107	Children of the Cumberland; J. G. Randall;	148	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
High cost of prejudice, the. B. Moon; B.	234	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;	509	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hill, Russell; R.	684	Link, Arthur S.		Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
History of the labor movement in the United		Wilson: Road to the White House; B.	49	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
States. Adolph, last days. H. R. Trevor-Roper;		Lippmann, Walter		Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
B.	287	Cold war, the; B.	653	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hobson, Wilder; R.	565	Origin of things, the; B.	320	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Horace: A portrait. A. Noyes; B.	19	List, selected, of books of 1947.	632, 657	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
House of sleep, the. A. Kavan; B.	291	London music in 1888-89 as heard by Cornu		Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
How to build a record library. P. Affelder; B.	566	d' Bassetto later known as Bernard	559	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Howe, Irving; R.	47, 205, 316, 348	Shaw; J. B.	559	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Humphries, Rolfe; R. 19. see correction. 152;		Lorca, Federico Garcia		Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
108, 208, 316, 423, 686, 705		Three tragedies; B.	705	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
Hutchison, Keith; R.	49, 107, 109, 149, 188, 205, 320, 342, 386, 421, 447, 534, 699	Love poems. G. Barker; B.	288	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
		Lubbock, Percy	508	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
		Portrait of Edith Wharton; B.	508	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
		Lurie, Samuel		Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
		Private investment in a controlled economy:		Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
		Germany, 1933-1939; B.	149	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
		Lynd, Helen M.; R.	315	Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On	168	by K. Wolff. Translated by P. Rosenfeld;	169	Lincoln the liberal statesman; J. G. Randall;
				Moorehead, Alan		Musical	559	On</

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Read, Herbert	Slocum, William J.	Two worlds of music. B. Geissmar; B. 264
Innocent eye, the; B. 103	Reilly of the White House. As told to him	Tyler, Parker; R. 79
Rehearsal for conflict. A. H. Bill; B. 534	by M. F. Reilly; B. 417
Reilly of the White House. By M. F. Reilly	Smith, Moses
as told to W. J. Slocum; B. 417	Koussevitzky; B. 237	U
Report on the Germans. W. L. White; B. 76	Smyth, Dame Ethel
Revolt of Asia, the. R. Payne; B. 422	Impressions that remained; B. 171	United States, the, and Russia. V. M. Dean; B. 603
Richer by Asia. E. Taylor; B. 452	Somewhere the tempest fell. J. Herbst; B. 653	Untriangled stars. The letters of Edwin
Rilke, Rainer Maria	Soule, George; R. 287	Arlington Robinson to Harry de Forest
Five prose pieces. Translated by C. Nie-	Speaking frankly. J. F. Byrnes; B. 448	Smith (1890-1905). Edited by Denham
meyer from Volume IV of the "Gesam-	Spender, Stephen	Sutcliffe; B. 506
melte Werke"; B. 108	Poems of dedication; B. 288
Rilke's life of the Virgin Mary. Translated by	Spender, Stephen; R. 592	V
C. F. MacIntyre; B. 686	Spingarn, Jerome H.; R. 260
Robinson, Edwin Arlington	Steeper cliff, the. D. Davidson; B. 188	Vamberg, Rustem; R. 166
Letters to Harry de Forest Smith (1890-	Stein, Leo	Van Dusen, Henry P.; R. 319
1905). Edited by Denham Sutcliffe; B. 506	Appreciation: Painting, poetry, and prose;	Verdi. F. Toye; B. 189
Robinson, Henry Morton	B. 261	Verissimo, Eric
Great snow, the; B. 22	Stern, James	Consider the lilies of the field. Translated
Rorty, James, and N. P. Norman	Hidden damage, the; B. 19	by S. Putnam; B. 106
Tomorrow's food; B. 108	Story of architecture in Mexico, the. T. E.	Virgil: Georgics, the. Translated by C. D.
Rossini. F. Toye; B. 189	Sanford; B. 263	Lewis; B. 152
Roussot, David	Story of dance music, the. P. Netti; B. 566	View of the harbour, a. E. Taylor; B. 533
Other kingdom, the; B. 316	Sulkan, Edith	Virgin Mary, the, life of, by Rilke. Trans-
Roussy de Sales, Raoul de	Continent in limbo; B. 534	lated by C. F. MacIntyre; B. 686
Making of yesterday, the; Diaries; B. 704	Sullivan, Louis H.
Rushie, Hyman, and M. L. Eidinoff	Kindergarten chats and other writings.
Atomics for the million; B. 263	Edited by I. Athey; B. 128
Russia. A short history. H. G. Pratt and H.	Szigeti, Joseph	W
L. Moore; B. 188	With strings attached; B. 171
Russia's Europe. H. Lehrman; B. 683
S	T
Sales, Raoul de Roussy de	Taft, Philip; R. 290
Making of yesterday, the; Diaries; B. 704	Tavares de Sa, Hernane
Salinas, Pedro	Brazilians, the; B. 479
"Don Quixote" and the novel. 682	Taylor, Edmond
Salisbury, Harrison; R. 107	Richer by Asia; B. 452
Sanceau, Elaine	Taylor, Elizabeth
Henry the navigator; B. 109	View of the harbour, a. B. 533
Sanford, Trent E.	Tchaikovsky, the music of. Edited by G. Abra-
Story of architecture in Mexico, the; B. 263	ham; B. 189
Age of reason, the; B. 146	Tebbel, John
Existentialism. Translated by B. Frecht-	The Marshall Fields: A study in wealth; B. 536 man; B. 449	Terral, Rufus
Saxon charm, the. F. Wakeman; B. 452	Missouri valley, land of drought, flood, and
Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr.; R. 104	promise; B. 419
Schmitt, Gladys	Theme and variations. B. Walter; B. 171
Alexandra; B. 533	There and then. C. Weston; B. 188
Scholem, Gershom G.	There was once a slave. The heroic story of
Major trends in Jewish mysticism; B. 319	Frederick Douglass. S. Graham; B. 78
Schubert, the music of. Edited by G. Abra-	This is Pearl! The United States and Japan
ham; B. 189	— 1941. W. Millis; B. 624
Schulberg, Budd	Thomas, Alfred B.
Harder they fall, the; B. 236	Comments on C. A. Welsh's review of Schumann, Robert	"Treasure's peace" by H. Ambruster; C. 296
On music and musicians. Edited by K.	Thomas Wolfe, H. J. Muller; B. 652
Wolf; Translated by P. Rosenfeld; B. 168	Thompson, Dunstan
Science advances. J. B. S. Haldane; B. 318	Lament for the sleepwalker; B. 288
Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston symphony or-	Thompson, Laura chestra, and the new American music. H.	Guam and its people; B. 109
Leichtentritt; B. 211	Three tragedies of Federico Garcia Lorca; B. 705
Shaping of the American tradition, the. Text	Times of Melville and Whitman, the. Van by L. M. Hacker. Documents edited by	Wyck Brooks; B. 598
L. M. Hacker and H. E. Zahler. Two	Tomorrow's food. J. Rorty and N. P. Norman; volumes; B. 342	B. 108
Shaw, Bernard	Toor, Frances
Geneva, Cymbeline refinished, and good King	Treasury of Mexican folkways, a; B. 345
Charles; B. 388	Toscanini, Arturo. W. J. Turner. 559
London music in 1888-89 as heard by Corno	Toye, Francis di Bassetto later known as Bernard Shaw;	Rossini; B. 189
B. 559	Treasury of Mexican folkways, a. F. Toor; B. 345
Shirer, William L.	Trevor-Roper, H. R.
End of a Berlin diary; B. 341	Last days of Hitler, the; B. 287
Simon, Herbert A.	Trilling, Diana; R. 22, 50, 146, 188, 236,
Administrative behavior. Study of decision-	291, 388, 452, 533, 683
making processes in administrative organi-	Trilling, Lionel zation, a; B. 478	Middle of the journey, the; B. 413
Slater, Humphrey	Triplet, Elsa
Heretics, the; B. 452	Fine of 200 francs, a; B. 478
Stick but not streamlined. Poems and short	Turner, W. J.
pieces by J. Betjeman. Selected by W.	Arturo Toscanini
H. Auden; B. 316	Music: an introduction to its nature and appreciation; B. 559 Twentieth-century congress, a. E. Kefauver and J. Levin; B. 105

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 5, 1947

NUMBER 1

The Shape of Things

THE CONFUSED REPORTS OUT OF PARIS AS WE go to press make it difficult to assess the chances of full European cooperation on the Marshall plan. From the outset it has been evident that regardless of Russia's attitude the American government is determined to give large-scale assistance in the rebuilding of Western Europe. This explains the grudging American bid to Russia to participate and also the flagrant snubbing of the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, which meets this week in Geneva. It explains too the skeptical reception the plan received by the Moscow press, which viewed it, with some justification, as a wider statement of the Truman Doctrine. That Molotov is present in Paris at all is due to the French-British dread of a permanent East-West split and to the fact that both countries have already begun to build their economic bridges eastward. Moreover, the evident intention of a number of Russia's "satellites"—particularly Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Hungary—to keep their western avenues of trade open, may have made Russia hesitate to act on its first impulse and stay away. For Russia, as well as the eastern nations, will recover much more rapidly if it shares in an all-Europe effort than if it holds firmly to eastern regionalism. As for Western Europe, while it faces an immediate dearth of American dollars with which to buy American-made steel, machinery, textiles, and foodstuffs—a fact acutely disturbing to American exporters—it is also desperately short of coal, lumber, electric power, and fertilizers, all of them potentially abundant in the eastern countries. A coordinated plan for Europe, such as is already on the drafting boards of the Economic Commission headed by Gunnar Myrdal, should be precisely what Secretary Marshall is asking for. Russia might attempt to block such a plan; it could certainly curtail its application. But we should not be too hasty in writing off Russian cooperation, even in the face of a Molotov rebuff. After Paris, Geneva should be the next way station on the bumpy road to peace.

★

IN VETOING THE WOOL PRICE-SUPPORT BILL, the President rightly pointed out that its provisions contradicted the efforts which the government was making to bring about a lowering of trade barriers throughout the world. His action is said to have brought about an immediate improvement in atmosphere at the Geneva conference, where eighteen nations are attempting to agree on mutual tariff reductions and to lay the foundations for the International Trade Organization. Even so, it is to be feared that the reckless effort of Congress to add to the very stiff measure of protection already enjoyed by the wool growers will continue to hamper the Geneva negotiations, for it has shown that the Republicans, and not a few Democrats, continue to think in terms of Smoot-Hawleyism. In view of the possibility that within eighteen months a Republican Congress may be joined by a Republican Administration, that is a poor augury for future trade relations.

★

FACED WITH THE FACT THAT UNLESS QUICK action was taken, the wool growers would be left without any government support, the Senate meekly accepted the veto and promptly passed a new measure on lines that Mr. Truman had indicated would prove acceptable. It leaves out the objectionable import-fee and quota provisions and simply authorizes the government to continue the present price-support program and to sell surplus wool without restrictions. That is far from an ideal solution of the problem, but it would be anomalous to deprive the sheep herders of the kind of aid other farmers are receiving. If it is true (a) that native wool cannot compete with foreign even with the assistance of a thumping import duty, and (b) that a domestic wool supply is essential for national defense, then subsidization is justified. It may prove costly to us as taxpayers, but a tariff giving equivalent assistance to the wool growers would be a good deal more costly to us as consumers.

★

IT WOULD NOT BE FAIR TO BLAME THE COAL crisis entirely on the Taft-Hartley Act, for the probability of trouble in the mine fields when government seizure ended on June 30 has long been manifest. But it is certain that the act has seriously aggravated the crisis and that its provisions are calculated to prolong rather than end it. The walkout of more than half the nation's miners immediately after the Senate voted to override the President's veto seems to have been entirely spontaneous. If it was inspired by John L. Lewis he must have

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	1
President Ike	3
Holding the Bag	3
Oil and Palestine by Freda Kirchwey	4

ARTICLES

Wallace in the West by Carey McWilliams	6
Cartoon: Schizophrenia Americana by Ezekiel Schloss	8
COAL—a Test Case by Alfred Friendly	9
Revolution in Eastern Europe. II. A Regional Planned Economy by Constantine Poulos	11
A. V. C.'s Big Chance by Daniel James	14
Radio: Tool of the Reactionaries by Charles A. Siepmann	15
The Fascist Phoenix by Del Vayo	17
Everybody's Business: Divided Soothsayers by Keith Hutchison	18

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Romantic Survey by Anthony Bower	19
Vergil and Horace by Rolfe Humphries	19
Old Jim Crow by Carey McWilliams	20
Dostoevsky's Genius by Paul Henissart	22
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	22
Films by James Agee	23
Music by B. H. Haggin	25

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

26

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 218

by Jack Barrett	27
------------------------	----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor
J. King Gordon

Literary Editor
Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin
Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1978, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Price: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

operated by telepathy, and that is not a crime, though Representative Hartley, who assailed the miners' leader as "rebellious and mutinous," apparently wishes to make it one. In any case the past week's stoppage was of symbolical rather than practical importance, since it merely anticipated the holiday period. The real question is what will happen after July 7, when the miners' vacation ends, if the operators and the union have reached no agreement. In the event of an actual or threatened strike endangering the public interest, the President, under the new law, can appoint a board of inquiry. On receiving its report of the facts he can direct the Attorney General to petition the Federal Court for an injunction enjoining the strike for a maximum of eighty days. But supposing these steps are taken, on what terms are the men to be ordered back to the pits? Are they to be compelled to work without any contract, on any conditions their employers impose? Obviously, that would be "involuntary servitude." Can the court then order maintenance of the status quo? That would mean continuation of the contract made between the government and the U. M. W., which the operators have never approved. Moreover, some of its provisions would be illegal under the new act. It appears, therefore, that before the court could issue an injunction, it would itself have to dictate the terms of a temporary contract. This is an extraordinary situation, but as readers of Alfred Friendly's article on page 9 will realize, it is by no means the most bizarre feature of the Republican Party's successful effort to muddle and embitter labor relations.

★

NEXT SUNDAY GENERAL FRANCO WILL WIN the easiest battle of his career. Indeed, the plebiscite in which Spaniards are supposed to pronounce themselves for or against the Law of Succession was won by the dictator on the day it was announced. Staged to give an appearance of legality to an arbitrary and despotic measure, the plebiscite is as much of a farce as the Law of Succession itself. Little can be done by the anti-Franco majority to combat it. In several dispatches from Madrid, Sam Pope Brewer has reported in the New York Times the hesitation of the opposition parties to urge upon their followers the only possible expression of resistance: to stay away from the polls, leaving the show to Franco and his Falange. Though the official penalties for abstainers are light, the extra-official reprisals, as Mr. Brewer has pointed out, might be extremely serious. The plebiscite takes place during a period of terror that has made 1947 the worst year since Franco came to power. It is a question of conscience for the opposition leaders to expose a large part of the nation to new repressions. They might take this risk if the number of abstainers had any chance of being accurately recorded, but what would certainly happen is that non-voters would be punished while their repudiation of the Law of Succession and its infamous author would remain an official secret. The Nation therefore denounces the plebiscite in advance as a scandalous fake designed to hoodwink the world by providing a façade of false legality behind which the dictatorship can continue to make impudent grimaces at the United Nations, whose resolution of censure has so miserably miscarried.

President Ike

GENERAL DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER is so attractive a personality that it is easy to forget that he is a five-star general; and easy also, in considering the rather sensational news of his appointment as president of Columbia University, that he is not an educator. Yet even as that fact obtrudes, so does the reflection that the duties of the president of Columbia University have very little to do, strictly speaking, with education.

His task, in relation to the university, is one of co-ordination and administration. Columbia is so large and so complex that one man would be unable to direct it in all its ramifications or to impose his will or any neat theory upon it. It is so large and so complex that in a sense it must run itself. Each department determines its own policy—and the ultimate authority in the rare cases when it is invoked, is exercised by the trustees, who delegate their power, whether to president or department, only on sufferance.

The president's larger job is to represent the university to the world and, to put it bluntly, keep funds flowing into the institution's coffers. This being so, he must be a public figure who commands the respect of a wide range of opinions and interests. General Eisenhower is demonstrably a good organizer and a good administrator. Moreover, there is little reason to doubt that he will be able to conquer and "contain" the sources of Columbia's income and meanwhile keep up a workable liaison with the Board of Trustees. And it is a matter of satisfaction that while in the nature of the case he must fulfil and will be quite capable of fulfilling the functions of a "stuffed shirt," he himself has no resemblance to the species.

As a public figure, and particularly as a five-star general, he has another qualification which is not to be minimized. For all his medals, he is a man of peace; he has often reiterated his belief that education is the most effective weapon against war. As a retired general and the head of a great university he can throw his prestige and his knowledge against the military mind that thrives on war and rumors of war. "Your business," he said to a graduating class a year ago, "is to put us out of business." He is now in a position to assist in that enterprise.

Holding the Bag

WHEN the Taft-Hartley bill became law, President Truman had to make a decision almost as difficult as the one he faced a few days earlier on the veto itself. The new problem was whether to temper the legislative wind to the shorn union lamb or to let the Republicans take over the administration of the new law in their own way. His statement to the press last Thursday indicated that he had chosen the former course. He would see that the new law was "well and faithfully administered" and urged both management and labor to show moderation.

He seems to have persuaded Paul M. Herzog, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, to stay on with his two colleagues, and is reported to be planning to seek out the two best and most liberal men he can find to join them in constituting the new five-man directorship. Similarly, he will make his own nomination for general counsel of the board, a position which the law makes vastly more important in fact than that of board member.

This is the good-gray-honest-Truman way to do it. But it is otherwise hard to justify, for several reasons. If Mr. Truman really believes what he said in his superb veto message, he knows that the law is unworkable. In picking his own men to administer it he is, first, exposing some of his friends to the certainty of failure. Second, since he believes the law will force unions to rely on their economic strength rather than on peaceful procedures, he is doing unions no favor by postponing for a few months their day of realization. He would be better advised to let the hail storm descend than to interpose a paper parasol which will be shot full of holes and blown inside out in a few minutes; and unions will be the worse off for not having taken to the storm cellar instantly. Finally, and most important, the President is playing directly into his opponents' hands. No matter how unworkable and impossible the law turns out to be, Mr. Truman will never be able to prove it if it is his own team which does the administering.

Even before the secretary of the Senate affixed his name to the law, the Republicans began establishing their alibi on precisely this point. House Majority Leader Halleck roared for an Administration promise that the law would not be sabotaged—thus suggesting that it would be. Senator Ives, the most competent, technically, of the law's supporters and therefore the first to foresee what may happen as the law goes into effect, took the same line. He repeated, an hour before the bill passed, a double-barreled warning, which presumably absolved him from the consequences of his vote. First he emphasized, as he has frequently done before, that the law is "not perfect." Next he declared that its success or failure would depend on its administration and the adequacy of its appropriations. As for its administration, he took pains to point out that Herzog was a man to be trusted; his old friend of New York State labor-law days would not sabotage the law. But, he warned, it could be sabotaged in other places. Looking at the veto message, Ives implied that it was hard to assume that there was not a "definite intent to sabotage."

As for adequate appropriations, while it is true that the Republicans will not wilfully ruin their own legislation at the outset, one must nevertheless be very naïve to think that the Congress will unhesitatingly pour out the enormously increased funds necessary for the operation of the greatly expanded law. And one must be very trustful to assume that Congress will not consign the law to a slow death by financial starvation, once it is clear it is not working out well.

The alibi that has been so carefully established could be destroyed if Mr. Truman had not cajoled Herzog to remain, and if he had informally notified the Republicans that he would nominate for board members whom-ever they suggested other than convicted felons. The responsibility for the law would then be theirs alone. Herzog's position in this matter is difficult to understand. He made no bones of his opposition to the measure while it was pending; he has cogently expounded the reasons why it cannot work. Despite his friend Ives's handsome pat on the back and avowal of faith, Herzog is understandably suspect by other Republicans. They will be only too delighted to make him the personal scapegoat for everything wrong with the law as it works out in practice.

His colleagues, John M. Houston and James J. Reynolds, Jr., are safe enough. Houston has kept cautiously quiet during the fight over the bill. Reynolds, it is fairly well known, approved of it, disassociated himself from NLRB criticism of it, and importuned the President to sign it in the first place. The general counsel, Gerhard Van Arkel, was forthright in his opposition. Honestly and sensibly, he resigned an hour after the veto was overridden.

If the President and the members of the NLRB are not to be impaled by Republican screams of "sabotage," they will be obliged to make the new law work. Presumably they hope to do so, and are therefore to be congratulated for their sanguine temperaments.

In addition to the present duties of the board—already such as to have provided it with a one year's back log of cases—they must be prepared to conduct five additional varieties of union elections. It is perfectly within reason to anticipate four of these each year for any company plagued with middling-bad labor relations.

They are obliged to decide all jurisdictional disputes without benefit of arbitrators on whom they might unload the work. Jurisdictional disputes, be it remembered, are the most complex, devious, and impervious to reason of all labor cases; witness the high-priced talent which has got nowhere in the Hollywood situation. Note also the fact that the brewers-teamsters' altercation has a history of some fifty years, all the facets of which presumably would have to be weighed in settling the issue.

The board is also in the new business of seeking injunctions in jurisdictional disputes and secondary boycotts. Whether it will or no, whether it believes an injunction is the correct procedure for settling the dispute or not, it must apply for one, once a showing is made that such a dispute exists.

The law debonairly gives the NLRB the chore of deciding whether union initiation fees are excessive or discriminatory—a nice task for an idle Saturday afternoon.

The board also has some half a dozen new unfair labor practices to prevent—union practices defined as unfair under the new act. This will be one of its toughest assignments. How does one tell, this side of ten Supreme Court cases, when a union organizer is or is not illegally "coercing" workers to sign up?

And all the while, it turns out, the board is not the board, but rather a sort of vaudeville horse composed of two men under the same cover who may or may not choose to go in the same direction. The general counsel is autonomous. The five-man board selects his field personnel, but he supervises their work. He alone decides which cases to handle, which to reject, how to prosecute them, how far to take them, whether or not to bring them before the board. If there is a would-be Dr. Robert Ley in the United States, the NLRB general counsel's job is the one he should be gunning for.

Oil and Palestine

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE most revealing bit of late news about Palestine does not mention that country at all or appear to refer to it. It occurs in a story from Lake Success reporting that a plan to set up a world oil authority will be considered next month by the Economic and Social Council. The request came from the International Cooperative Alliance, which represents cooperative societies in thirty-nine nations and is the largest non-governmental group affiliated with the United Nations. The plan submitted by the Alliance specifically proposes administration by the world oil authority of oil deposits in the Middle East "by and with the consent of the states involved." The authority would be directly under and responsible to the Security Council and would plan and enforce conservation measures, assure all nations equal access to oil, guarantee all purchasers—public, private, or cooperative—an equal opportunity to buy oil, adjudicate disputes over oil that might come up between governments or other interested parties. The attitude toward this proposal of the two most important "states involved" is easy to predict. The New York Times reports: "The plan is expected to meet stiff opposition from American and British petroleum interests that now control most of the oil extracted in the Middle East."

Recent Washington hearings on the Anglo-American oil treaty emphasized the coming shortage of oil for consumption in the United States. Middle Eastern petroleum, several witnesses insisted, must soon be drawn upon to supplement the output of North American and Caribbean fields. It was evident that both government and oil witnesses preferred for the moment to keep power politics off the stage and the domestic issue in the foreground. Neither isolationist nor internationalist sentiment can easily be mobilized against oil for the cars of America: too many people remember the little A stickers that still adhere to a few unwashed windshields. But military and strategic considerations lurked just off stage.

Oil will largely determine the fate of Palestine. This is true no matter what the U. N. commission sees or hears on its visit to Jewish settlements in the Negev desert or Arab villages in the hills. It is true no matter what commitments have been made in the past. For pending the day when atomic power can be applied to planes and tanks and the other machines of war, oil will remain the one important source of military mobility. By the same token it is the chief economic stake in the present struggle for power in the Middle East, where Britain and America have in effect merged their interests to form an oil empire exercising all-but-monopoly control over the richest petroleum resources remaining in the world. Other nations participating in the exploitation of the area are not even junior partners, in terms of policy and power. They are at most minor beneficiaries.

Unless deposits are discovered in the Negev, as some experts think is likely, Palestine is without petroleum. But the country is immersed in oil politics just the same. The Iraq pipe line terminates at Haifa, and new lines from Saudi Arabia may be routed through Palestine. And quite apart from tangible properties, Palestine is inextricably tangled in the complex effort of the great powers to establish relations with Arab politicians which will facilitate the full and profitable exploitation of Middle Eastern petroleum.

Certain Washington officials are now expressing the view that there is no "American policy" on Palestine. They brush aside the commitments made by Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman as mere political declarations, without essential meaning or effect. They say we are "neutral"; that we will reserve freedom to make up our minds on the subject of Palestine when the commission reports in September. They indicate quite plainly that oil will be as important as domestic political considerations in influencing the final decision.

Apparently these policy-makers believe they can also ignore the various pronouncements in Congress supporting Presidential promises. There was, for example, the concurrent resolution adopted on December 19, 1945, which demanded "free entry of Jews" into Palestine and a "full opportunity for colonization and development so that they may freely proceed with the upbuilding of Palestine as the Jewish National Home." This followed by only a few months a communication addressed to the President by a majority of members of both houses requesting that he use his influence with the government of Great Britain "to open forthwith the doors of Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization" and to urge "all interested governments to join with the United States toward the end of establishing Palestine as a free and democratic commonwealth. . . ." If such statements do not constitute "policy," then they are the cheapest sort of political deception. Perhaps that is what the officials in question intended to imply.

Oil and the expectation of war; oil and the fear of Russia; oil and the shortage in America; oil and profits. These are factors to be kept in mind as the U. N. commission pokes around in the Holy Land, and the experts in London and Washington prepare their reports. The fate of the people of Palestine, Jew and Arab, the fate of the displaced in Europe, will not go far toward offsetting those factors in the final reckoning unless the powers—and particularly the United States—take the position that progress and the economic development of the Middle East will produce more security than oil plus deals with the Mufti and his Arab League accomplices.

Ordinary people, the sort that build up cooperative societies and irrigate deserts, will argue for this position. It will be opposed by diehard military men and their counterparts in the oil companies. It will be opposed by the men who represent the British government in Palestine and sentence young Jewish terrorists to death without even dreaming that the processes of military law might create an unfortunate atmosphere for the U. N. inquiry. But perhaps enough pressure can be brought by opponents of the old techniques of imperialist control to influence the report of the commission and possibly even the minds of officials in Whitehall and Washington. The proposal by the Cooperative Alliance that Middle Eastern oil be taken right out of the hands of individual powers and administered by a world authority is an impressive move in the right direction. It should have the support of all liberal persons and groups. It should be pressed in Washington as well as at Lake Success. Incidentally it accords to the letter with that dangerous little clause supposed to have been injected into the Atlantic Charter by President Roosevelt over the objections of Prime Minister Churchill:

They will endeavor, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

Wallace in the West

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, June 24

SINCE Henry Wallace spoke to 30,000 Angelenos in Gilmore Stadium on May 19—admissions ranged from 60 cents to $3, and more than $30,000 was contributed to the Progressive Citizens of America—California has been seething with new political currents. In both San Francisco and Oakland the same overflow "paid-admission" crowds were on hand. A columnist for the New York Post, with the omniscience that distance always lends to political commentary, has described the Wallace meetings as drummed-up left-wing demonstrations and therefore without political significance. The left wing was certainly present en masse at Gilmore Stadium, but any doubts as to the political impact of the Wallace tour have been removed by the resultant open breach in the Democratic Party in California.

Prior to the Wallace meeting a committee headed by George Outland had prepared a policy statement for the party which Colonel James Roosevelt, state chairman, intended to present at the Jackson Day dinner in Los Angeles on June 6. This statement obliquely criticized the Truman Doctrine by questioning "the methods" being used by the President and by urging "a more active policy of cooperation with the United Nations." Apparently Colonel Roosevelt hoped that the policy statement would hold the left in line and yet not alienate the right. Shortly before the dinner National Committeeman Ed Pauley asked Roosevelt what he intended to do with the statement and was told that it would be read at the dinner and that printed copies would be distributed at the tables. Pauley promptly replied that if such were the plan he would have to advise Gael Sullivan, executive director of the Democratic National Committee, and Secretary of the Treasury John Snyder not to appear at the dinner. A day or so later Sullivan wired Roosevelt that he would be unable to attend, and Snyder also sent his regrets. But apparently Pauley reconsidered, for Sullivan soon telephoned Roosevelt that he would be present after all.

On arriving at the airport Sullivan was handed a schedule which included a press conference and a number of meetings with Democratic leaders. I am informed that he had previously stipulated there were to be no press conferences and that he had agreed to appear only for the purpose of reading John Snyder's speech (this phase of the story, I might add, is firmly denied by Colonel Roosevelt). In any case, he must have been keenly disturbed either by the arrangements or by what Pauley had to say about the policy statement, for he left by car the same night for Palm Springs and the following day returned to Washington by plane. At no point during this extraordinary in-again, out-again trip did he meet Colonel Roosevelt. His only explanation, issued from Rhode Island a week after the dinner, was that both he and Snyder were kept from the dinner by the pressure of "a historic legislative week in Washington."

In consequence, the Jackson Day dinner was rather like a marriage ceremony at which the minister, Colonel Roosevelt, was present with the ring and the book, while the bride and groom—the left and the right—were embarrassingly absent. At the last minute Pauley decided to attend, and in deference perhaps to his surly presence the "policy statement" was not read or distributed. Thanks to some frenzied last-minute recruiting by A. D. A. Democrats and some good staff work, the dinner was sold out, but neither the main speech, an uninspired effort by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, nor the singing of Dinah Shore and Frank Sinatra nor the antics of Danny Kaye managed to dispel the general apathy. Dore Schary struck the one significant note when he said that "a man who should have been here became worried by the free expression of an idea. By failing to be here he has insulted a very great lady . . . and a name that he should have always held in great respect and honor."

After the dinner the Los Angeles County Democratic Central Committee, a notably independent body, voted to censure President Truman for having "refused to allow" Secretary Snyder to be present, demanded the resignation of Pauley as national committeeman, voted to retain in California the entire proceeds of the dinner, and had harsh things to say about Gael Sullivan. Incidentally, this same committee had previously repudiated the Truman Doctrine. Pauley replied by sharply criticizing James Roosevelt on two counts: first, for having prepared the "policy statement"; and, second, for having "brought it up at this time"—implying that he objected not so much to the statement as to its timing in relation to Wallace's appearances. A few days later six crotchety Democratic state senators issued a statement blasting Colonel Roosevelt and indorsing the Truman Doctrine.

CAREY McWILLIAMS, a Southern California liberal, is the author of a number of books on labor and race relations in the West. He is a close observer of political movements in the Western states and writes on them frequently for The Nation.

Thus, so far as official relationships are concerned, the Democratic Party in California is sharply split. The state chairman has been repudiated by the national committeeman and, in effect, by the President and the National Committee, although the National Committee did announce on June 13 that efforts were being made "to repair the breach." On the other side, the central committee of the largest county in the state has repudiated the national committeeman and bluntly censured the President. The split was unquestionably produced by an upsurge of popular sentiment which has made Henry Wallace the symbol of the people's profound dissatisfaction with Truman and Company. It was Wallace who forced the issue in California—not Pauley or Roosevelt.

Determined to drive the wedge still deeper, Robert W. Kenny, former Attorney General, lost no time in inviting all Californians interested in organizing a Wallace delegation to meet in Fresno on July 19 for the purpose of forming a statewide committee which would, in turn, select the Wallace delegates. The invitation states most explicitly that only those individuals should attend who are prepared to support Wallace "all the way." Convinced that a revolt against Truman can be organized in the West, Kenny is determined to take a Wallace delegation to the next Democratic convention.

Ed Pauley will, of course, head a Truman delegation. There is not the slightest possibility at this time that such a delegation could attract liberal or progressive support, though it is not unthinkable that a few liberal stragglers might be induced to join it later. Before the Fresno meeting no one can say just how representative of liberal-labor strength the Wallace delegation will be, but it will certainly have a large rank-and-file following and will draw support from a surprisingly large number of Democratic county committees—those of Los Angeles, Alameda (Oakland), and San Diego counties among others. It is quite possible that a majority of the Los Angeles County Committee would go along. Conceivably there could be a third delegation, pledged to Governor Earl Warren. Having won the Democratic and Republican nominations in 1946, Warren will certainly be tempted to take advantage of California's wide-open cross-filing system and the split in the Democratic Party by entering a slate of delegates in the primary. A Warren delegation would draw votes from Truman, not from Wallace, and in a three-cornered Truman-Warren-Wallace fight a Wallace delegation would stand a good chance of success.

There could be still another delegation, pledged to either James Roosevelt or Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, which would be, in effect, an uninstructed delegation. Its formation would seriously interfere with Mr. Wallace's chances; on the other hand it would not have much strength if isolated from the mass support which he obviously enjoys. Much depends, therefore, on the attitude of such middle-of-the-road liberals as George Outland, Chet Holifield, Helen Gahagan Douglas, Dore Schary, and, of course, James Roosevelt. The appearance of this fourth delegation would precipitate a major struggle for control of the liberal movement in California which could degenerate into a repetition of the disastrous Patterson-Rogers fight of 1946.

Drawing by Helen

Henry Wallace

The idea of the Fresno meeting, that is, of a grass-roots people's convention, is a good one. And Bob Kenny cannot fairly be accused of "jumping the gun" in issuing the call for this meeting. If a revolt against Truman was to be organized in the West, action could not have been postponed much longer, for the problem of what to do with the sentiment aroused by the Wallace meetings assumed large proportions immediately after the Jackson Day dinner. There was also the danger that leadership of the Wallace movement might be preempted by some of the more impetuous and politically irresponsible left-wing Democrats in Los Angeles.

Wanting to postpone a decision as long as possible, most of the middle-of-the-road liberals have looked with favor on the idea of a "favorite-son" delegation or some last-minute compromise with the Truman-Pauley axis. Colonel Roosevelt's position has been that Truman's nomination is assured and that the most any insurgent movement can hope to achieve is the nomination of a liberal for the Vice-Presidency and some platform concessions. A fight between the Pauley and Roosevelt forces over this issue would be essentially meaningless. Ed Pauley is too sophisticated and flexible a politician to be much concerned over a "policy statement" mildly criticizing the President's foreign policy; nor would he get excited about a few finely phrased declarations in a party platform. His major concern is to defeat a ground-swell movement for Wallace in California, and it was solely from this point of view that he took exception to the "policy statement." The Pauley crowd neither like nor trust Jimmy Roosevelt. They opposed his election as state chairman a year ago, and their opposition has never abated. Since they are now in undisputed control of the pro-Truman elements, the only rival delegation that could possibly win would be one that was explicitly and noisily anti-Truman, in short, a Wallace delegation.

Nevertheless, consultations should have been held with the middle-of-the-roaders before the Fresno meeting was publicly announced, if only for the purpose of explaining to them, as a matter of protocol, the reasons underlying the decision. The meeting should also have been preceded by several months of intensive spade work with the trade unions and other mass organizations. To date Colonel Roosevelt's only comment on the Fresno meeting has been that since it is for Wallace "all the way," he cannot attend.

That the West is the place to organize a revolt against Truman, or, as Bob Kenny puts it, "to demonstrate his unsuitability," is clearly shown by the open breach in California—the most clear-cut and unbridgeable split between pro-Truman and anti-Truman forces within the Democratic Party that has occurred anywhere as yet. Powered by the steam that one can hear hissing in California's political boilers, a conference of liberal-labor groups in the Western states in late September or October might well succeed in laying the foundations for a Western revolt. A set of basic interests cutting sharply across party lines unite the Western states in support of an expanding economic program with strong emphasis on reclamation and power projects and in opposition to Eastern industrial dominance, monopoly control, patent pools, discriminatory freight rates, and the like. The strongest regional support for President Truman's veto of the Taft-Hartley bill came from the Pacific Coast Congressional delegation. With Wallace as the symbol and Kenny as the strategist, a Western revolt could assume large proportions.

The political situation in California is the key to the success or failure of such a movement. An internecine fight among liberals in California for leadership of an anti-Truman movement would spread dismay and confusion in the other Western states.

In 1946 the left wing split away from the liberal Democrats in California by forcing the ill-considered candidacy of Ellis Patterson for the United States Senate. Can it be that the liberal Democrats will make a similar mistake in 1948 by splitting with the left wing?

Some light is thrown on this question by the results of a poll of Democratic voters taken in Los Angeles this week. They show Truman leading Wallace by only a slight margin, with Governor Earl Warren in third place, and Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt in fourth. Under these circumstances the middle-of-the-roaders would hardly want to risk the valuable name of Roosevelt in a primary fight; the same poll shows that Governor Warren's "non-partisan" pretense is beginning to wear pretty thin. Still unknown is the attitude of organized labor, more particularly of the rank and file of the A. F. of L. and the right wing of the C. I. O. Will organized labor in California merge its differences for a common political purpose? In the last analysis, the answer to this question will determine whether a successful revolt against Truman can be engineered in the West.

SCHIZOPHRENIA AMERICANA

COAL—a Test Case

BY ALFRED FRIENDLY

Washington, June 28

FOR those who like their humor sardonic the Taft-Hartley labor law is the perfect dish. Its proponents, it may be recalled, began and ended most of their arguments with the clinching comment that the law was necessary, if for no other reason, to "take care of John L. Lewis." But less than forty-eight hours after the law was passed, these same advocates found themselves busily explaining that "because of the peculiar circumstances" the law may not be effective in stopping a coal strike.

This second-guessing is considerably closer to the truth. It is correct as far as it goes, but it doesn't go far enough. The act is not merely unable to stop a coal strike but is bound to create zany confusion and frustration if anyone makes so bold as to attempt its application in the coal industry. Yet the law must be applied.

There is only one escape from it, and that only temporary. If Lewis can negotiate a contract before August 22, when the provisions of the law that alter the Wagner act take effect, he can eliminate some trouble and postpone the rest for a year. But it seems very likely that a part of the industry, particularly the Southern operators, will choose not to grant a contract so soon. To obtain agreement, they would have to give Lewis a closed shop, whereas if they hold out until the law takes effect they may be able to avoid making this concession.

Let us assume, then, that there is no disposition to get a contract before the effective date, and that Lewis is obliged to take the steps prescribed under the new law. What does he have to do just to get what he now has, not to mention anything more? How fast does he have to run to stay where he is? Take a deep breath:

Lewis and the United Mine Workers have for some years enjoyed a union shop. A miner must join the U. M. W. to keep his job, once he is hired in a mine represented by that union. Further, for some years Lewis has been able to conduct either nation-wide or regional bargaining.

He dare not relinquish either of these assets. In periods of slack demand either the open shop or mine-by-mine bargaining would whipsaw his wage scales down to the point of disappearance, as he learned through bitter experience in the early '20's and early '30's. He must therefore retain present contract provisions on those subjects, which means he must obtain them, as if for the first time, under the new steps prescribed by the law.

The NLRB has never made an over-all determination of an appropriate bargaining unit for the coal industry. As an initial move to getting a closed-shop contract Lewis must petition that the entire industry be considered the proper unit. Assume that he files this petition by July 1. The board must hold a hearing on the petition unless all parties waive it. Obviously they will not. Assume the maximum possible expedition, with the hearing held before the board in the first instance, rather than before a hearings officer. The date for it could not in justice to the parties be set before July 15.

The hearing will cover some 3,500 mines and will take up such troublesome issues as whether to include mines now organized by the Progressive Mine Workers and mines not organized at all. (Let us skip for the moment the problem of how to exclude those mines from the bargaining unit without at the same time being forced to rule that bargaining must be by individual mines.) The hearing cannot possibly be concluded before August 1.

Either the Southern operators or the U. M. W., depending on the decision, will be dissatisfied and will refuse to bargain on the basis of the decision. The other party will file a complaint of refusal to bargain. Everyone is breaking his neck for the sake of speed; so we will assume the date is now only August 5. The board will draft a complaint and serve it on the parties the next day. But under the law it cannot set a hearing for at least five days. It is now August 13. Since the main issues have been decided, the verdict could be entered in a couple of days, by August 17.

In the meantime, let us assume, the U. M. W. has filed with the Secretary of Labor its reports on the compensation of all officers and their manner of election or selection, on all dues and fees required, the procedures of its constitution and by-laws in some dozen different matters, its assets, liabilities, receipts, and disbursements for the past twelve months, and in some manner not yet determined can prove that copies of these reports have been furnished all its members. At the same time, it has given the NLRB an affidavit by each officer of the national union and each officer of all the local unions, swearing that he is not a Communist, Communist sympathizer, or a fellow who believes in the overthrow of the government by force.

ALFRED FRIENDLY is a reporter on the Washington Post specializing in labor affairs.

Let us assume that there has been no slip-up, that every officer has found a notary and filed an affidavit, that every member has received the proper report. (If there has been any lapse, the union is disqualified, or else the NLRB must interpret the law on these points loosely. In the latter case there are just that many more issues for the courts. Let's forget it, for the case is getting complicated enough anyway.) So the complaint is issued by the NLRB and the aggrieved party will then carry the case to the Circuit Court of Appeals. The record and petition must be printed and the case set for argument, giving time to both parties to prepare briefs. If there is maximum alacrity, the case may be argued early in October. The court gives it precedence over everything else, and a decision comes down in early November.

There may or may not be a good chance to obtain a writ of certiorari. In any event, the losing party is sure to try. Let's say a petition is drafted, printed, and filed in two weeks. The other party has twenty days in which to file a response. By now we are in the middle of December.

The Supreme Court, also giving the matter precedence, may have its answer in a week. Assuming it denies the petition—which is unlikely, since the issues are so novel and important—the matter of an appropriate bargaining unit will be decided by Christmas. If the court grants the writ, and takes the case, add three months as a minimum to this time-table.

The next step is to see whether the employees in the bargaining unit determined upon wish to be represented by the U. M. W. An election appears to be necessary—an election in 3,500 mines. This will cost, if previous experience is a guide, $180,000, and will take at least two weeks. The Ides of January are upon us. After the election the U. M. W. must collect signatures of 30 per cent of its members on a petition asking for a union shop. Let us say that this task is accomplished by February 1.

It is then necessary for the board to conduct another election—it could not have done this before, for the petition, to be honored, must have been presented by a union already certified as a bargaining representative. So the miners vote again, another $180,000 is spent, and perhaps in two weeks' time the NLRB is able to assure itself that 50 per cent of all the miners want a union shop.

Still breaking time records, the union and operators would convene within a week, on Washington's Birthday, to hear Lewis's demand for a union shop. Assume, although there is every reason for making exactly the opposite assumption, that the operators are willing to grant the demand. But half a dozen coal-mine states have laws which forbid the union shop. They may have been enforced with great laxity, if at all, in the past, but now their enforcement falls ultimately on the federal government. No employer can take a chance lest a disappointed non-union job applicant have an air-tight case against him. So some of the operators refuse the union-shop demand.

Lewis cannot yield. On this issue alone, whatever others exist, the negotiations break down, by March 1.

Then, presumably, the eighty-day injunction procedure for threatened "national-emergency" strikes starts to run its course. We need not go into the details of this procedure except to note that the injunction order would probably be appealed and that the whole matter might be suspended while the order was being reviewed. Assuming it stood up, there would be a third NLRB election to see if the miners would accept the last offer of their employers. If they refused, and the injunction was lifted, and the strike took place, the President would be issuing his report to the Eightieth Congress just as it was getting ready to adjourn—about a year from now.

Thus the dispute would not be settled until there had been a year of NLRB work, three NLRB elections, at least one Appellate Court review of a board decision, a proceeding in a District Court, possibly one or two Appellate Court reviews of that decision, two reports by a board of inquiry, one report to Congress by the President, and some mixing in, to a greater or lesser degree, by the Supreme Court.

Absurd? Of course. In the first place the actual time-table for all this would be nearer two years than the breakneck one-year schedule recited above. Secondly, Lewis would clearly not have been content to operate all this time on an open-shop basis, and just as clearly the nation could not have lived for a year without coal.

Would the "emergency" injunction have come into play before—say, early this July, if there was a strike at that time? Possibly, but it is hard to see how the preventive machinery of the law could be invoked before the negotiating machinery of the law was permitted to operate. And if it could, are there any other terms on which a settlement could be made without denying the U. M. W. the union shop? The law, though, is supposed to permit the union shop.

In point of fact, it clearly does not permit the union shop except after this twelve-month period or longer of hocus-pocus.

The coal industry is an extreme case. Yet much the same procedure would be invoked if a union shop were demanded in any other industry where industry-wide or regional bargaining has been the rule, or in any company where an employer chose to challenge the union shop. The period would be shortened only in cases in which the NLRB had previously determined the appropriate bargaining unit and in which there was no good basis for contesting that determination. The time schedule might be much longer in the maritime industry. The last time the NLRB held an election in one branch of it, seven months passed before all the sailors got back from the seven seas.

One final note, returning for a moment to coal. In the event of a strike, just what does the court enjoin under the emergency procedure provided in the new law? Lewis would have issued no strike order, posted no pickets, paid no strike benefits. What tangible act can the court enjoin, and at the same time refrain from ordering miners to work against their will?

And if it could make the injunction effective, the court would be in the business of setting wages, hours, and working conditions without very much of a guide to follow. For the 1945 owner-union contract has been long since abandoned, and the operators never accepted the government (Krug-Lewis) contract.

Perhaps Lewis will make everything easy by just pulling the miners out on the ground that their working conditions are abnormally dangerous. The new law specifically decrees that this sort of action, if in good faith, may not be held to be a strike.

Revolution in Eastern Europe

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

II. A Regional Planned Economy

Vienna, June 1

THE seeds of a regional planned economy are being planted in the capitals of Eastern Europe. It is an old, old dream. There were a few open discussions of the idea during the war, but the Soviet Union frowned and that ended it. Now the concept is being quietly revived.

The Soviet Union is now quite sure that its neighbors are "friendly." As a result of its capitalist and imperialist operations in the past three years it need not worry that it will be isolated economically by the Eastern European countries as it was in the pre-war period. And it cannot very easily oppose a constructive plan which is so similar to its own successful regional-planning programs.

Time will be needed for the seeds to develop. But the impetus is there. The knowledge of these nations that any assistance they may get for their reconstruction and rehabilitation, whether it comes from Uncle Joe or Uncle Sam, will have too high a price tag on it contributes to their determination to work out their many problems as a unit, drawing strength from one another.

The old restrictive nationalisms are gradually dying out, and the natural links that were broken after the First World War are being welded together again. Economic realities are helping to level the old chauvinist barriers. This time the rivalries of the great powers will not be able to prevent regional economic agreements, and no large influential pressure groups now exist within the countries themselves, determined, for their own selfish purposes, to obstruct regional cooperation.

INTERLOCKING TRADE AGREEMENTS

The framework for economic collaboration has been gradually built up during the past two years. Its three prerequisites now exist—similar social structures, similar economic structures, and similar basic political attitudes. Plans already exist to integrate the economic progress of the backward agricultural countries with that of the advanced industrial countries—Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. A whole network of interlocking trade agreements already covers the area and is growing into a workable program of economic interdependence.

Poland's remarkably strong coal position serves as a firm foundation. Poland is sending coal to every other Eastern European country except Bulgaria, which has enough for its own needs and exports what is left over to Yugoslavia. In return, Poland receives from Austria, for example, scientific equipment and industrial products.

Czechoslovakia has made a trade agreement with Bulgaria by which it will send Bulgaria several power stations, some mining machinery, and other industrial equipment in return for tobacco, ores, and hides. Czechoslovakia's state-owned Bata National Shoe Company will also build and operate a shoe factory near Sofia which will manufacture 20,000 pairs of shoes a week.

Hungary's copper requirements are being filled by Yugoslavia alone. Rumanian oil is going to Bulgaria and Yugoslavia, Rumanian wine to Poland, and Bulgarian tobacco, like Polish coal, to all countries in the region.

Austria has not fitted fully into the picture yet, but representatives of the Austrian Social Democratic Party who attended the Congress of the Eastern European Socialist Parties in Budapest last month said they realized the necessity of restoring Austria's economic links with CONSTANTINE POULOS is the Balkan correspondent of the Overseas News Agency and a frequent contributor to The Nation. The third article of his series will dissect the reactionary forces in Eastern Europe.

the East. Markets for Austria's industrial products can be found now only in Eastern Europe with its great consumption potential.

So far the Soviet Union's trade relations with these countries have been pretty one-sided, designed for the aggrandizement and rehabilitation of Russia. In time they will be worked down to a more equitable arrangement, but there will never be a return to the situation that existed before the war, when Czechoslovakia's trade with Russia was only 5 per cent of its total foreign trade and Poland's was less than half of 1 per cent. The potentialities of Russian trade with Eastern Europe are tremendous. By supplying raw materials and receiving finished goods Russia will help these countries raise their standard of living and keep them out of their former bondage to the highly industrialized Western nations.

Still other trade possibilities, outside the Eastern European family, are being explored: Poland has an extensive agreement with Sweden, and Czechoslovakia with Finland. Future and existing agreements with all the Scandinavian countries, with other countries of Western Europe, and with the Middle East, where a growing sense of nationalism is combined with a comparatively low standard of living, will continuously strengthen the economic unity of the countries of Eastern Europe.

The Western powers could help, of course. Great Britain has significantly reversed its position, as is indicated by its recent agreements with Poland and Hungary and its current talks with Yugoslavia. The United States is evidently determined not to help countries within the Russian sphere, or if it does, to do so on its own terms. But it is seriously mistaken if it thinks that the new regimes will revise their policies to get dollars.

Without American help the new regimes will lower their objectives: they will postpone the rise in the standard of living which they had anticipated and simply make strenuous efforts to maintain minimum consumption levels. Without American assistance the recovery of Eastern Europe will be hard. But it will go on.*

Imitating the Soviet Union, the various countries have launched long-term plans for industrial development. With UNRRA help, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia have got off to an excellent start. Yugoslavia has a five-year plan, Poland a three-year plan, Czechoslovakia a two-year plan, and Hungary is embarking on a three-year plan on August 1. Bulgaria, having suffered least, is taking it more easily and gradually. Rumania has not done any serious planning as yet, and Albania should be considered an autonomous region within the federal system of Yugoslavia, with its economy geared to that of the larger unit. Four-power occupation of Austria and the delay in obtaining a treaty have held up nearly all planning in this already industrialized country, but the powerful Social Democratic Party has detailed projects which will fit into the new Eastern European pattern.

The rapid pace of industrial development called for by all the plans anticipates the absorption of surplus agricultural labor. Such a development would entail a drastic reorganization of each country's economic structure and a great change in this agrarian region's mode of life.

PROGRESS OF NATIONALIZATION

Whatever inspiration has been drawn from the Russian system, there has been no indiscriminate, slavish adoption of it. There has been absolutely no collectivization, and no general arbitrary abolition of private enterprise. In Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Yugoslavia, where nearly all basic and large industries have been nationalized, private initiative has still plenty of scope. In Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania nationalization has made little progress. An exception is Bulgaria's tobacco industry, which was brought under strict state control soon after the war.

Nationalization of large industries in Austria is being delayed by Russia's interpretation of the "external-German-assets" clause of the Potsdam agreement, by which it claims ownership of most Austrian plants. Elsewhere, for specific compensation, the Soviet Union has left German assets to the states concerned: the synthetic oil plant at Most has been turned over to Czechoslovakia, and coal-mining equipment in Silesia to Poland.

As an ex-enemy state Rumania is not permitted to nationalize properties owned by citizens of U. N. countries. The larger part of Rumanian oil is thus owned. The Russians now control the rest through "Sovrom Petrol," a corporation in which theoretically the Soviet Union and the Rumanian government have equal shares but which is actually controlled by the Russians. Rumania's maritime services are monopolized by "Sovrom Transport"; its lending and credit facilities and its export and import trade will eventually all center in "Sovrombanco." The lumber industry is to be run for Russia's benefit by "Sovromlemm," and air transport is monopolized by "Tars." Russia's economic infiltration of Rumania has been bluntly carried out, but if one recalls past imperial practices and the tactics of power politics, condemnation of it will not be too severe. The important thing is that Rumania is the only Eastern European country whose economy Russia has succeeded in tying firmly to its own.

So far Austria, aided by the Western Allies, has successfully resisted similar "fifty-fifty" proposals by the Russians. Hungary and Russia have a very weak joint air line, "Maszovlet," unclear arrangements on motor transport, and a confused, indefinite deal on bauxite deposits. The Rumanian government could have stalled on Russian demands as Austria and Hungary have done.

Considering the obstacles created by Russian policy, the meager means, the creaky economic and bureaucratic

* Mr. Poulos mailed his piece from Vienna before the Marshall plan was announced.—EDITORS THE NATION, machinery which had to be used, the strides toward industrialization in Eastern Europe in the past two years have been truly remarkable.

THE WORKERS SUPPORT THE NEW REGIMES

The revolution has not led to chaos and will not lead to chaos—despite the wishful thinking of Western diplomats and economists—largely because the working class believes it has acquired a new incentive. The achievements of the workers of Poland, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary during the past two years have been incredible. The workers are the strength and backbone of all the Eastern European governments, though in Yugoslavia there is considerable peasant support for Marshal Tito, and the other governments too have large rural followings.

The organized labor movements are under the exclusive direction of the Communists except in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Poland. These countries had sizeable industries before the war and therefore some trade-union tradition.

In Austria the Communists are greatly outnumbered by the Social Democrats; in Hungary many workers joined the Communists in the first excitement of liberation but have now returned to the Social Democratic fold. The Social Democrats are much the strongest of the Hungarian workers' parties. The Socialists of Czechoslovakia and Poland have kept a foothold in the labor movements of those countries but have lost considerable strength to the Communists. Such trade unions as existed in Bulgaria, Rumania, and Yugoslavia in the past, before they were suppressed by the various dictatorial and semi-dictatorial governments, were controlled by the Communists. The Communists control them today, too.

Most of the workers are better off than they were before the war, and those whose lot has not actually improved are better off in comparison with other classes. But the great problem of alleviating the misery and discontent of the peasants remains to be solved. All the countries of Eastern Europe except Austria and Czechoslovakia have a surplus rural population. From 70 to 80 per cent of the region's 100,000,000 inhabitants try to make a living off the land—a third more than the land can support. Industries have always been too limited to absorb the surplus. Between 1929 and 1937 Yugoslavia's total population increased by almost 2,000,000, while industrial workers increased by only 200,000.

AID FOR THE PEASANTS

Programs designed to correct this situation face many difficulties, and the condition of the rural population will remain an unsettling factor for some time to come. Greater or lesser land reforms have been instituted throughout the region. The land has not been collectivized but has been turned over to the peasants in private ownership, a policy which in the long run may prove disadvantageous to socialism. The hurried conversion from large-scale farming to small, in some cases impractically small, holdings, has created new problems, particularly in Hungary and Poland, but the political, social, and economic situation at the time the reforms were executed allowed no alternative.

After the land reforms the new governments turned to organizing agrarian cooperatives. The few ventures in this line undertaken before the war—in Bulgaria with considerable success—were managed by the large landowners and wealthy peasants and their benefits went to this class. Now, under state control, cooperatives handle a large proportion of the produce the peasant sells and the manufactured goods he buys.

In Bulgaria and Yugoslavia peasants on adjoining farms pool their machinery and labor in "labor cooperatives." The system enables them to grow a greater variety of crops and to breed better livestock.

Efforts to increase the yield per acre are tied up with the introduction of modern (1920) agricultural machinery, to which the peasants are traditionally hostile. Countries which have received tractors from UNRRA—Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Yugoslavia—have set up "machine tractor stations." These have been especially successful in Yugoslavia. Operating out of the stations, tractor teams work for cooperatives and individual peasants. The major plowing burden, however, is still borne by draft animals.

Scientific approaches to crop cultivation are also being made. For example, Czechoslovakia is planning to shift the emphasis from grain production to stock breeding and truck gardening. Hungary is thinking of reducing its maize production. But Hungary, more thoroughly stripped than the other countries and not qualified to receive aid from UNRRA, is having greater difficulties all along the line. As a result, it is far behind in setting up and carrying out a complete program of cooperatives, tractor stations, and experimental farms.

Recognizing the importance and strength of the peasant population, the new regimes are trying hard to win and hold its support. The Bulgarian government has organized mechanics, technicians, carpenters, artisans, doctors, and dentists in "labor brigades" which go into the villages on Sundays and holidays to repair machines, mend household equipment and furniture, build sheds, and prescribe for the sick.

Agriculture in Eastern Europe will undoubtedly improve in time, after the many plans and programs get into full gear. Yugoslavia has already brought industrial prices into closer harmony with agricultural prices. The disparity remains a serious problem for the other countries and is an important factor in plans for rapid industrialization. The length of time that will be required to solve these problems depends a great deal on international politics.

A. V. C.'s Big Chance

BY DANIEL JAMES

THE American Veterans Committee has its second chance to take the leadership of those veterans of World War II whose interest in their nation's life goes somewhat beyond bonuses, beer, and skittles. Its first clear challenge to progressive thought and action was dimmed during last year by internal difficulties. The Communists, who at the outset had left it alone, bored into chapter after chapter and threatened to take over national control. That they did not speaks well not only for the top leadership but for an awakened political sense in the rank and file. These refused to accept a minority control that had bedeviled so many sections of the liberal and labor movement. They demonstrated that it was possible to hold to a firm progressive course without yielding to a group which, whatever the label it wore, followed slavishly a line dictated from outside.

The showdown came at the recent Milwaukee convention. The situation was critical, not only because of the year's difficulties but because of a necessary change in national leadership. Charles G. Bolté, the national chairman, had gained unchallenged prestige during the period when the organization built itself up from a handful of service men, most of them in the army, to its present substantial strength of over 100,000. Now he was leaving to carry on his university work in Oxford. Gil Harrison, vice-chairman, who had become the main target of Communist attack, had decided to withdraw in the interests of greater harmony. On the election of the executive officers and of the new National Planning Committee the strength and unity of A. V. C. would depend.

At the convention the issue was somewhat complicated by a "third caucus" led by Michael Straight, the young publisher of the New Republic. Straight, outspokenly anti-Communist, insisted that American foreign policy was the chief issue liberal veterans had to face. The Truman Doctrine menaced peace and required a united front of all liberals. The main effect of the Straight caucus was to draw off non-Communist strength from the Communist-led faction. But the sentiment of the convention itself in voicing overwhelming disapproval of the Truman Doctrine robbed his platform of much of its appeal. It was soon apparent that the great majority was forming behind the Independent Progressive caucus.

When the voting returns were in, the Independent

Progressives had elected a new chairman, Chat Paterson, by an over-all majority, the Straight group running a bad third. Richard Bolling, Midwest field director of Americans for Democratic Action, won the vice-chairmanship easily against a combined opposition vote. Of the twenty-four posts on the National Planning Committee, the Independent Progressives won twenty-four.

There is no doubt, then, about the mandate carried by the new National Planning Committee. The threat of Communist control is ended.

The question is: what will A. V. C. do with its new opportunity? If the tenor of resolutions passed indicates anything, it should do well. The convention, after attacking the Truman Doctrine, came out strongly for more United Nations control in world affairs and international control of atomic energy along the lines of the American plan. It blasted the Taft-Hartley labor bill—then entering its final stage—but criticized jurisdictional strikes. It took a strong stand against racial and religious discrimination, called for a permanent FEPC, demanded that "the government assume responsibility for getting homes for veterans," and backed General Bradley as head of the Veterans' Administration. It turned thumbs down on a veterans' bonus—in opposition both to the Communist and the American Legion line. "Bonuses," it declared, "are handouts and as such are inconsistent with the more modern and intelligent theories of social and economic security."

The new members of the Planning Committee suggest that the A. V. C. is reaching out beyond the group that originally brought it into being and directed its early destinies. Chat Paterson, the new chairman, served for eighteen months as the A. V. C.'s man on Capitol Hill. His experience will be invaluable to an organization that intends to focus much of its attention on Washington. Bolling, the vice-chairman, has had more than an academic acquaintance with the fight for civil liberties: he carries a scar on his left temple—a gift from Gerald L. K. Smith's goons one day in New Orleans. Four of the new members have labor backgrounds. Three represent Southern liberalism; one of them, Lester Persells of Atlanta having helped unseat Herman Talmadge. Six of the group have had experience with the federal government. Two are Negroes. The Planning Committee is representative of all parts of the country.

To class either A. V. C.'s platform or its new leadership as "right-wing" is therefore nonsense. Both are liberal enough to be a thorn in the flesh of the present wielders of Congressional authority. They are liberal enough to attract veterans who see that the things Roosevelt stood for in American life are seriously threatened. More than that, at a time when liberal thought is once more showing signs of life, they provide A. V. C. with a common ground to share with other left-of-center movements. A revitalized A. V. C. will undoubtedly attract those veterans who remember the war was fought for certain objectives beyond victory and who have been looking for an organization with unequivocal standards and an uncompromising leadership.

DANIEL JAMES, a member of A. V. C., was formerly on the staff of Army Talk. He is now a free-lance writer in New York.

Radio: Tool of the Reactionaries

BY CHARLES A. SIEPMANN

A BILL to revise the Communications Act of 1934 is currently being pushed through Congress with unseemly haste and little opportunity for responsible civic groups to prepare and present their point of view. The National Association of Broadcasters has seized the opportunity to press its case against the Federal Communications Commission and its "infamous" Blue Book on radio's public-service responsibilities.

Radio, here and elsewhere, is one of the big prizes in the current struggle for power by reactionary private enterprise. The agitation has spread to Canada, where an unscrupulous campaign is being waged to bring discredit on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and, at the same time, to expand commercial broadcasting. An independent Canadian columnist, Jack Scott, describes it as "a campaign of trick slogans and falsehoods." Canada's privately owned stations have bought full-page advertisements, at a cost of thousands of dollars, in over seventy newspapers, and quaintly refer to their contents as a "series of public discussions." They have also used their own radio facilities to bombard the public with propaganda. The C. B. C. has rather stuffily decided that, as a public organization, it is precluded from answering back. Thus the "discussion" before the public has been, to say the least, one-sided.

The campaign has had open or tacit support from most Canadian newspapers—signal exceptions are the Montreal Star and the Ottawa Journal—and also from certain "free-enterprise" interests. A number of high-powered public-relations concerns in Toronto and Montreal are actively involved. It has now reached its climax in hearings before a special parliamentary committee.

The private station owners' brief opens with the time-worn slogan about the peril to free speech offered by a monopoly. There is, however, little or nothing in C. B. C.'s record to suggest that freedom of speech has been either curtailed or threatened. An even more contemptible argument by innuendo is contained in the following passage from the Canadian Association of Broadcasters' brief. Referring to the exploratory studies of the Aird Commission, which laid the groundwork for Canada's present broadcasting system, it observes, "The commission was most favorably impressed by the German radio system. That was one year before Hitler took over." (The C. B. C. bitterly remembers that had the Aird Commission been heeded to the full, the present controversy would never have arisen, for among its recommendations not later adopted was the gradual absorption, by purchase, of private stations into the C. B. C. system.)

Elsewhere the brief submits as evidence in support of its case the results of a public-opinion poll purporting to prove that the majority of Canadians support a system of commercial enterprise. It is instructive to note that this poll was financed, not by the private stations, but by the Imperial Oil Company, Aluminium, Ltd., Canadian Industries, Ltd., Canadian General Electric, and Northern Electric. "Since then a number of companies, corporations, and trade associations have participated."

But while in the United States commercial broadcasters attack the FCC, Canadian private interests seek expanded activity through the creation of a Canadian FCC. To understand this paradox some knowledge of the Canadian system of broadcasting is necessary. Radio in Canada represents an uneasy compromise between the British and American systems. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, deriving its basic revenue from a license fee paid by radio-set owners, controls and operates all network broadcasting. Private commercial stations are limited to local-station operations. But the C. B. C. functions not only as a network broadcasting system but as a regulatory commission with powers over private stations far exceeding those of the FCC. It is empowered, for example, "to control the character of any and all programs broadcast by private stations" and "to determine the proportion of time which may be devoted to advertising." Though the enforcement of these and like powers has never been more than perfunctory, private stations resent control, and the main object of their present attack is the C. B. C.'s dual role as broadcaster and arbiter of the policies or practice of private stations.

The strength of their case on this count has to be admitted, for the C. B. C., as its own chairman has declared, has come to be a serious financial competitor with private stations for the advertising dollar. This results from the fact that the license revenue (the fee per radio set is $2.50) does not cover C. B. C.'s operating costs. Because of Canada's vast area and scattered population, operation of a nation-wide radio system is more expensive there than in any other country in the world. One single station in New York can cover a population as great as that of the whole of Canada. In Canada thirty or more powerful stations and thousands of miles of expensive land lines are necessary. C. B. C. has therefore had to supplement its license revenue by accepting sponsored programs—mostly from the United States—and even "spot announcements." The public will not stand for a further increase in the license fee, and C. B. C.'s resources, even supplemented by advertising, remain inadequate for effective service.

CHARLES A. SIEPMANN is chairman of the Department of Communications of the School of Education of New York University and author of "Radio's Second Chance."

The Canadian Association of Broadcasters contends that while they welcome C. B. C.'s competition, they resent its regulatory powers. They ask that these powers be vested instead in an "impartial" commission equivalent to the FCC. Coupled with this is a demand that private stations be admitted to the network field of operations. (They provide no satisfactory answer to the question of how this will be financed.)

The claim that continued competition from C. B. C. will be welcome is of course specious. This is only the first round in a struggle to obtain the ultimate demise of C. B. C. The opinion poll presented to the committee indicates, as has been said, that a small majority of listeners favor "independent ownership of radio." But while the sponsorship of this poll casts doubt upon the accuracy of its findings, it is probably true that many Canadian listeners would prefer to be rid of the license fee. Envious eyes are cast on the varied entertainment programs heard, free, by listeners in the United States.

But here, surely, is a case where democracy and public interest are not well served by deference to popular opinion, which rests on very partial knowledge of the relevant facts. Should Canada acquire a system of broadcasting similar to ours, those who support the change must weigh the price. They might well study with more care the price that we are paying for a system in which private enterprise has been allowed to get away with murder by an FCC without stomach for its regulatory responsibilities. The price for Canada can be estimated with some confidence as follows:

1. Private radio will concentrate, as it has done in the United States, on audiences in densely populated urban areas. Canada has vast areas of thin rural population. They are important to Canada. Much of the energy and funds of C. B. C. are spent in trying to provide for their needs. From private radio they will receive short measure.

2. Private radio will tend, as here, to provide minimum service where handsome profits are not immediately forthcoming. As one Canadian paper—the Montreal Star—which has foreseen the danger in the current crisis, puts it, "It is a fact that in our complex, technical, international world a democracy must maintain a ceaseless effort to educate itself. Radio discussion, explanation, and interpretations of policy are important instruments to this end. . . . C. B. C. has undertaken many programs, worthless commercially and not necessarily with large listening audiences. It is important to ask, if the C. B. C.'s revenues are to be restricted, whether there will be any alternative available, prepared or able to spend large sums of money—without profit—to maintain these national objectives." The private stations' current concept of public service is illustrated by their answer to a question on this point posed by the parliamentary committee which sat in 1946. "One station reported that it recorded interviews with local British war brides and sent the recordings, free of charge, to the brides' parents in Britain. . . . Other stations had put on local man-in-the-street interviews. Many considered that they had done well by putting their facilities at the disposal of war-loan committees."

3. Educational broadcasts and similar special services, expensive and unprofitable, will be curtailed. Even in the United States, where $400,000,000 goes annually to program making, such services hardly match up to the urgent needs of our time. Canada, which is a poorer country, is unlikely to fare better.

4. Canadian listeners will be inundated with programs "made in the U. S." They will be popular. But the growth of sound Canadianism, in fostering which the C. B. C. has played a distinguished part, will be retarded if not eliminated altogether. Canada will become, on the air at least, a cultural dependency of the United States.

5. French Canadians form over a third of the population. French Canada gets very special service from the C. B. C. There are those who question whether commercial radio will provide comparable service.

To the Canadian populace, as ill informed about radio as our own, glutted with vicious and one-sided propaganda, such a price may not seem heavy. It is, however, to be hoped that more enlightened groups may weigh in time the implications of the present drive by powerful, moneyed interests to seize control of the Canadian air. A sensible suggestion is that of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which pleads for the appointment of a royal commission to study Canadian radio needs in 1947. Such a step would provide time for a sober review of Canada's peculiar cultural problems and might be expected to produce the right answer. It would also remove the discussion from the area of political partisanship.

Del Vayo—The Fascist Phoenix

FOR more than a year I have been insisting, to the point of tedium, that fascism is recovering its strength with a speed exceeding the most sensational predictions. One could count on one's fingers the people in this country who have shared my conviction. Many liberal observers have been concentrating so eagerly upon the big diplomatic battle, Washington versus Moscow, that they have paid little attention to this astonishing revival. But one American voice has consistently, and with a high sense of democratic responsibility, stressed the fascist danger. I refer to William L. Shirer, who last Sunday came back to the subject in his comment in the New York Herald Tribune on the latest report of the International Committee for the Study of European Questions.

I have that document before me. Its authors are also liberals, mild liberals most of them, but they live in Europe and can hear closer at hand the growling of the awakened beast. The report is dramatic but not hysterical. Instead of large phrases it offers a collection of well-authenticated facts. Only in one sentence does it reveal how deeply the committee members have been moved by recent developments: "The Allied peoples are beginning to wonder if the considerable sacrifices they accepted in the course of an unprecedented war have not been suffered in vain."

It must have been hard for a man like Edouard Herriot, whom I heard only a year ago in Paris repudiate those cynics who were proclaiming the peace lost, to subscribe to such a comment. But a year ago Schacht had not yet been consulted by the American military authorities on the economic problems of the Western zone; the former chief of the Nazi General Staff, General Franz Halder, was not yet "cooperating with the historical division of the General Staff of the American army"; Franco had not yet, for all practical British and American purposes, been acknowledged as Spain's irreplaceable chief of state; and the Pope had not yet bestowed upon Perón a high Vatican order. It is only in the last year that fascists have been received and even welcomed into the Western democratic brotherhood. The struggle for recovery that in the past has followed the defeat of every ideological movement of similar proportions has been one of enviable brevity for the fascists. A few were sacrificed in the first flush of victory, but as one of the Nürnberg casualties put it before he mounted the scaffold, "individual Nazis, not Nazism, have been hanged."

The facts about Schacht and Halder are not taken from the committee report. It was the United Press which on June 18 reported that "[American] intelligence officers who have been questioning Schacht said his ideas for stabilizing German economy will be seriously considered." It was Karl von Wiegand who, having met the former German Chief of Staff "casually" in an eye clinic at Marburg University, reported on June 22 General Halder's present relations with the American army and his ideas about war with Russia. "Soviet Russia [said Halder] could be invaded through the White Sea and Archangel, and the invading forces could drive down toward the Volga River, the Mississippi of Russia in Europe. At the same time other forces could go through the Dardanelles into the Black Sea. Another army could advance from Turkey. Another from Greece and Thrace through the Balkans." A typical Nazi application of the Truman Doctrine. Though von Wiegand may have embroidered into the story some of his inveterate Germanophilism, the interesting fact is that a year ago Halder would have been more interested in saving his skin than in selling his solution for the world's present troubles.

It is in the light of the whole record that the committee's report should be read. To many names long since mentioned in The Nation, the committee adds those of Nazis occupying high positions in the Western zones. The man who practically controls the allocation of coal is Herr Helmut Kugler, not only a member of the Nazi Party but a former official of Hitler's Intelligence Service. The general director of the entire railway transport system in the British zone is Dr. Fritz Busch, another Nazi party member.

The report mentions other leaders of Nazi Germany who, more jittery than some of their countrymen like Herr Kugler and Herr Busch, fled to neutral countries during the war instead of awaiting confidently the future favors of the Allies. I was interested to discover an old acquaintance of mine recovering in Switzerland from his war-time hardships as a Nazi spy. It is the famous Baron von Stohrer, a man as huge as his audacity. In World War I he was the chief German plotter in Spain, and it was this valuable experience that led Hitler to send him to Madrid as ambassador at the beginning of World War II. Today he is supposed to be in charge of the whole Nazi diplomatic underground.

The committee charges that, in spite of Swiss assurances, "all German assets which were exported into Switzerland before the collapse of Germany and which belong to German or Nazi leaders who succeeded in escaping to Switzerland or other foreign countries remain in the hands of the latter [the Nazi leaders] today—even if temporarily blocked—and have escaped from the Allied powers." Thus fascism has not only reinstated its leaders but has saved enough funds to finance its revival. It is a revival in which almost every country, in one way or another, is involved. The report lists fascist activities in progressive Sweden as in reactionary South Africa. Fascism puts great hope in the United States, counting upon a favorable turn should the Republicans win in 1948.

The committee describes the insolent and defiant celebration last April in Italy of the anniversary of Mussolini's death. The report came too early to include such manifestations of fascism's rebirth as the incident in a public meeting in France where somebody jumped up and shouted, amid applause, "I have the honor of having been sentenced as a collaborator"; or the new provocative behavior of the Mosley group in Britain. But it gives full consideration to the situation in Argentina, whose capital has taken the place of Rome as Madrid long ago took the place of Berlin.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Divided Soothsayers

IT IS now thirteen months since the stock market began descending from its post-war peak, nine months since its violent break immediately after Labor Day. The pundits who claim that the market "always knows," that it is the best long-range predictor of the economic weather, felt certain last fall that a recession; if not a depression, was on the way. Month by month since then we have been given new warnings of the imminence of that recession, but it has still to appear. Recent stock-market action suggests an acute division of opinion between those who think trouble is just around the corner and those who are ready to bet on the prolongation of the present boom.

From early February to the middle of May the stock averages moved fairly steadily lower; since then the trend has been sharply reversed, and a large part of the lost ground recovered. However, many professional traders have been selling on the rise, for between May 15 and June 17 the short interest on the New York Stock Exchange rose from 1,314,391 to 1,540,493 shares. Publication of these figures on June 21 did not depress the market; on the contrary, the bulls decided that the bears would be forced to cover and so add to the buying pressure.

Who is right, the bulls or the bears? Will business maintain the present very profitable rate of activity, in which ease stocks on the whole are cheap, or are production, sales, employment, and profits about to start sliding downhill? The soothsayers of Wall Street seem to be getting very contradictory answers to these questions from their crystal balls. Thus in the latest issue of Barron's we find H. J. Nelson, "The Trader," full of good cheer. He points to the "sustained strength of retail buying," the generally sound inventory position, the unprecedented demand for heavy-industry products, record-breaking employment, and the new all-time peak in average weekly earnings, and concludes that "fundamental developments have become much stronger than such factors as the defeat of tax relief."

The editorial in the same issue of the same magazine reaches directly opposite conclusions. Its author rebukes President Truman for the optimistic tone of his tax veto message and, disagreeing with Mr. Nelson, interprets the denial of tax relief as definitely deflationary. "The special forces which have been sustaining business activity for so long," he declares, "now threaten to subside all together and not too many months hence."

In attempting to arrive at some conclusion about the rights and wrongs of this controversy it is worth while to review briefly the chief elements of the post-war boom. They are five in number—consumer restocking, inventory rebuilding, business investment, residential construction, and exports.

The flattening of the retail-sales curve since the beginning of this year suggests that consumers have satisfied their most urgent needs in many lines and are now buying more cautiously. At the end of 1946 retailers became alarmed about the size of their inventories and reduced orders drastically, particularly for soft goods. At the same time they took measures to clear their shelves of sub-quality and Ersatz goods. As a result the position of the big retail organizations now seems much healthier. Department stores have reduced orders-plus-stocks by $582,000,000 from their high point last August and brought their ratio to sales back to the pre-war figure. For the year to date department-store sales have been 11 per cent above 1946, but allowing for price increases this probably means a small decline in volume.

A recent Federal Reserve study shows that while many families drew heavily on savings during 1946, the total of personal holdings of liquid assets increased. Moreover, a larger number of consumers than in 1946 see good times ahead and may therefore be expected to spend freely. On the other hand, plans for purchasing houses and durable goods, other than automobiles, show a decline in comparison with last year. And nearly half the consumers interviewed expressed a belief that prices would go down, suggesting that some purchases may be postponed in anticipation. Nevertheless, the total of consumer purchasing seems likely to remain at a high level.

The rebuilding of inventories last year was a very important factor in sustaining economic activity, but the job is about completed. Industry is still adding to inventories but at a reduced rate, and the additions are to stocks of finished goods rather than to raw materials. The total, while high, is not abnormal in relation to the current volume of business, but any serious decline in business activity might start a dangerous wave of liquidation.

Business expenditure on new plant and equipment remains at a very high level. Plans call for an outlay of $3½ billion in the present quarter—a little more than in the first—and the total for the whole year is estimated at $14 billion compared with $12 billion in 1946. Investment activity on this scale suggests that business men expect to find a profitable outlet for increased production.

The abandonment of most building controls is expected to increase the volume of business construction. On the other hand, it is feared that as a result both labor and materials will be diverted from residential building and the present declining tendency in materials prices will be reversed. Housing officials in Washington predict that new housing contracts will fall off sharply in the next few months.

With the outlook for the chief components of domestic demand somewhat mixed, the maintenance of exports may prove decisive for the continuance of prosperity. As I pointed out on this page recently, exports have been phenomenal since the beginning of the year, but a sharp reduction is threatened because our foreign customers are rapidly exhausting their supply of dollars. It has been estimated that each drop in exports of a billion dollars means a million unemployed; so that if the current rate of $16 billion were reduced by no more than 25 per cent, the effects would be extremely serious. The United States, no less than Europe, has a big stake in the success of efforts now being made to find a sound basis for financing European recovery.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Romantic Survey

THE HIDDEN DAMAGE. By James Stern. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

FOR any thinking person who has spent some time in post-war Germany the most inescapable problem has been the sorting out of one's emotions toward the German people. The pity provoked by the misery and squalor and hopelessness of their daily lives is constantly in conflict with the thought of the unspeakable outrages of the concentration camps, and the German with whom one is in daily personal contact is compared to the Vansittart version until the head spins and one discards the problem as soluble only at the highest level of authority and the lowest level of human emotion.

No book on post-war Germany that has appeared to date has done very much to resolve this confusion of feeling; the expert accounts of such events as the Nürnberg trials and the plots against Hitler, though of the greatest interest, deal with events so remote from the average human experience that they almost belong to the realm of romantic fiction, while books about the German people are likely to be a jumble of statistics or hobby-horses for someone's particular prejudices. James Stern's "The Hidden Damage" is therefore doubly welcome in that it deals with the reactions of a highly sensitive human being to other persons and is a subtle and penetrating impression of post-war Germany written by a man who knew the country and the people thoroughly before the war, and who can view them now with understanding, compassion, and detachment, and record his impressions in vivid prose.

The book is primarily an account of Mr. Stern's trip to Germany, under the auspices of the War Department, as a member of a team engaged in determining what effect aerial bombing had had on the civilian population, but it is also the description of the romantic return of a passionate lover of Europe, in search of the past and with half an eye on the possibilities of renewing the affair.

That France and England can be embraced again with pleasure there is no vestige of doubt in the author's mind; he approaches them both with the excited trepidation and ardor of a man too long separated from his mistress, and neither he nor the reader is disappointed: toward Germany he is much more tentative—Germany is the adolescent love with whom it was finally necessary to part for reasons of temperamental incompatibility, who has changed with the years almost beyond recognition, but who can still be viewed with sympathy because of the early love, who is hateful because of certain characteristics developed with the years, but who still bears traces of what was once enchanting.

Mr. Stern was chosen as a member of the survey team because of his knowledge of the country and the language (he had worked for some years in a bank in Frankfurt, a job which he detested and from which he sought relief by working late at night as a barman in one of the more disreputable bars in the city). He claims to have had no particular talent as an interviewer, but whatever his faults may have been in this respect, they are undoubtedly his virtues as a writer. If his mind had not wandered from the prosaic questions of the Fragebogen—occupation and address before and during the war? did bombing affect health, work, or sleep? how many air-raid casualties were there in the family? what damage was done to the home? how were the electricity, drainage, and sewage systems affected by raids?—the reader would not have been rewarded by the wonderfully illuminating flashes with which every interview he records is graced: the old man who at the end of his questioning expresses the wish that the Jews "who went to America" will return to Germany because "unter den Juden we were always able to buy so much cheaper"; the bitter Red Cross nurse whose recalcitrance causes Stern to finish up his interview with her thus—"Not married?" "Nein." "And no children?" "I said I was not married." "I heard you. Maybe that explains a lot."

The best sections of the book, however, are the descriptions of the awful damage inflicted on the German cities and the accounts of the people inhabiting the ruins. Mr. Stern met many old friends and acquaintances, and not all are any longer sympathetic. The Schmorell family, whose son has been beheaded and who have been tortured by the Gestapo, are infinitely pitiable, but not so the attractive Gisela Dunkelmann and her circle of friends, whom Stern finds the most guilty of all, because as intellectuals they were, or should have been, the most aware, and yet they show no trace of remorse.

It is the author's ability to maintain a remarkable degree of perspicacity and detachment in his judgments, despite his memories and his affections, which makes this book such a valuable document for the student of Germany. As an aid to enlightened, wise, and unbiased understanding of the German people it should be made compulsory reading for our entire occupation forces.

ANTHONY BOWER

Vergil and Horace

THE GEORGICS OF VIRGIL. Translated by C. Day Lewis. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

HORACE: A PORTRAIT. By Alfred Noyes. Sheed and Ward. $3.50.

IN THE foreword to his translation of the Georgics of Vergil, C. Day Lewis states his belief "that every classical poem worth translating should be translated afresh every fifty years." Fair enough; sound enough; and raising interesting questions. What authority is to decide what classical poems are worth translating? Who is to do the translating into prose or verse? What enterprising publisher will engage to get Mr. Frost, if he knows enough Greek, to work on Theocritus, or Miss Millay, who does know enough Latin, to render the elegies of Sulpicia? Or Mr. Cummings to do the pattern poems of Simmias of Rhodes? Perhaps there should be a law—that every contemporary poet deliver a translation of some classical poem, within two, three, five years, failure to do so resulting in a suspension of his license.

Day Lewis has done a workman-like and readable job. Taking a leaf from Vergil's unfinished book, he has seen how the half-lines of the incomplete Aeneid added a wonderful, if accidental, grace to the long run of the hexameters; and he has deliberately broken his own six-beat lines with occasional short lines of three stresses. He has been as literal and line-for-line as possible, pointing out that didactic poetry is about the only kind that lends itself graciously to this kind of translation. Where the Georgics are didactic, Mr. Lewis's translation keeps them from seeming obnoxiously so; where they are not, as in the famous Orpheus and Eurydice story at the end of the fourth book, neither the translator's method nor his talent is equal to the occasion; but then whose would be?

An eminent enthusiast on agriculture, our own Louis Bromfield, contributes an introduction to this first American edition. (An English edition was published by the present publishers, the Oxford University Press, in 1940.) Mr. Bromfield's remarks are enthusiastic and idyllic, if not evangelical: what nobody seems to want to stress is that Vergil, for all the numerous contrasts he drew in favor of country as against city life, and in favor of the arts of peace as against those of war, nevertheless more than thought, he knew, that farmers had a hell of a tough time, and that farming was a continual battle. Tantae molis erat!

One would hardly suspect Alfred Noyes, that easygoing, folksy, rather careless, rather old-fashioned poet, of being the man to appreciate the elegance, the fastidious craftsmanship, the subtle music, of Horace, than whom no one, ever, better combined absolute precision with infinite suggestion. It is true that "modern" is almost a dirty word in Mr. Noyes's books; that he is diffuse and repetitious; that his convictions, at times, almost compel the reader to believe that, were Horace alive today, he would be receiving instruction from Monsignor Sheen. Mr. Noyes's enthusiasm is great, and his pretensions to scholarship modest; from the warmth and enthusiasm of his pages, from his real love of his subject, there is recreated, without too much false light or sentimental glamour, a stubborn, plausible, engaging little human being, a poet of the first order. There are, in Mr. Noyes's text, many moving passages; none as moving as the Latin selections he so generously quotes. Mr. Noyes's own "isometric" translations are quite good, though he sometimes has difficulty with the second person singular, apostrophe in our time being more or less of a lost art. Mr. Noyes makes clear that Horace was not, as our systems of education used to seem convinced, a poet for freshmen—nor for old fogies at the Union League Club either; you have to be a little mature, whatever your years, before you can begin to understand him. Mr. Noyes does understand, and what's more, he delights, and both the understanding and delight are conveyed to the reader with confidence in the judgment of the interpreter. What more could a poet ask, after two thousand-odd years? To have someone, with some sense, who knows and who cares; one has not been boasting, then, in predicting "Non omnis moriar." ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Old Jim Crow

JIM CROW AMERICA. By Earl Conrad. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

INTO THE MAIN STREAM. A Survey of Best Practices in Race Relations in the South. By Dr. Charles S. Johnson and Associates. University of North Carolina Press. $3.50.

IN READABLE journalistic style Earl Conrad has prepared a vigorous indictment of Jim Crow America. While there is little novelty in the indictment, it has been drawn up by a good reporter with an eye for interesting detail and dramatic contrast. Dissecting the scheme of socio-economic domination that masquerades in America as "a race problem," Conrad devotes good chapters to the triple exploitation of Negro women—to women, as Negro women, as unwilling concubines of white men; to Negroes in the labor movement; to Negro migration; to the new "literary renaissance"—the airing, that is, which the "race problem" has received since 1943; to the treatment of racial minorities in the "white" press; to the Negro press; to restrictive covenants; to the iniquity of unequal educational opportunities; and to the Negro issue in contemporary politics. Much of it has been said before, but it needs repeating; and Conrad has the knack of restating the familiar as though it were the news of the hour.

In a final chapter Conrad makes a point of major importance. While American liberals have been genuinely interested in the Jim Crow system, this interest has too often been of an intermittent, fitful, and oblique character. Jim Crow has usually been involved in liberal pronouncements as an after-thought; as something exterior to the central concerns of the liberal movement. If the liberals were to address themselves whole-heartedly and realistically to the task of uprooting the Jim Crow system, they would find that such an undertaking would raise every essential issue with which they profess to be concerned, and they might then find in 13,000,000 American Negroes and 3,500,000 Americans of Mexican descent the mass base for a powerful political movement. But to this day American liberals have been unable to see the strategic advantages in an all-out centralized assault upon Jim Crow. What is needed at the moment, as Conrad points out, is a single national pressure group made up of every element that has expressed an interest in the elimination of the Jim Crow system. "The phalanx of white friends of the Negro," writes Conrad, "although operating in labor, church, business, and other spheres, needs now to be brought into a great special camp, with the driving fervor of the old abolitionist movement." I believe, too, that Conrad talks great good sense when he writes that "the right 'button,' that which has historically and inevitably been dynamic in America, is white enlistment in behalf of the Negro." Today we have thousands of eager and willing volunteers, but as yet we lack organization and a general staff.

"Into the Main Stream" constitutes a good supplement to Earl Conrad's impassioned indictment of Jim Crow, for it is devoted to the thesis that some improvement in race relations is taking place in the South. Dr. Charles S. Johnson and his associates have struggled hard to making a showing (a) for the proposition that some improvement is taking place; and (b) for what might be termed the meliorist theory of race relations. It is difficult, however, to summarize their findings, for they have not attempted to draw any conclusions from the materials which they have so laboriously collected. The volume has a rather curious subtitle: "A Survey of Best Practices in Race Relations in the South." In the general context of what is termed race relations in the South, the word "best" stands out rather embarrassingly. Granted that improvements have taken place, just how good is the "best" that this current survey shows in Southern race relations?

Of 224 "inter-racial committees" formed between April, 1943, and July, 1944, 27 are in Southern cities, but most of these cities are located in or near the border states. Nowadays Negroes are permitted to vote in North Carolina and in certain Southern cities, but generally speaking, the franchise is still withheld in rural areas. Occasionally, by prearrangement, a Negro is elected magistrate in an all-Negro township. In some areas a few carefully selected Negroes are now called upon for service on grand juries. More Negro lawyers are admitted to the bar every year in the South, but admission is difficult, and the bar associations are still lily-white. Within the last decade Negroes have been added to the police force in a number of Southern cities for service in Negro communities, but usually with a qualification, stated or implied, that they are not to arrest white persons.

Also within the last decade welfare institutions have added, here and there, trained Negro personnel, and in general more provision is being made for Negroes in welfare programs. Jim Crow practices are giving way, very gradually indeed, in common carriers. The press of the larger cities has been making an important contribution to race relations by the fairness of its news coverage and its advocacy of various reforms. There are faint stirrings of conscience in the church, some betterment in housing and health facilities; and "better practices" are developing in some institutions, both public and private, notably in federal agencies. But this constitutes about the sum-total of the "best practices" that the industrious authors of this volume have been able to produce.

On the crucial issues their research actually demonstrates the absence of substantial improvement. For example, they report that there is "scarcely even a straw blowing" to indicate improvement in the working conditions of Negroes employed as domestics and in personal service. While war-time gains were made in industry, most of them took place outside the South, notably in the aircraft and shipbuilding industries on the West Coast. More Negroes are joining trade unions in the South, and here real progress can be noted. But candid admissions made throughout this survey serve to minimize the significance of the improvements which the authors note so hopefully. "Not a single college in Virginia reported even one full course on the Negro or on race relations"; "there has been no widespread increase in total Southern library facilities for Negroes"; "there is no state in the South where a distinct effort is made to reach Negroes with health facilities comparable to that directed toward whites"; and so forth. After making these repeated admissions, general in character, how much importance do the authors of this survey really mean to attach to the isolated "best practices" which they have so industriously garnered from current offerings in the South? How important are these gains measured against the Monroe, Georgia, lynching of July 26, 1946? While some improvement is taking place in the South, it is to be noted, so to speak, around the edges of the problem and is occurring for the most part within the framework of the Jim Crow system.

On the second point which seems to run as an implied thesis through this volume—namely, that the slow, gradual, meliorist approach to race relations in the South is the best approach—the verdict must be negative and on the very evidence that has been assembled to defend this contention. For the "best practices" are heavily counterbalanced by the "worst realities" in the South today. Here Earl Conrad might be said to have the best of the argument. "The liberals in the South," he writes, have never been decisive because they have rarely shown a "disposition to make the full demands which the situation requires. . . . While quietists and moderates make their snail's-pace gains, the neo-Confederates wait for the right situation to smash down heavily with their swift military blows that dash to bits the gentle talk and gentle action of the gradualists."

Why is there NO PEACE FOR ASIA?

In his new book, Harold R. Isaacs' tells about conditions in Asia since Japan's surrender, and shows why a billion people there must keep on struggling, as they struggled before the war, to win even a semblance of political freedom and economic security.

$3.50 at all bookstores

MACMILLAN

ANNALEE JACOBY SAYS:

"When correspondents talked of post-war books, the consensus was that Isaacs' would be a corker. And it is."—Annalee Jacoby, New York Times

HAROLD R. ISAACS

Author of The Tragedy of the Chinese Revolution

NO PEACE FOR ASIA

What is impressive about the evidence assembled in the Johnson book is the record, not of white penitence, but of Negro good-will. Some years ago the Georgia Federation of Colored Women, disturbed by the fact that there was not a single institution in the state for the care and guidance of Negro girl delinquents, bought a 130-acre tract, improved it, with funds provided by a WPA grant, to accommodate seventy-five girls, and furnished it with funds which they collected. Asked to accept as a gift the land and improvements, the Georgia legislature grudgingly agreed to do so and then refused in 1939 and again in 1941 to provide an appropriation for the support of a badly needed institution which had not cost the taxpayers a cent. In 1942 Governor Arnall finally got a small appropriation for the institution. Stories of this sort, scattered through the volume, indicate pretty clearly that the Negro is responsible for much of the improvement in race relations noted in the South in the last decade. CAREY MC WILLIAMS

Dostoevsky's Genius

DOSTOEVSKY: A STUDY. By Janko Lavrin. The Macmillan Company, $2.

HE WAS the first European novelist to explore the unconscious and annex it wholesale to modern literature." Thus Professor Janko Lavrin, opening his brief appraisal of Dostoevsky, proclaims what is for him of primary, compelling significance in the Russian writer's work—his preoccupation with the conflict, of a moral nature, raging within the individual. Professor Lavrin is understandably enthusiastic about his subject, and the enthusiasm leads him into a number of odd exaggerations whenever another writer than Dostoevsky is discussed ("Proust . . . the coldness of a peephole eavesdropper"); but in his own field of inquiry, regarding Dostoevsky as a psychologist who projected his own travail into the lives of his characters, he has some pertinent and well-expressed reflections to offer.

Dostoevsky's great talent lay in his ability to dramatize ideas. His men, and some of his women, are beset by a fervent desire for knowledge of God's existence. They are, however, not intellectually impassioned in this quest; at least, that is not the main-spring of their desire. "Dostoevsky tackled the problem . . . primarily as a psychologist interested in God as an active element in man's consciousness—an element which fills the latter not only with the highest longings but also with the bitterest doubts and torments." Dramatized, such a concept evolves into a tragic character of split personality, like Ivan Karamazov, in whom a rigorously logical skepticism wars with a will to believe. In him the issue at stake is voiced clearly and its implications are fully recognized, for he is intellectual; but in other characters the conflict is waged underground and not so sharply defined, or perhaps not joined at all on the level of consciousness. Kirillov—in "The Possessed"—sublimates a religious yearning to accept God in an atheism which conveniently sets up the new man as God. Raskolnikov, Stavrogin, and Ippolit—in "The Idiot"—are all absorbed, to varying degrees of intensity, in the questions of God's existence and man's freedom; they are exalted because within each of them both sides of the argument vie uninterruptedly in a spiritual tug-of-war. Only Prince Myshkin, in what is paradoxically the most skilfully constructed of Dostoevsky's novels, represents but one half of the good-evil dualism which subsists in Dostoevsky's troubled heroes.

In this twentieth century several authors—Joyce and Kafka, notably—have made a descent into the spiritual "underworld"; but in his own time Dostoevsky was blazing a new trail when he embodied antinomic features in one character by use of the split inner dialogue. He was always primarily concerned with mental stress, which drove the persons in his fiction to grave and violent outbursts; this emphasis on psychological cause led him to what Professor Lavrin calls "visionary realism," in contrast to the detailed realism of a Zola, who depicted the manners of an entire society.

Dostoevsky anticipated the modern attitude toward criminals when he sought to distinguish, in his memoirs of Siberian penal life, "The House of the Dead," between the supra-normal and the abnormal aspects of mental activity. Nietzsche wrote of him later,

"He was the only psychologist from whom I had anything to learn."

Professor Lavrin's book, which subjects the five later novels to a careful scrutiny of plot, as well as a thorough analysis of character motivation, is interesting and illuminating. It does not especially attempt to fix Dostoevsky's historical position with regard to the main body of European literature, nor does it calculate in any formal manner his influence upon succeeding writers of renown; but as an introduction it is provocative. PAUL HENISSART

Fiction in Review

IT IS not at all uncommon for light fiction to betray a deep hidden bitterness; the work of Angela Thirkell is a case in point. But it is rare indeed to come across a light novel which, like Rupert Croft-Cooke's "Miss Allick" (Holt, $2.75), announces an open anger. The theme of "Miss Allick" is the bad condition of modern literature, particularly of modern novels. It is a subject to which the author brings so much quiet passion that one must suspect him of having at some period in his career been that most unhappy of public readers, a fiction reviewer.

Mr. Croft-Cooke believes—and I agree with him—that in novels as in love people by and large get only as good as they ask for. He believes too—and I agree with him—that literature is no mere decoration of life but a true index of the health or sickness of a society, and that just as dictatorship, war, and all the other hideous phenomena of our political day undoubtedly answer a profound need in the modern mass-personality, so the debasement of our literary standards must reflect a loss of standards throughout our lives. The Miss Allick of Mr. Croft-Cooke's title is a governess with a firm determination to become a best-selling novelist. She succeeds—and not only once, but season after season. The secret of this grim lady's success is simple: she infallibly appeals to her times because she is her times. Her only values the easiest values of the moment, her opportunism indistinguishable from sincerity, Miss Allick is the perfect expression of a civilization diabolically contriving its own destruction.

There is a wonderful description of Miss Allick's dull fierce movement, as the cycles spin, from the romantic novel to bohemianism, to national pride, to social consciousness, to international politics—each step of the way hailed as a "classic" by the critics. Mr. Croft-Cooke's outline of the modern writing career might have been funnier, but it could not have been more accurate or better calculated to demonstrate the way in which literature marks our political directions; whatever liveliness is missing from "Miss Allick" is more than compensated for by its intelligence. And even the fact that Mr. Croft-Cooke's governess lacks convincing human quality, which we at first take to be a failure in character-drawing, assumes another significance as we grasp the full seriousness of the book's intention. Miss Allick's inhumanity is her author's final argument that it is monstrosity and not the human possibility that modern life and fiction celebrate.

Of the accumulated spring novels that I have been going through these last weeks I have so far found only one other, besides "Miss Allick," that seems to me to be worth noting—Henry Morton Robinson's "The Great Snow" (Simon and Schuster, $2.75). The story of what happens to a family—husband, wife, two children, and some guests—marooned in a country house during a twenty-day snowstorm, Mr. Robinson's novel, although primarily concerned with states of mind, has a nice excitement about it: it makes you look out of your window to be sure that you, too, are not housebound by a blizzard. It also stirs your Robinson Crusoe instincts. But it is less for these pleasant gratifications than for its human decency that Mr. Robinson's book must be noticed. "The Great Snow" is written out of an affection and hope for people that is almost obsolete in current novels, especially in novels which claim a psychoanalytical inspiration.

I think there is little question that the main motive in present-day psychiatric or psychoanalytical fiction is revenge, especially against the psychiatrists and analysts themselves. It is as if we wanted to turn our dubious understanding of the workings of the mind against the very people who first invited us to self-knowledge, tell them that they are mad before they might tell us that we are mad. This hostile attitude is of course new even in so-called Freudian fiction; up to a few years ago our chief impulse, as we tried to use the methods of analysis, was the impulse to make ourselves heroes rather than to make villains of the analysts. And heroism was mostly a matter of sensitivity: the more the writer could reveal of his own delicate mechanisms the more virtue and stature accrued to him. There was undoubtedly too much loving self-reference in our past performance, but at least it was a step short of what seems to be the current attitude—the need to assert ourselves by hitting out with blind passion against anyone who might question us.

In such a situation Mr. Robinson's novel, which regards the findings of psychoanalysis as an instrument of health, is something of a cultural anomaly. There is a good deal of muddle in Mr. Robinson's use of Freudian concepts, but this is of less importance than the fact that Mr. Robinson puts his Freudian principles wholly at the service of his characters, as a means of adding to their size and well-being. And he is never either didactic or mealy-mouthed about this purpose; to the best of his ability he tries to translate his clinical information into novelistic terms, and to avoid static resolutions. For instance, the most interesting passage in his book concerns the feelings of a markedly masculine father when he has to recognize the effeminacy of his young son. At first outraged, he gradually begins to see not only his own responsibility for the boy's character, but the kind of strength that resides under the son's seeming weakness. The result of this insight is no absolute happiness on the father's part, but merely an acceptance of the good-and-bad of which life is compounded—a larger humanity. It is this ambition for its characters that makes "The Great Snow" a mature and estimable novel.

DIANA TRILLING

Coming Soon in The Nation

"The Innocent Eye" by Herbert Read

REVIEWED BY IRWIN EDMAN

"Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism" by Gershom G. Scholem

REVIEWED BY HENRY P. VAN DUSEN

Films

JAMES AGEE

IF YOU regard all experiment as affectation and all that bewilders you as a calculated personal affront, and if you ask of art chiefly that it be easy to take, you are advised not to waste your time seeing Jean Vigo's "Zero de Conduite" and "L'Atalante"; go on back to sleep, lucky Pierre, between the baker's wife and the well-digger's daughter, if you can squeeze in among the reviewers who have written so contemptuously of Vigo's work. If you regard all experiment as ducky, and all bewilderment as an opportunity to sneer at those who confess their bewilderment, and if you ask of art only that it be outré, I can't silence your shrill hermetic cries, or prevent your rush to the Fifth Avenue Playhouse; I can only hope to God I don't meet you there. If, on the other hand, you are not automatically sent either into ecstasy or catalepsy by the mere mention of avant-gardism, if your eye is already sufficiently open so that you don't fiercely resent an artist who tries to open it somewhat wider, I very much hope that you will see these films. I can't at all guarantee that you will like them, far less that you will enjoy and admire them as much as I do, for they are far too specialized. I can only be reasonably sure that you will find them worth seeing.

"Zero de Conduite" is a forty-minute movie about a French boys' boarding-school. It is hard for me to imagine how anyone with a curious eye and intelligence can fail to be excited by it, for it is one of the most visually eloquent and adventurous movies I have seen. But its fullest enjoyment depends rather heavily, I believe, on subjective chance. I happen to share a good deal of Vigo's peculiar kind of obsession for liberty

"CENTURIES OF INTOLERANCE"

The documented record of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH & ANTI-SEMITISM. Should be read by everyone who wants to know the real sources of anti-Semitism, and the real reason for the continuance of this phenomenon despite the increase of education and enlightenment.

44 Pages of Documented Facts 25¢
5 copies for $1.00
Special quantity prices to organizations

AGORA PUBLISHING CO.
DEPT. 751NE
120 LIBERTY STREET NEW YORK 6, N. Y.

and against authority, and can feel this in particularly clear emotional focus, as he does, in terms of the children and masters in a school. So the spirit of this film, its fierceness and gaiety, the total absence of well-constructed "constructive" diagnosis and prescription, the enormous liberating force of its quasi-nihilism, its humor, directness, kindness, criminality, and guile, form for me as satisfying a revolutionary expression as I know.

On one seeing, anyhow, the film is quite bewildering, even if you understand its main device, as I was slow to do; but if you know the device, and accept it, the bewilderment itself becomes essential to the poem, and to your pleasure in it. As I see it the trick is, simply, that Vigo gets deeper inside his characters than most people have tried to on film, is not worried about transitions between objective, subjective, fantastic, and subconscious reality, and mixes as many styles and camera tricks, as abruptly, as he sees fit—always, so far as I can see, using the right style at the right moment, and always using it with force, charm, and originality. I assume that he intended, as one of his main points, to insist that these several levels of reality are equal in value, and interpenetrative; and I would accept this aesthetically for its enrichment of poetic perception, metaphor, and device, even if I rejected it intellectually.

It seems clear to me that on the wild level of "Zero," and on levels less adventurous, the unprejudiced eye could learn its way around such intricate treatment as naturally as it learned to link the many disparities which make up the basic vocabulary of conventional movies. Most movies, including many of the best, have been made timidly and under great handicap, with fragments of the movie alphabet which were mostly shaped and frozen by around 1925. In an important sense Vigo is far from "unconventional"; he is merely making much of the rest of the alphabet available. He has gone as far in this, I think, as Eisenstein or Dovshenko—in a very different direction, of course—and a great deal that he has done in this film, bold as it is, should be regarded less as inimitable experiment than as the conquest of more of the full ground on which further work can be done. It is as if he had invented the wheel. Many others were fumbling at it; some still are; but nobody of anything remotely like his ability is trying to find further uses for it; and one is sure to be branded as a solemn snob, incapable of "enjoying" movies, if one so much as dares to speak in favor of these elementary devices by which enjoyment could be enlarged.

The boys in "Zero" are seen as they see each other; the audience is one of them. Although they are much the hardest, most happily perceived children I have seen in a movie, in one sense they are sentimentalized. They have the aloof, dangerous beauty of young, wild preying animals; whereas some of the schoolboys I knew were merely unnoticeable, others were sick, others gentle or timid, and still others were safe-playing, sycophantic dolts from the day they were born—faculty members already. I wish they had been shown in this variety, however it might have complicated Vigo's child-worship and his anarchic fury. The teachers, however, are perfect. Seen as the boys see them or hope to see them, they are masterpieces of caricature, mainly ferocious, one coldly compassionate, one in the hyperboles of admiration. The sympathetic teacher who inspires them to revolt is a sort of lay Chaplin; another, an inspired epitome of the snoop, suggests Groucho Marx or, still more, a tiptoeing lobster dressed in an undertaker's suit; the headmaster is a pompous, murderous, shrieking midget.

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
80th ST.
80th ST.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
123th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
E3rd ST.

RKO NOW
RONALD COLMAN
'THE LATE GEORGE APLEY'
And Introducing PEGGY CUMMINGS
From JOHN P. MARGUARD and GEORGE S. KAUFMAN Play
—and—
'BEDELIA' VERA CASPARY Novel
Margaret LOCKWOOD — Ian HUNTER

BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN
BUSHWICK
DYCKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
WADSWORTH
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOUNG
Coney Island

"Engaging outdoor action."—N. Y. Times
RONALD REAGAN & Alexis SMITH
Zachary SCOTT
'STALLION ROAD'
From STEPHEN LONGSTREET Novel
—and—
"Merry little farce."—N. Y. World-Telegram
'LOVE & LEARN' Jack CARSON

QUEENS
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kew-Forest
FLUSHING
Kew-Forest
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLONIAL
B'way & E2 St.

STAGE PLAY

MELVYN DOUGLAS & HERMAN LEVINE present

"CALL ME MISTER"
THE NATION'S TOP MUSICAL REVUE

Songs by Harold Rome • Sketches by Arnold Auerbach • Staged by Robert Gordon

New York: NATIONAL Theatre, Air-Conditioned
Chicago: BLACKSTONE Theatre, Air-Conditioned

"BROADWAY'S BIGGEST REVUE HIT!"—Life Magazine

STAGE PLAYS

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."
—Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-9258
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

Please mention
The Nation
when patronizing our advertisers!

TO PLACE
AN AD
CALL
BARCLAY 7-1066

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN Present

In association with JOSHUA LOGAN
"A WELCOME HIT."—Coleman, Mirror
JOHN LOVES MARY
A New Comedy by NORMAN KRASNA
Directed by MR. LOGAN
MUSIC BOX, 45th Street, West of B'way
Air-Conditioned Matinees Wed. and Sat. 2:40

"A NEW HIT."—Morehouse, Sun
ELEN HAYES in HAPPY BIRTHDAY
A New Comedy by ANITA LOOS
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
BROADHURST, 41st St., West of B'way
Air-Conditioned Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40

"A SMASH HIT."—Life Magazine
ETHEL MERMAN
In the Musical Smash
ANNIE GET YOUR GUN
Music and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON Directed by Joshua Logan
IMPERIAL Thea., 45th St., West of B'way
Air-Conditioned Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

.. Give to help fight CANCER!..

There are so many wonderful scenes that I can mention only a few: the silent, mysterious opening, in which two boys in a railway compartment play out the most beautiful white-magic I have ever seen, with toys, tricks, and suggestions of competitive vice; a blood-slowing capture of paralysis of time on a Sunday, and on the carpet of the headmaster's office; a dormitory riot and procession, bearing a crucified teacher through a slow-motion storm of pillow feathers, which combines Catholic and primordial rituals and as an image of millennial, triumphal joy has only been equaled on film, so far as I know, by newsreel shots of the liberation of Paris. Vigo does some beautiful things, too, with subtly slurred rather than slow motion; and the stripped, mean sets and the occasional glimpses of pure naturalistic action are grim and firm as stone outcrops. Maurice Jaubert's score seems good but nothing extraordinary as music, but fitted with the film I like it as well as any outside Dovshenko's "Frontier."

(To be continued)

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

AT TWENTY I was as impressed by the late Paul Rosenfeld's "Musical Portraits" as most people were; but rereading it at thirty I could see that it was only a fancy rephrasing of generally accepted estimates; and what caused me to reread it and check my earlier impression was the conviction I had arrived at by this time that he did not really have the critical perception he pretended to in his writing. What little I saw of the writing after that always confirmed this opinion; and just recently it was confirmed again by his review of the program given by the American Ballet at the Metropolitan Opera House in the spring of 1937, which I found in an old issue of the New Republic.

The program consisted of three ballets of Balanchine with musical scores by Stravinsky: two of Balanchine's greatest works, "Apollo" and "Le Baiser de la fée," the second with one of Stravinsky's finest and most moving scores, and "The Card Party." And Rosenfeld wrote that the third ballet's "appearance of relatively colossal magnitude was somewhat illusory, flowing to a distinct degree from the fact of its companions' puniness: a puniness the consequence of wooden choreography combined in one case with a vital if languidly classical score, and in the other with an interminable fantasia on themes of Tchaikovsky's. . . . The choreography of 'Apollo' was utterly empty of poetry, effortful, and essentially at variance with the music. If that of 'Le Baiser' was less antagonistic to its score, it was largely for the reason that that composition itself is Stravinsky's feeblest."

On the other hand, W. J. Turner, who died in England last winter, was the most distinguished music critic of our time. An artist, a poet himself, he wrote about the qualities of Mozart's music, which are so difficult to describe, with a poet's penetration and precision of statement; and he had those illuminating insights which constitute the sole value of a critic's writing and are to be found in the writing of so few critics. Only the book on Mozart is still in print here; but you may be able to find others in the library: the one on Beethoven, the one on Berlioz, the collections of articles, the volume called "Music" (published in the Isaac Pitman "Art and Life" series).

An RCA Victor executive—in private conversation, and speaking, I was told and believe, as a disinterested music-lover—was reported to have expressed his amazement and impatience at the way some people talked and wrote about the superiority of the old Busch Chamber Players' recorded performances of Bach's Brandenburg concertos to the performances recently recorded by Koussevitzky with a small group from the Boston Symphony for Victor, when, this executive contended, anyone could hear how poor the soloists in the Busch performances were in comparison with those in the Boston.

Well, I can't: listening to the newly issued Boston performances of Nos. 2 and 5 (Set 1118; $4.85) and to the Busch versions I hear that Moyse and Rothwell produce fine tone with their instruments even if not as fine as Laurent and Gillet, that Eskdale is as good a trumpeter as Voisin, that it is Burgin's violin-playing which is poor in comparison with Busch's, and Foss's piano-playing which is even poorer in comparison with Serkin's. And I am amazed that anyone with claims to understanding should think there is nothing involved beyond the tone of the flute and oboe; that he should fail to hear and appreciate in the Busch performances what more there is that makes them the wonderful and exciting things they are—the relaxation, lightness, and grace, the sensitive accentuation of the bass, the balance and consequent clarity of the lines of sound in the contrapuntal texture and their sensitive inflection; and that he should fail to hear the opposites of all these things in the Boston performances.

Listening to the Boston performance of the Andante of No. 2 I became aware of a bareness in the sound of the accompaniment, and realized that it was caused by the fact that the two cellos were playing the bass-notes alone without the keyboard instrument prescribed in the score. The bareness was even more striking in the concluding Allegro, where long solo passages were heard far above the bass—so striking that it was clear that Bach could not possibly have intended this result, and that he had expected the keyboard instrument to fill in the harmony, as Serkin does in the Busch performance. Here is Koussevitzky, outraged by a biographer's statement that there were things he did not know and had to learn when he began to conduct the Boston Symphony, but revealing that today he still doesn't know, and can't even hear, the necessity of the keyboard instrument Bach prescribes for a performance of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 2.

Busch has been criticized for his use of a piano instead of a harpsichord; but the force of the criticism is lessened by the discretion of Serkin's playing. Its only flaw is the over-romantic style of his performance of the cadenza in No. 5; but this is better than Foss's lack of any style at all.

CONTRIBUTORS

ANTHONY BOWER, formerly Hollywood correspondent of The Nation, is on the staff of New Directions.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is the author of several books of verse, including "The Summer Landscape" and "Out of the Jewel." He will publish a new book of verse, "Forbid Thy Ravens," in the fall.

CAREY McWILLIAMS, staff contributor of The Nation, is the author of "Southern California Country," "Brothers Under the Skin," and many other books.

Letters to the Editors

All Is Not Well with China

Dear Sirs: The Chinese government has charged that the beaten-up and arrested students were Communists or their agents. Chiang, Chang Chun, and Wu Kuo-Cheng, the Mayor of Shanghai, have all said so again and again. None the less, that is a lie, pure and simple. Every simple person can see it. Even Dr. Hu Shih, who is certainly no Communist, called such a charge ridiculous nonsense.

The logic of the government is simply this: the Communists are against the government; the students who demand peace, democracy, salvage of education, and freedom from hunger are also against the government; therefore, the students are Communists or their agents. Since to put all the young men and women in jail is not feasible, killing, thrashing, and imprisoning their elected executives are chosen to do the trick.

Consequently, the professors sympathetic with the students and the reporters not misinforming the public are also Communists. Communists do not deserve to enjoy the common human rights—the government has made up its mind on that. And the government has police, military, Gestapo, and guttersnipe forces as well as an inexhaustible supply of paper and ink to print bank notes for paying those forces.

One cannot but let the democratic world know that all is not well with China. There follows a manifesto by seventy-six professors of Shanghai, issued five days ago:

Watching the recent nation-wide upheaval among college students with deep concern and close deliberation, we, professors at various universities and colleges in Shanghai, are of the opinion that the aspirations of the students are laudable and their requests legitimate, while the government's attitude and proceedings in dealing with the matter are unjustifiable.

By peaceful means the students have been asking for the salvage of education, the adoption of democratic policies by the government, the relief from the pinch of hunger, and the end of the civil war. No doubt if their wishes were taken cognizance of now and fully complied with eventually, the students as well as the nation at large would before long be happily lifted from the pit of suffering they are all in now. There is nothing to be feared in this movement of the students. Rather it clearly indicates that the nation is pulsating with a new spirit. China's own history is full of such regenerating instances, ancient and modern. But to our surprise and despair, the government chooses not only to ignore the resurgent will of the people as voiced by the young but to resort to hot-headed repressive measures. On May 18 the National Government of Nanking decreed its six "expedients in maintaining social order," and thereafter high-handed and disreputable steps have been unscrupulously and ruthlessly taken to suppress the student movement all over the country.

During the last fortnight large numbers of college students have been molested, brutally beaten up, arrested, and imprisoned on the false charge of their being "Communist agents" in Peiping, Tientsin, Nanking, Shanghai, Canton, and other big cities. Pistols, guns, bayonets, iron rods, and heavy wooden clubs bristling with nails or barbed-wire coils have been indiscriminately used to wound and to kill. Hundreds and thousands of government agents, including policemen, soldiers, gendarmes, and plain-clothes men, broke into dormitories at midnight to arrest students. Girls pulled out of their beds by the hair were not even allowed to put on day dresses before they were thrown into police and military vans to be rushed to jails. The arrests are being continued, and the arrested will not be sent to the courts. Nor is it known when the imprisoned will be set free or whether wholesale murder will be their common fate. As teachers of the young men and women, we have therefore decided to declare:

"We strongly condemn and protest against the use of brute force, on the part of the government, to suppress the student movement as well as the criminal violence employed and illegal arrests made by the government agents;

"We demand the immediate release of all students thus arrested and the government's assurance in good faith that such wanton abuse of power will not be repeated;

"We demand full protection for such basic human rights as freedoms of the body, of speech, of publication, of congregation, of the formation of societies, of lecturing, of demonstration, and of petition, and the instant abolition of the six 'expedients';

"We ask that the outlay on education in the country's budget be increased from less than 4 per cent to 15 per cent, which may be contrasted with the 80 per cent going to military expenditure; and

"We strongly urge the immediate ending of the civil war and the sincere practice of democratic policies by the government."

YANG WEN-PEU

Shanghai, June 6

We Learn from History . . .

Dear Sirs: When General Marshall recently advised Americans to study the Peloponnesian War, I got out my Thucydides, blew off the dust, and read, in an effort to find out just what he meant. I still cannot understand what he finds in Thucydides to recommend the policy he is pursuing in foreign affairs. I wonder if the General paid any attention to the causes of the war or if like most military men he was interested in nothing but the military details.

The situation preceding the Peloponnesian War was remarkably similar to the world situation today. The two great Mediterranean powers were Athens, a democracy, and Sparta, a totalitarian, communistic nation.

In Sparta, nominally a monarchy, all land and other natural resources belonged to the state; individual accumulation of wealth was prohibited, even to the possession of the smallest amount of gold or silver; and the use of wine or any imported luxury was strictly forbidden. Every activity of life from childhood to old age was regulated by law. Universal military training—really universal since it included girls as well as boys—furnished the government with the prime requisite for true totalitarianism. Art, science, philosophy, and all things that contribute to a free and liberal enjoyment of life were wiped out. The sole aim of the country was the militarist goal, complete and instant readiness to fight.

Athens was the heart of the world's democracy and had long been the center of learning and culture in the West. But it was no longer the true democracy of old, living simply and beautifully on the products of the soil. Its merchants monopolized the commerce of the Mediterranean, and individual wealth accumulated, while "plain living and high thinking" were no more. Athens had a navy which surpassed all other navies combined. It had seized bases and outposts all over the Aegean. It had made defensive alliances with two oligarchies, Regium in Italy and Leontini in Sicily, whose function was to curb Sparta in the West. It had an alliance with the other great naval power, Cocyra. It was in a position to cut off Sparta from its chief grain supply in Sicily.

Athens had already ruined Megara by economic boycott, because Megara would not side with it against Sparta. It was preventing home rule in Aegina. Urged on by the big-navy party and the greed of its merchants, it assumed that its manifest destiny was to control the Mediterranean world and eliminate the Spartan Communists. Its people were swamped with taxes, levied largely for the purpose of realizing the imperialist dreams of its militarists and merchants.

Voices were not wanting on both sides to warn that only ruin could ensue from the threatened contest for supremacy. Even among the war-loving Spartans old King Archidamus told his people that they were piling up woes for their children's children. But the Spartan militarists were sure they could win a speedy victory, and the Athenian authorities were equally confident.

After the war started, there were occasional efforts to make peace, but the militarists were always too strong and the conflict dragged on for years, with Sparta eventually the seeming victor but both parties so exhausted that they fell an easy prey to Thebes and Macedon.

ASA M. HUGHES

Lansdale, Pa., June 19

A Planned Economy

Dear Sirs: In order to bring down the very high and unreasonable prices of meat and thereby help the families of limited means every American should pledge his country at least two meatless days per week. Two meatless days per week will also do us good physically.

I also believe that we should strictly abstain from steaks and roast beef for at least thirty days. We have been eating too much steak and roast beef lately. This will likewise have a good effect on meat prices.

WILLIAM ROSS

Brooklyn, June 26

Crossword Puzzle No. 218

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 The outer man
- 5 High color
- 9 Scalding hot
- 10 Cure seen about last month
- 11 "Even copious Dryden wanted, or forgot The last and greatest --- to blot"
- 13 Bird allowed around a hostelry
- 15 Deliberate
- 16 Part of an animal's foot which doesn't reach the ground
- 17 Was carried away
- 19 In order
- 20 To the professor it might savor of a sinecure (4 & 5)
- 21 Bread upon the waters?
- 23 Dick
- 26 At no time (3 & 4)
- 28 Not the presiding deity of the Golden Age
- 29 The cock, none the less, shows people their turn of duty
- 30 A wild theory
- 32 Exceedingly hard, this
- 33 "-----" half-brother of the world! With something good and bad of every land"
- 34 Lacking finish
- 35 No longer a medicine of secret composition

DOWN

- 1 A man at last
- 2 Star of the belted one
- 3 If red, would end = began

- 4 Scandinavian legend
- 5 Denomination
- 6 Cry "Wo!" back
- 7 Wash even more than Sir Harry
- 8 It marks a look-out place
- 12 Glances which may prove fatal
- 14 Isn't one in suspense?
- 15 Parley in another language
- 18 Hard to tell where its tail starts
- 19 Ada leaves the fleet
- 21 Search in the bazaar
- 22 The original pawnbroker?
- 24 A commuter—on the L. I. route
- 25 A 36-inch limb?
- 26 Not come of age yet
- 27 They look one way and go another
- 30 Is it the way to end inflammatory diseases?
- 31 The most important thing

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 217

ACROSS:—1 GIBUS; 4 DAD; 6 DENIM; 10 TOSLED; 10 CARAVAN; 11 ANSWER; 13 POINJAY; 15 NATURAL; 16 INSETS; 17 ISLE; 19 SPINNER; 21 ASTI; 23 AIRING; 25 CRATING; 27 SUPPOSES; 28 TOSSES; 31 ONE-TIME; 32 LOOSELY; 33 DOSED; 34 NAP; 35 SEDGE.

DOWN:—1 GOTH; 2 BRUISES; 3 SOLVENTS; 4 DODO; 5 DOCTOR; 6 DERAIL; 7 NAVAJOES; 8 MONEY; 12 RASPS; 13 PUNNETS; 14 PAGEANT; 16 IDA; 18 EGG; 20 RIGOROUS; 21 TOPLESS; 24 IN-STRAD; 25 COPIED; 26 AEGEAN; 27 SNOOD; 29 STYLE; 30 CLIP.

RESORTS

everything is just perfect at the

Glenmere

(ask anyone who's been there!)

the Glenmere
CHESTER, NEW YORK
PHONE CHESTER 200-N.Y. PHONE RECTOR 2-5047

CHILDREN'S CAMPS

WALTELL HOUSE ON FRANKEL FARM
MT. BETHEL, PA.
VACATION FOR ALL THE FAMILY

Modern farm hotel combined with progressive children's camp, 75 miles from New York. All rooms with private bath. Meat, poultry, dairy products and vegetables from the farm.

Rates: — Adults $11 Week — Children $59 Week
N. Y.: Ella Frankel, 241 East 18 St. LE 2-5864

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your books and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-2
111 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

FUR REMODELING

Superb Workmanship and Styling
Economically

M. SCOTT FURS

236 West 30th Street New York 1, N. Y.
Longacre 5-4917

FARMS AND ACREAGE

80 acres; good 7-room house newly decorated; springs; woods; small brook; view; elevation; RFD road; profusion of wild flowers; no improvements. $4,000. Terms. Berkshire Farm Agency, East Chatham, New York.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2514 M.

COUNTRY BOARD

A FEW PAYING GUESTS in exceptionally beautiful spacious Vermont home on top of lovely hill overlooking all ridges of Green Mountains. RI 9-1974, mornings or evenings, or Box 1720, c/o The Nation.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 1 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order, ACE MAIL ORDER CO. East Orange 1, N. J.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

Classified Advertising Rates

74¢ A LINE (SIX WORDS)

Minimum three lines

Box No. counted as three words

Attractive Discounts for Multiple Insertions

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street New York City 7
HARLEY 7-1066

RESORTS

Yours for Vacation Enjoyment

HILLTOP LODGE

On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

48 miles from N. Y. C. • R. R. Station, Pawling, N. Y.
Every conceivable Sport and Recreation
... with intimate, congenial people
Many improved features for the new season!

Open from May thru October

Under direction of:
PAUL WOLFSON &
SOL ROTHAUER

New York Office:
103 NASSAU ST.
Cortlandt 7-3958

Gloucester, Mass.
Abram Resnick
Director

This Adult Camp...

Sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports.
Write for booklet and rates

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT

Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoe; interesting hiking objectives through woodland trails; fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping pong, square dancing.
JULY & AUGUST Rate: $55, $60, $65
OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

BREEZEMONT PARK

ARMONK, N. Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
the nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
Phone Armonk Village 955

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE

STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK

90 miles from N. Y. via N. Y. Central Charming lake and countryside, rustic surroundings. Fishing, boating, fishing, other sports. Beach walks. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for vacations and weekends.
Adults • Rate: $50
RESERVE EARLY
GRETE POPPER Tel. Stanfordville 241

Pine Crest

In the Berkshires

WEST CORNWALL, CONN.
— the beautiful Housatonic River
A delightful Adult Resort

Main House and Deluxe Bungalows for Two.
Boating, Swimming, Tennis, Bicycling, Music Recordings and Dancing.

DIANA & ABEL Berman
Phone—West Cornwall 85-12

Early Reservations Suggested
Private beach, golf, excellent fishing, outdoor activities, fine food.
T. H. FLAUM

From

WESTERN VIEW FARM

High in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an inn which in its twenty-eight years under the ownership-management.
Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week

TED OHMER

New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

RESORTS

The HEALTH REST

Dr. Alice Chase • Spring Valley, N. Y.
Enjoy a health-building vacation at this Vesperian Resort complete with sun-baths and exercises, special diets under professional supervision, cheerful, comfortable rooms, beautiful surroundings, stimulating activities. All this and more at moderate rates.

RESERVE NOW • Phone Nanuet 2316 or 907

MAUI'S SUMMER-RAY

North Branch Sullivan County, N. Y.
Telephone: Callicon 95 or 148
MUSIC, DRAMA, SPORTS, TENNIS, LAKE ORCHESTRA, COCKTAIL LOUNGE

NOW OPEN

WILLIAM GAILMOR, Lecturer, July 19th
For travel information, rates and reservations
Call City Office:
Daily 6 Ramercy 7-5089 Sunday, 6 Ramercy 5-2473

Deuel Hollow House

WINGDALE, N. Y. Phone 3691

In Berkshire foothills, 75 miles from N. Y. City on N. Y. Central R. R. Off beaten path, delightful hiking country. Delicious food served on terrace overlooking our private lake. Tennis, volleyball, badminton, boating, swimming and fishing.

Complete Informality — Adults

RAIZEL COHEN DAVID SACKS

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty and rest and relaxation. One hour from New York

ALL SPORTS IN SEASON

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7065

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477

Delightful ... swimming and boating on Different ... our private lake
Delicious ... charming colonial atmosphere
Different ... our unexcelled cuisine
Delicious ... our recordings for listening
Different ... and dancing
53 miles from NYC—Adults Only

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgely, Conn. • Phone 820
A MODERN RESORT OF DISTINCTION
Magnificent lake. All water sports and outdoor activities. Interesting and varied outdoor program. Excellent cuisine. New Low Rates

HATHAWAY LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 502-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Falls of the Sky." Luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces. Tennis courts, handball, badminton. Swimming pool, sun pavilion. Horseback riding. Golf course nearby. Delicious food. Easy transportation. American-Jewish cooking. Attractive rates.

For reservations or booklet write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 297

Enjoy a Wonderful Vacation at

COLD BROOK HOUSE

"On the banks of Esopus Creek"

A small resort with friendly atmosphere in beautiful surroundings. Tennis and other sports. Adults Rates $35 per week—Make Reservations Now!
COLD BROOK HOUSE, Boiesville, N. Y. Shokan 2648
Tel. Sundays only bet. 9-12 a.m., MAnsfield 6-5065

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 12, 1947

NUMBER 2

The Shape of Things

UNRRA ENDS ITS LIFE, ALAS, AT A TIME when the barest needs of human beings—food, clothing, medical supplies—are not being met in those countries where the war's devastation has been chiefly felt. Major General Lowell W. Rooks, UNRRA's retiring director general, was right in calling attention to the necessity of a global approach to "the global problem of world recovery." But he also pointed out that a special United Nations technical committee had estimated that $583,000,000 was required "just to meet the minimum subsistence imports for 1947 necessary to prevent collapse in the European countries hardest hit by the war." So far these funds do not appear to be forthcoming. The International Refugee Organization is ill-furnished even to discharge its task of caring for the 800,000 displaced persons still in Europe's camps. The International Children's Fund has to date only $560,000 in its treasury. The special relief appropriations for American aid to Europe are still stalled between House and Senate. Meanwhile, Greek school children have their lunches cut off—a life-saving 700 to 800 calories a day; seven out of eight Hungarian children have no shoes; in other countries the tuberculosis rate in children between 3 and 6 is rising ominously. The purpose of the Marshall plan was to get Europe off the relief list, to assist it in providing a base for the secure life of its people. But hungry people can't live off plans. Some of them should be brought to this country, as the Stratton bill proposes. For the rest, this wealthy nation must be prepared to hasten the work of the U. N. agencies already established and to carry the major share of the additional emergency relief activities needed to complete UNRRA's unfinished task.

✱

A NEW ACCOUNT OF AMERICA'S PHYSICAL contribution to a hungry world has just been rendered in the report of the Cabinet Committee on World Food Programs. In the past twelve months 18,433,000 long tons of grain and other foodstuffs were shipped abroad—the largest volume of food ever exported by one country in one year. This is truly a tremendous achievement, and a great tribute to the productivity of the American farmer. But as the report says: "There is no room for complacency in the general picture." The slow recovery of the war-devastated areas has been still further retarded by the terrible weather that struck Northern Europe last winter. For at least another year abnormally large shipments of food will be required, together with supplies of fertilizer and other aids to the restoration of European and Asiatic fields. With a record wheat crop now being harvested, the committee expresses hope that grain exports in the next twelve months may equal those of the past year. However, it points out that the total picture is clouded by uncertainties about the size of the corn crop, which has suffered serious damage in the Missouri and Mississippi floods. The probability of a short crop has sent corn prices soaring so that they are now nearly on a par with those of wheat. There is thus a danger that wheat needed for human sustenance abroad will be diverted to stock-feeding. The high price of meat encourages such diversion, and there are now no controls which the government can exercise to check it.

✱

FRANCO SHOWED ADMIRABLE RESTRAINT IN putting only at 80 per cent the majority obtained for his Law of Succession in last Sunday's plebiscite. Everybody had expected that the official figure would run at least to 90 per cent. The plebiscite proved itself the farce that we had anticipated and denounced. With proverbial good humor, the Spaniards caricatured the plebiscite. One man says, "What does it mean if we vote 'yes' or 'no'?" The other answers, "If we vote 'yes,' it means we want Franco to stay on as dictator. If we vote 'no,' it means we do not want him to stop being dictator." The correspondents of the New York Times and the Herald Tribune were in Bilbao on the day of the voting. They reported a heavy abstention in spite of the official threats of reprisals. If they had been able to observe the polling in other cities, their conclusion would have been more or less the same. The fascist regime will nevertheless exploit its "80 per cent majority" to try to convince the world that Spain has now fulfilled all the requisites that are needed to apply for membership in the United Nations. Señor Lequerita, the friend of Marshal Pétain and of Herr Ribbentrop and former Franco ambassador to Paris, is going to be dispatched to Washington on a special mission. We need hardly warn the delegates who come together in September for the General Assembly of the United Nations to be on the alert.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	29
Rent and Politics	31
Lewis—Still Champ	31
Molotov Splits Europe	32

ARTICLES

A New Weapon for Witch-Hunters by I. F. Stone	33
Faces of Spain by Kay Boyle	35
Troubled Times in India by Shiva Rao	38
Dixie in Black and White. VII. Kentucky's 1947 New Deal by A. G. Mezgerik	40
Canadian Labor and Political Action by Eugene Forsey	42
The Vatican and Democracy by Del Vayo	45
Everybody's Business. D-Day for Sterling by Keith Hutchison	46

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	47
Brod on Kafka by Irving Howe	47
Growing Up in Brazil by Evans Clark	48
"Monty" by Keith Hutchison	49
New Life of Wilson by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.	49
Hares and Trappists by Arthur Mizener	50
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	50
Films by James Agee	51
Music by B. H. Haggin	52

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 219 by Jack Barrett	55
---	----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

THE RANCOROUS DEBATE IN THE SECURITY Council over the report of the Balkan Commission reached a climax last week when Sir Alexander Cadogan asserted that if the Council could not apply the proposal to create a frontier commission to patrol both sides of the Greek border and try to ease friction between Greece and its northern neighbors, then "we had better tear up the Charter and pack up." It was a sharp and exasperated retort to Mr. Gromyko's contention that such a border patrol would be an invasion of the sovereign rights of the nations concerned. On the general findings of the Balkan Commission one would expect a clear-cut divergence of views between the eastern and the western nations. But it seems to us that Russia did not need to give up its contention that the Greek war is primarily a civil war in order to accept the commission's one constructive recommendation. It could have insisted on a border commission of such outstanding impartiality that it would listen as attentively and act as energetically when Albania accuses Greece as when Greece accused Bulgaria. Unless Russia really intends to encourage border warfare, it would cost it nothing to support the commission's proposal. And the effect here would be astonishing.

✱

THE CONCERT OF NATIONS IS FULL OF SOUR notes these days, and even attempts at international duets are not very successful if one of the participants is a Russian. British husbands of Russian wives whom they married and left, pro tem, in the Soviet Union, sent a delegation to interview Molotov during his recent brief visit to Paris, the object being to persuade the Kremlin to let the ladies out. The results of this petition have not been divulged, but meanwhile a Canadian, one George Okulitch, formerly military attaché at the Canadian embassy in Moscow, has revealed the answer he received from Andrei Y. Vishinsky when he asked for an explanation of the refusal to let his Russian wife accompany him home to Canada. It runs as follows:

We have no racial prejudice as to whom our women may marry. But it is up to us whether or not they leave the country. . . . The duty of a Russian woman is to produce Soviet children—not children for the Canadian government. . . . Most women who marry foreigners are of the wrong type to be examples of Russian womanhood. They try to exchange the hardship of building Russia for the ease of other countries. Women talk too much and thus they give the wrong impression of the Soviet Union.

We doubt whether any woman, if she talked for a week, could give a less favorable impression of the Soviet attitude toward children, women, capitalism, and international cooperation than Mr. Vishinsky has done in half a dozen sentences. He assuredly talked too much.

Rent and Politics

EGGED on by the real estate lobbies, blandly ignoring warnings that the terrible housing shortage rendered continued firm control of rents imperative, Congress sent HR 3203—the Housing and Rent Act of 1947—to the President on June 19. It was assumed that he would sign it, for Congress had in fact left him no alternative but to let rent control lapse completely on July 1. The Republican authors of the bill naively calculated that the President would thereby share full responsibility for a measure which they realized contained plenty of political dynamite. Consequently, when Mr. Truman added to his signature a message bitterly attacking the act, they were both shocked and hurt. Senator Buck of Delaware went so far as to deny the chief executive the right to criticize legislation he had signed—a strange new constitutional conception. He accused the President of “undermining” the law from motives of “pure politics.”

We need not take this outburst of indignation too seriously; to the politician the other fellow's politics are always suspect. However, the anger of the G. O. P. Senators does seem to us revealing. Clearly, when they passed this bill, they were hoping to have their cake and eat it; they wanted to appease their real estate friends without stirring up the public too much and they hoped to gain both objectives by a measure which combined the shadow of control with the reality of decontrol. No wonder they were disturbed when Mr. Truman gave a lead to the voters.

Actually, no words from any authority were needed to spark public indignation. The act speaks for itself and the avidity with which landlords have seized upon it as a way to boost rents has been more than enough to create an uproar boding no good to a number of Congressmen. At best, the act offers tenants protection only to the end of 1948, when the housing shortage is likely to be hardly less acute than today, and then only to those willing and able to pay an immediate 15 per cent increase in rent. Hundreds of thousands of families living in hotels, tourist camps, and recently completed houses, are left entirely defenseless in the face of demands for rent increases of up to 100 per cent. The reaction could easily have been foreseen—spontaneous organization of tenants associations and loud demands for local remedial legislation.

While acting to make shelter dearer, Congress has also acted to make it scarcer. As Mr. Truman properly pointed out in his message, the act repeals almost all the emergency aids to housing provided by the Veterans Emergency Housing Act of 1946. It eliminates virtually all the controls designed to prevent diversion of labor and materials to non-essential building. Consequently, we can now expect more hot-dog stands, filling stations, and movie theaters, but few houses at prices veterans can afford. No doubt it will be argued that the act gives new incentives to speculative builders. What if they do concentrate on luxury homes and apartments? Won't those who move into them leave their present homes to people a rung lower on the economic ladder? And won't a succession of vacancies all down the line eventually make room for those at the bottom? It's a pretty theory but, according to a report by the New York Citizens Housing Council issued last weekend, only one of three families buying new homes leaves a dwelling unit which might become available to another family. Ergo, the theory, insofar as it works at all, works mighty slowly. The housing crisis is too desperate to be met by leisurely laissez faire. We need action immediately. The least Congress can do to atone for HR 3203 is to defy the real estate lobby and pass the Taft-Ellender-Wagner bill before adjourning. It is a grossly inadequate measure but it takes a first step toward the only solution for the problem—public housing.

Lewis—Still Champ

EVERY aspect of the coal situation is loaded with mockery, with John L. Lewis as the principal mocker. As this is written, a settlement appears to be shaping up which, while probably averting a major strike or one of long duration, will provide the miners' leader with many a reminiscent laugh in the year to come.

Among the targets of his humor is, first, the general public, whose coal will cost from 70 to 75 cents more per ton under the reported terms of the contract now emerging from discussions with Northern operators.

Second, there are the Southern operators, who last week-end were in the pitiful and ludicrous state of being completely ignored. For the past three months they had been valiantly marching up the hill, with their banners of independence streaming and battle cries of unyielding sternness on their lips. When last heard from, they had marched down the hill again, having abandoned all weapons but a willing fountain pen. They were begging soulfully only for a chance to meet with the great man.

Third, there are the professional government-baiters, mostly in Congress, who have been complaining ever since 1941 of Administration sell-outs to Lewis, through War Labor Board awards or direct contracts. It turns out, however, that Lewis has won infinitely more concessions from those hard bargainers, the operators, than he ever did from the weak-kneed bureaucrats.

Fourth, there is the C. I. O., whose 1947 wage-increase formula, the 15 cents package, Lewis has more than doubled.

Finally, there are the framers and supporters of the Taft-Hartley Act. The contract now being worked over removes the U. M. W., for a year at least, from a large number of the law's requirements. The contract terms may be expected to serve as pattern language for many other strong unions.

If a coal settlement across the boards takes place in the next few days, as now seems likely, it will be a blow in particular to Representative Hartley, the tuppenny Taft. That frenetic little man had devised a veritable arsenal of weapons against Lewis, sometimes as many as two, mutually contradictory, in twelve hours. Labor peace on the basis of a contract arrived at through collective bargaining, without government interference, is enough to make him wonder whether anything is sacred any more.

Molotov Splits Europe

IT IS the irony—and the tragedy—of Molotov's Paris refusal that he has made inevitable the situation Russia most fears, the division of Europe into two parts. Moreover, he has made it inevitable that with American assistance Western Europe will now be organized into an economic whole. Worst of all, he has made it extremely likely that the recovery of Eastern Europe will be indefinitely retarded, that region now being cut off from the industrial resources of Western Europe and the additional help that will come from America.

We need not go too deeply into the grounds for the Soviet decision. American post-war policy up to and including the Truman Doctrine could be interpreted as fumbling efforts to mobilize the resources of the western democracies against Russia's western expansion. Soviet ideology makes the conflict between American capitalism and Soviet communism appear inevitable. Moreover, the rigidly controlled economic system of the Soviet Union—which has been projected into the neighboring territories to the east—may have suggested to Russia a similar plan of Western European organization which would hold only menace for a competing scheme of society. What was not taken into account is the fact that both England and France had already refused to accept the Marshall plan as an extension of the Truman Doctrine and that in the plans for a "Committee of Cooperation" which Bidault formulated there was no suggestion of a tight economic union that would menace the sovereign integrity of any nation. The sacrifice of national sovereignty demanded was far less than that called for by adherence to the Charter of the United Nations.

The course of European recovery which will now be followed will be subject to severe limitations. For Eastern Europe is rich in those resources needed by the west—agricultural products, coal, oil, electric power, lumber, fertilizers. Western Europe, heavily industrialized, is capable of supplying the manufactured articles, industrial equipment, and farm machinery that Eastern Europe desperately wants. The recovery of both sections is so interdependent that it is little short of a major catastrophe that the line drawn at Yalta has been now transformed into what appears to be an unsurmountable barrier.

The political consequences of this division—itsself springing from political causes—are hard to estimate. The recovery of Western Europe will proceed, for it appears that the majority of Western European nations are prepared to come together this Saturday to work out a common plan. But there is no doubt that the non-Russian character of the cooperation is quite capable of being given an anti-Russian emphasis. The American Congress, for example, already indoctrinated with anti-Russian venom, will find it easier to grant substantial credits for Western Europe organized against the east. And if the Communists in the western nations attempt to sabotage the new program they will undoubtedly strengthen the hand of the right.

What may balance this tendency is the first set of European democracy against any revival of right-wing capitalism. This is true of England, France, Belgium and the Netherlands, the Scandinavian countries, and Italy. In all these countries the remarkable recovery since the war—in some the industrial-production index is beyond that of 1939—has been carried out along the lines of semi-Socialist planning. In each of these countries the Socialist forces are a major political factor. In each of them the right is on the defensive.

The major consideration in Western Europe's acceptance of the Marshall plan has been an economic one. The post-war comeback, remarkable though it has been, has been seriously limited by deficits which can only be met by outside help. The slowness of the Ruhr's rehabilitation, added to England's coal crisis, has deprived Western Europe's industry of its major source of power. This has had to be augmented by American coal—which since the end of the war has been flowing in at the rate of 20,000,000 tons a year. The reequipment of Europe's industries must depend upon American imports. American food must feed Europe's mouths. But during the past few months the lack of American dollars has become acute, and in the words of a recent United Nations report, Europe is nearing "the brink of economic breakdown."

This threat of collapse was probably the major factor in bringing the Marshall plan into being. For American industry, dependent as it is upon foreign exports, would be shaken to its foundations by economic disaster in Europe. The drain upon American resources when the plan goes into effect will not be light. The two American government committees and the third one recently named by the President under the chairmanship of Secretary of Commerce W. Averell Harriman, will have no easy task mapping out the American end of the program and selling it to the American people.

The best that can be hoped from the Marshall plan is that Europe, put back on its feet economically, will cease to be torn between the polar attractions of two great world powers, the Soviet Union and the United States, and will develop stability of its own. It will, in fact, become a third bloc, providing a balance between the two giants. Its mixed economy and its political liberalism will be a compromise between the capitalism of North America and the totalitarian socialism of Russia. But what is important is that, even at this stage, the door of Western Europe be left open toward the east. After the heat of the present crisis passes, it may well be that a number of the eastern countries will want to resume the economic relations with the west that have already been begun. The suggestion in Bidault's statement last week that "the plan be submitted to the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe" and that "The 'Committee of Cooperation' and subcommittees shall keep in close contact with the secretariat of the Economic Commission for Europe" should be included in the final decisions reached after the present Paris meeting. For our hope is that the political considerations which last week blocked an all-Europe scheme of cooperation may in due course be superseded by the economic logic that operates against the permanent division of Europe into two airtight parts.

A New Weapon for Witch-Hunters

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 3

THERE were moments during the trial of Carl Aldo Marzani when one imagined oneself back in pre-revolutionary Russia. In the prisoner's dock was a young man of poor family. He had made a brilliant scholastic career, won a scholarship abroad, settled on his return in a working-class neighborhood, and been drawn into the radical movement. The testimony of a police spy and agent provocateur was now sending him to jail. The old czarist files must contain many such cases. The files of the American government will contain many more if Marzani's conviction is upheld on appeal. For this trial, which the prosecution frankly labeled a test case, threatens to establish a precedent by which many past and present government employees may be sent to jail. Ostensibly they will be punished for having made misstatements in qualifying for government employment, as Al Capone was sent to prison for making a mistake in his income tax. Actually they will have come up against a new device to prosecute for opinion.

The Marzani case must be seen against the background of the anti-red hysteria which is driving intellectuals of all sorts out of the government, and beginning to give social life in Washington the jitters. Much of the Congressional snarling about reds has focused, oddly enough, on a department—State—which has always had fewer radicals and liberals than any other branch of the government except War and Navy. The atmosphere developed has made life in the State Department exasperatingly difficult, not only for a scattered few New Dealers, but even for enlightened conservatives like Dean Acheson and Will Clayton. "I guess," one State Department official out of Wall Street said despondently when I spoke with him the other day, "they"—meaning Congress—"just suspect anybody who's been abroad." A dishonorable factor is the undercover alliance between Congressional witch-hunters and certain men in the old branches of the department hostile to new blood brought in when State absorbed various formerly independent agencies dealing with economics, information, and intelligence.

An additional factor in the demoralization and panic spreading in the department's rank and file is a campaign from sources outside Congress to equate resistance to reactionary foreign policies with disloyalty to the United States. This was already apparent in some of the attacks on Spruille Braden's opposition to Perón. It is strikingly evident in John Chamberlain's letter to the new Under Secretary, Robert Lovett, in the June 30 issue of Life. Chamberlain spins a web of doubt around those in the department who are opposed to the Kuomintang. If allegiance to the United States is to be identified with allegiance to Chiang Kai-shek, it is easier to understand the panicky manner in which the department last week dismissed ten employees on what might be described not too unfairly as suspicion of suspicious association with suspect characters. They were not only dismissed without a hearing but without a statement of charges against them and without notice to their superiors. Under the McCarran rider to its war-time appropriations act the department may dismiss employees in just such an arbitrary manner when it believes there are security reasons. But those who remember the department's readiness to make similar sinister but later disproved charges in the "Case of the Six" two years ago will not have too much confidence in Secretary Marshall's vague allegations of "indirectly keeping company" with foreign powers. At least in this case the names have been withheld from the press. The ten dismissed, like Marzani, were from the newer branches of the department. If Congressional uproar forces publication of their names, some may meet Marzani's fate.

I. F. STONE was formerly The Nation's Washington editor. He is the author of "Underground to Palestine."

Marzani is Italian born, the son of a minor anti-Fascist official who came to this country in the early '20's and settled near Scranton, Pennsylvania. Marzani worked his way through school and went to Williams, where he was editor of the college literary paper and won a Rhodes scholarship. He had a year at Oxford, visited Loyalist Spain—a damning fact in Washington today—and returned in 1939. He and his wife settled on the East Side, and he taught economics for a while at New York University. He did not come to public attention until last fall.

Marzani, to put it mildly, hardly fitted into the State Department. His own opinions—opinions he did not hide—were pretty much those of a fellow-traveler. He was uncomfortable in the department, to which he had been transferred with the remains of the Office of Strategic Services. Efforts were made to get him fired immediately on his transfer there in the spring of 1946. Marzani wanted to resign but was urged by his superiors to stay on. He began to organize a business to make films for labor unions and took a leave of absence last summer to do a film, "Deadline for Action," for the United Electrical Workers. General Electric and other firms bought prints to show at private meetings as a horrid example of red propaganda. The film was attacked in the New York World-Telegram as "communistic." The heat was on. Marzani resigned from the State Department in November after being assured that he was not resigning under fire. But a month later the department informed him that he had been discharged, and in January he was indicted. He has been sentenced to from one to three years in jail and denied bond pending appeal.

The indictment was framed in terms calculated to make the hair bristle on the heads of Southern Congressmen, and reflect credit on the sleuths of the State Department. Marzani was accused of falsely denying that in 1940 and 1941 he did "counsel and instruct Communist Party members to sow resentment and discontent among Negroes by agitating the question of racial discrimination. . . ." It was charged that he did "instruct divers Party members concerning a plan, policy, and program . . . for . . . disintegration of the morale of the Military Forces of the United States . . . to the end that the Communist Party might gain control thereof and thus bring about a revolt against the Capitalist System. . . ." It was charged that he did "urge Communist Party members to protest to their Congressmen against the passage of an anti-strike bill." The nature of the indictment—not for Communist activities but for false statement to government investigators—made possible rulings which fatally handicapped the defense when Marzani came to trial. The prosecution could lug in an inflammatory matter of this kind to show how Marzani served the Communists, but the defense was limited to character witnesses and Marzani's denials.

Marzani's defense never really got into the record. The jury was told that in 1940 and the first half of 1941 Marzani operated on the East Side of New York as a branch organizer and section educational director for the Communist Party under the name of Tony Whales. During the last half of 1941 and the early part of 1942 Marzani, under his own name, was active in the same area as executive secretary of the East Side Conference to Defend America. Thus many people must have seen and heard him in both capacities, and one wonders how he could have been cleared for government employment in 1942 if he had been openly active as a Communist official under such circumstances. The transcripts of Marzani's questioning in 1942 and 1943 by the FBI and the Civil Service Commission show that the government knew of the Tony Whales charge. Marzani admitted then that he had once circulated a Browder petition but denied having been a member of the Communist Party under the name of Whales or any other. The upshot of the rather extended investigations and hearings at that time was his clearance for government employment. He went into the OSS, first as a civilian, then with military status as deputy chief of the branch which prepared complex data for quick presentation to the General Staff. He went to the State Department when it absorbed the OSS. Marzani's war record, highly commended by his superiors, was not challenged.

The key witness against Marzani and the only one who testified to the highly improbable speeches which formed the basis for the more horrendous sections of the indictment was a New York City policeman, Archer S. Drew, who was assigned to spy on radical activities on the East Side. Drew's testimony showed that he also acted as an agent provocateur. He is a Negro, and one of the organizations he was to watch was the National Negro Congress. When he found no branch in existence on the East Side he proceeded to form one and to recruit Negroes for it. Drew's reports were the source of the Whales story, and these were available to other government investigating agencies at the time. One is forced to assume that the FBI and the Civil Service Commission did not put much stock in those reports or Marzani would never have been cleared in 1943. But Marzani was unable to subpoena the records of these agencies, and the judge, Raymond B. Keech, kept the question of the past inquiries out of the trial.

Judge Keech also barred evidence which seems to indicate that even the New York City police in September, 1941, did not credit Drew's identification of Marzani with Whales. At that time Drew's reports were available in the Police Department. Marzani had just been made executive secretary of the East Side Conference to Defend America. The organization was investigated by Inspector O'Brien, and he told the chairman, Meyer Goldberg, then a Republican member of the City Council, that he had information showing Marzani was a Communist. Goldberg, now a member of Dewey's state Labor Mediation Board, came to Washington prepared to testify that he went with Marzani to O'Brien's office. The Inspector withdrew his accusation and apologized after talking with Marzani. In February, 1942, O'Brien voted to elect Marzani executive secretary of the Office of Civilian Defense on the East Side. Judge Keech refused to let Goldberg testify, and shut Marzani off with a rebuke when he tried to get the O'Brien incident into the record.

Drew could not have been produced as a witness at the Civil Service Commission hearing given Marzani in April, 1943, because that would have ended his usefulness as a spy. But later that year Drew was exposed and expelled from the Communist Party as a police spy, and if the government believed his Whales story it should then have tried Marzani for perjury. That it did not do so but on the contrary retained him in a confidential post leads one to believe that checks by other investigating agencies had failed to support the identification with Whales.

Here we come to the crucial point in the Marzani case. Under the statute of limitations the government last winter was no longer able to prosecute Marzani for perjury. It got around this by using an act passed by Congress in 1944 to extend the statute of limitations until three years after the termination of hostilities in the case of fraudulent war-contract claims. If the Marzani conviction is upheld on appeal, the government can use this same statute to send other liberals or radicals among its present or past employees to jail. As in the Marzani case, it need not prove attempt to defraud or misconduct in government employment. It need only show misstatement in the original interrogations under oath to which all government employees are subject. And if, as in the Marzani case, a jury can be persuaded to believe what the Civil Service Commission disbelieved, the unlucky government employee faces penalties of up to ten years in jail and a $10,000 fine for each misstatement. That's what hysteria is for.

Faces of Spain

BY KAY BOYLE

Madrid, June 2

THIS spring the foodstuffs in the markets of Spain, even in the poorest quarters of the cities, are as lavish in color, quantity, and quality as they were six years ago. And, just as six years ago, the brilliance and affluence of the Spanish markets shock the traveler who crosses the frontier from France. The ancient, unappetizing carrots, the yellow, undersized cauliflower, and the molding potatoes of the Paris markets would be looked upon as refuse in the markets of Madrid. Tomatoes, oranges, bananas, lemons—all scarce to the point of non-existence in Paris—are piled high on stall after loaded stall. Parisian housewives, accustomed to standing in line to procure one or two "steaks" of fish once or twice in the week, would reel before the fish counters of Spain gleaming with sea-food of every variety, including the standard fare of shrimp and octopus. Stalls hung with chickens and richly stocked with hams, goat-milk cheese, and cream cheeses alternate with the endless, profligate display of bananas and oranges, bananas and oranges, for a mere handful of which French mothers would stampede. But there is a nightmarish quality of illusory plenty about these great popular markets, for it is a phantom population which moves between the counters. Few middle-class families, and even fewer working-class families, can afford the prices they are asked to pay.

There are two distinct and separate faces to the country, and the instant one sets foot on Spanish soil one makes the choice deliberately as to which face one selects to see. There are, for instance, two San Sebastians, both on the same site, just beyond Irun, across the frontier. One is a bright little casino town, a flourishing little sea-coast town, complete with resort beaches and a fishing fleet. The other San Sebastian is a Spanish border town where the police are particularly active, and whose prison holds many men of the surrounding countryside accused of serving as guides to shepherd fugitive Republicans across the frontier. Miranda, on the railway line to Madrid, is not only the station where the Irun-Madrid express stops for thirty-five minutes so that the passengers may stretch their legs and dine on ink fish in the buffet. It is also the town in which one of the worst prison camps in Spain is situated, a place of such foul repute that this story is currently told of it. Six months ago a group of foreign newspaper correspondents asked the Spanish authorities for permission to visit the Miranda prison camp. The permission was granted but only after a fortnight's delay, about which the reporters drew their own conclusions. They had been informed through underground sources that the sanitary conditions of the camp were indescribable and that owing to overcrowding and malnutrition the death rate was as high as three to five a day. The suspicion that the Spanish authorities had utilized that two-week period to remove some of the prisoners and to clean up the camp was strengthened when an official committee made its appearance in a fleet of cars, drove the newspapermen to Miranda, wined and dined them in the best Spanish style, and then proceeded with them to the tour of the camp. The conditions which the correspondents found there, however, were far worse than anything they had anticipated, and one of them said as much to the official interpreter. "Tell the gentlemen," the smiling spokesman of the committee replied, "that he should be grateful we did not permit him to come here two weeks ago."

KAY BOYLE, the well-known novelist and short-story writer, sends The Nation frequent accounts of significant events that have come under her eye in Europe.

Those who do not care for the face of misery will point with pride to a building under construction on the Calle de Serrano in Madrid. It is cool and streamlined, being fashioned of pure white and pearl gray stone. It occupies better than two city blocks, and it will house the Air, Army, and other Ministries when it is done. But just behind it is an open lot, and anyone may call upon the people who have fashioned tunnels and caves of habitation in the hard-baked soil. Twenty to thirty families, neither gypsies nor outcasts but working people who could not find living quarters, have dug themselves homes in the white sun-baked earth and settled permanently there.

I was taken to visit one of these families by a friend who had served in the Republican army with the father. The father is a carpenter's helper, a man in his early forties, who shook hands with us when we met on the beaten-down path which winds between the arched, dark human-rabbit holes. He wore a ragged, striped shirt, blue cotton trousers, and a threadbare tweed cap on the side of his head. He had a soft, quick smile, and he accepted a cigarette with pleasure. As he talked to us, the curious heads of neighbors appeared in the openings of the other caves. He said that after finishing a four-year prison term at the political prison of Alcalá de Henares he had been unable to find living quarters for his family, so he had dug the two-room cave for them. He and his wife, with their children, and his mother-in-law, had been living for three years there.

The descent into the cave is not easy, as one must enter in a crouching position, at the same time keeping one's balance on the two blocks of wood, one atop the other, which serve as steps. Inside, the sunlight vanished as if a curtain had been drawn, and it took a moment for the sight to grow accustomed to the dark. Then you saw the shelf chiseled smoothly in the earthen wall on which stood the eating and cooking implements, the small charcoal stove, the broken crockery. There was no furniture, no sign of fuel or food, merely a pile of rags folded over on the floor. "That's my bed," said the mother-in-law from where she sat in the sunlight at the entrance. The room that had been hollowed off from this was even smaller, and the darkness in it even more profound, so that with the first step you took you nearly trod upon the human being who lay sleeping under the man's ancient and tattered jacket. It was a child of two or three, and after a little, you could see its sparse, light hair and the side of its face, the cheek as white as wax.

The father said he had been doing well as a carpenter before the war, and when he spoke of the war he was not referring to what took place between 1939 and 1943, but to that other war—the prelude to the final conflict—which had split Spain wide apart. But since the war and since his prison term he had been able to get work only intermittently as a carpenter's helper, at the rate of ten pesetas a day. His wife was off, as usual, washing clothes in the residential quarter of Colonia del Viso, where her daily pay averaged around seven pesetas. (At the legal tourist exchange, this means the family could count on an income of about a dollar a day.)

We were standing in the sunlight before the opening of the cave again, and the father smiled politely as he refused a second cigarette. "It is better not to get used to smoking," he said. Three times a month, when he receives his two packages of cigarettes, for which he pays four pesetas, he sells them on the black market for eight. He had also sold the family's ration cards, he told us, as a family with their income could not afford to buy such luxury items as bread, soap, oil, sugar, and meat. But even with this extra money to buy a pound of Spanish beans twice a week on the black market, the children do not get enough to eat. The two who sat playing in the dust had the bloated bellies and the thin, warped legs of the famished. "During the March floods," he said as if in apology, "the cave was three inches deep with water, and the little one you saw asleep inside has had cold in the lungs since then. If I could get some bricks, I could lay a floor. . . ." He said there were perhaps 40,000 families living as they were, in caves, some with less money than they had, and he—carrying the child still—and the mother-in-law walked with us down to the street.

"My daughter wasn't used to living like this before she got married," she said. We stood across from the uncompleted government buildings which would eventually house the various ministries. "Before the war we had a nice house in the country. My husband was alive then—and I'm glad he didn't live long enough to see this reign of terror in Spain! We had sheep," she said. "Things were comfortable, the way they are in other countries. I used to spin the wool into cloth, and my husband worked in his vineyard. We had furniture, pans to cook with, beds, chairs," she said. "My daughter was used to everything." Standing beside her with the child in his arms, her son-in-law gave his quick, pained smile. "We had a country!" she cried out. "We used to have a country then!" She threw her head back, and the knot of gray hair trembled on it as she spit toward the unfinished buildings that would house the ministries of Franco's Spain.

There are others who speak to you of construction, and who will show you the evidences of what is being done: a large, unfinished apartment building off the road called General Ricardos is pointed out as a Franco housing project. I was driven past it in a taxi with Madrid acquaintances, one a Spanish lady who represents the Quaker relief work there. It did not seem that much work were being done on the place, and the Spanish lady explained that "Spanish workingmen never like to work much between the hours of two and five." But as I ate the standard lunch of white beans one day with a carpenter and his family in the Cuatro Caminos quarter (his lunch hour being from one to two), I asked him about the Franco housing project. "Oh, that, down off General Ricardos? They abandoned it four years ago," he said. It was true that it had been a part of the Franco rehabilitation program, only other things had come in between. "First," said my friend, "they were short of building materials, so they had to make a choice. The choice lay between finishing the working-class families' flats, which they had already begun, or building new apartment houses in the residential districts, or a new bull ring or two. Obviously, there wasn't enough material to do all three. So a public statement was made by the Minister of Public Welfare. He explained that if they built fancy apartment houses on the big avenues first, high rents would start rolling in and that this would be excellent for the general economy. Or if they made at least one more bull ring, which would be packed with spectators every Sunday and Thursday afternoon, this too would put more money in circulation, and the country would be in a better position to continue work on the working-class families' flats."

Everybody at the table laughed. "And there is another explanation as to why the workers' houses were finally abandoned," my friend said. "You might like this one better, so I'll tell it to you too. To qualify for accommodations in a Franco project, you have to be very well recommended," he said. "First of all, you have to furnish proof that you never carried arms against Franco, and, secondly, that you never participated actively or passively in any political movement which opposes the present regime. And, lastly, you must present a written document from your priest attesting to the fact that you attend mass every morning—or that at least your wife does." My friend paused for a moment while the family laughed again, and then he went on saying: "So once the apartment building off General Ricardos was well under way, Franco woke up in a good humor one morning, and he asked to see the list of names of the families who had applied for living quarters there. 'But no one has put in an application yet, Your Excellency,' said his aide-de-camp. 'We have been informed that the requirements are too rigid.' 'But surely workingmen still go to mass?' Franco cried out, and the aide-de-camp answered, 'I am told their wives do, Your Excellency.' 'And surely the priests will attest to that fact?' Franco cried out again. 'Indeed, the priests have expressed themselves as willing to assist in any way they can,' replied the aide-de-camp. 'But, Your Excellency, what is needed in Spain is not places to house the lower class, but an entirely new lower class. It's the first requirement they can't meet. There isn't a workingman to be found who hasn't borne arms against Your Excellency's regime.'"

I discovered ten days ago that the finest Grecos are no longer to be seen at Toledo or in the Prado. On that same road named General Ricardos, in the ruins of the Fabrica de Resilla, which was totally destroyed during the Spanish war in the bombardment of Madrid, there is a Greco which can just be distinguished in the nearly impenetrable dark of one crypt of the blasted cellars. This Greco is not artificially illuminated as is the "Entierro del Conde de Orgaz" at Toledo, and when you first step in out of the Spanish sunlight, you smell the damp, and the odor of human excrement, but for a moment you cannot make out the figures in the obscurity. And then, as the darkness ebbs, you perceive the pallid, attenuated face, and the anguished eyes, like the eyes of the Apostles, are turned in eloquence upon you no matter in what part of the room you stand. This is the principal figure. He is stretched on a pallet with a grayish cover flung across his body, and the elongated thigh bones, the points of the sharp, slightly elevated knees, and the fleshless feet are clearly discernible beneath its folds, as if the artist had sketched in the framework of the skeleton, bone by bone, before flinging the cover across the emaciated form. Above the high, pale forehead the hair falls black and silky, and the cheekbones are high; the throat is corrugated like a windpipe, and the yellowish hands are folded on the wood-like slats of the breast.

At the foot of the pallet, her hair parted in the middle, stands the figure of a woman, the angular folds of her dress done in that thin, faded red which El Greco alone, either through faulty preparation of his canvas or through choice, seems to have made use of. Only after searching the shadows can you distinguish the four small children, dark-eyed, and with pointed chins, who stand partially hidden in the woman's skirts. That is the complete picture, conceived in cold and terrible compassion, and framed with a broad band of dark. But an added attraction of this Greco is that the figures in it are endowed with speech.

"I am not asking for anything," the reclining figure said, the voice hardly louder than a whisper. "I am not asking help of anyone. I am not complaining." As he spoke, the shape of his upper teeth could be seen outlined through his fleshless, shrunken lip. "I am forty years old. I have lived my life," he said. "I am here with my wife and children. I have nothing to complain of." His eyes were filled with fear of what menace strangers might bring. "I cannot talk because it may start me bleeding again," he said, and then his breath was gone, and he did not say any more.

"For a little while he was in a sanitarium," the woman said, speaking in the darkness. "But they have no room to keep them. For five years he's been lying here like this, since four years no doctor has come near him! You've come for the death!" she cried out, and the eyes of the ill man were turned to her in grievous accusation. Her arms and hands had gone around the children's shoulders, and she held them hard against her skirts as she began to cry. "I don't cry all the time, I haven't cried for a long time," she said. "It's just when people like you come here that I think there's maybe something somebody can do—"

There were cakes at tea that day, and the talk across the handsome table, on which the ancestral silver shone, was of Spanish painting. The women's delicately tinted faces and their gentle voices lingered above the cups in which the slices of lemon floated in the fragrant tea. "It is El Greco's love for Veronica which moves me more than any other story," said the lady beside me; for they have not yet perceived that in Spain the shrines of faith and beauty have lost their profound significance and are refuge and equivocation. The diplomat's wife, with a mauve veil masking her eyes, leaned across the lace-spread, burdened table and spoke softly to me.

"When you return to Paris," she said, "do tell people how foolish it is to keep the Spanish-French frontier closed, the way the French are doing. It is so cruel that little French children should want for things when here our little Spanish children have all the oranges and bananas and fresh produce they can eat. You've seen our markets, haven't you?"

Troubled Times in India

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, June 29

BOTH the Congress Party and the Moslem League having accepted the principle of the division of the country, votes have been taken to ascertain the wishes of the people of Bengal, Punjab, and Sind through their respective provincial legislatures. The results have been entirely in accordance with expectations. Western Bengal, including Calcutta, with its decisive Hindu majority chose to remain with Hindustan, while eastern Bengal with its Moslem majority wanted to join Pakistan. Similarly, eastern Punjab voted for Hindustan and western Punjab for Pakistan. Sind, because of its Moslem majority, was bound to choose Pakistan—in fact, its capital, Karachi, will develop into Pakistan's federal capital.

As the president of the Congress Party observed, the partition of Bengal and the Punjab was an inevitable consequence of the decision to divide the country. Hindus and Sikhs can console themselves with the thought that they have saved substantial portions of these provinces from absorption into Pakistan. Referendums to be held this week and next will decide the allegiance of British Baluchistan, the Northwest Frontier Province, and the Sylhet district in Assam.

The virile Pathan race, which forms the overwhelming majority in the Frontier Province, is faced with an embarrassing situation. The question to be voted on—which one of India's two constituent assemblies to join—could conceivably be decided by the electorate in favor of either side. Unfortunately, adherents of the Moslem League have for months past been carrying on a campaign of murder and violence which the Congress Party has been powerless to check with the inadequate resources at its disposal and the divided loyalties of many of its officials. Congress leaders have therefore decided to boycott the referendum, partly because of its unduly limited scope, but mainly through fear of large-scale clashes between rival groups of Pathans.

SHIVA RAO is correspondent in India for The Nation and the Manchester Guardian.

What would the Pathans do if given an absolutely free vote? It must be remembered that the Northwest Frontier Province, Waziristan beyond the border (the home of several virile tribes), and Afghanistan form really a single region; the people are held together by strong ties of language, religion, and culture. Neither the British annexation of the Frontier Province nor the difficulties of communication due to the mountainous terrain has ever severed these racial links. Thus, the Pathans, had they an unfettered choice, would probably vote for an independent state of Pathanistan.

The Sylhet district's decision may mean a substantial addition to the territory of eastern Bengal. But it is difficult to forecast the result of this referendum, since it is probable that many people, even among the Moslems, realize the advantage of remaining within Assam instead of being transferred to eastern Bengal.

Bit by bit, one sees a truncated Pakistan emerging from these processes. How far will the dismemberment of India go, and where will it end? Today the Congress Party and Moslem League leaders, with large staffs of assistants, are busy with divisions of all sorts, division of assets and liabilities, of equipment, of personnel, of departmental files and records. A special committee presided over by Sir Claude Auchinleck—who for reasons of defense has been a firm opponent of the division of India—will deal with the division of the armed forces. The decision to accept partition was not lightly taken by the Congress leaders. Gandhi even now speaks of it as though it were a dark tragedy. The terrible riots that went on throughout northern India for months compelled the adoption of the view that there was no alternative to division but continuing bloodshed. "Into precisely how many fragments?" is the question now being asked by devotees of the unity of India, appalled by the prospects of the country splitting up.

The Pathans want a Pathanistan independent of both India and Pakistan. They are magnificent fighters who in the past have not found the Hindus too formidable opponents. Eastern Bengal has nothing in common with the western Punjab and Sind. Fifteen hundred miles of Indian territory lie between this region and Karachi. Can a single administration manage such far-flung provinces, separated by vast physical distances and held together by nothing but an artificially worked-up sentiment of common nationality which does not exist?

"No Balkanization" is the cry even of those Congress leaders who have reconciled themselves to the idea of India becoming two dominions—some, like Nehru, in the hope that the division may prove temporary and ultimately give way to stronger unity. A few princes are toying with the idea of declaring their independence and are watching the struggle that is developing between Travancore—a Hindu state with a population of six million in the extreme south of India—and the government of India as a test case. The acknowledgment of Travancore's independence will encourage many other states to demand it: Hyderabad and Kashmir are still undecided about their future course.

With the withdrawal of British authority by mid-August and the establishment of two dominions, considerations which have served so far to cement the unity of the Congress Party on the one hand and the Moslem League on the other are likely to lose their force. Already one can see that Moslems from provinces where they form a minority of the population, like Madras, Bombay, Behar, and the United Provinces, are feeling uneasy about the future. They have enjoyed privileges in the past which they seem doomed to lose.

There will be thirty million Moslems in the Dominion of India and fifty million in Pakistan (these figures do not include Moslems in the territories of the princes). Nehru and other Congress leaders have declared that in the Indian Dominion all will have common rights of citizenship, with no privileges for any section of the population—which implies that such devices as separate electorates and the reservation of seats for Moslems in the legislatures and government service far in excess of their proportional number will be dropped. This will mean a big sacrifice for Moslems in the Indian Dominion. They subscribed cheerfully to the theory of Pakistan without realizing that its achievement would result in the withdrawal of these privileges. "What do we get out of Pakistan?" said a Madras Moslem to me despairingly last week. Henceforth, Moslems in the Indian Dominion must rise to positions of responsibility by merit like everyone else and not by belonging to a special class. The enthusiasm for Pakistan is already showing signs of diminution among those thoughtful Moslems who perceive that its establishment can bring them little practical advantage.

The Moslem League grew rapidly in influence during the past six years because Jinnah's propaganda was concentrated on placing the Moslems in a position of antagonism to Congress. What kept eighty million Moslems together was this spirit of antagonism. Similarly, groups of widely differing political views have remained within Congress all these years because of their opposition to the British.

In the main, therefore, it has been a negative force which has given life to both the Congress Party and the Moslem League—the fear of domination by the British in one case and by the Hindus in the other. After the middle of August both these forces will tend to disappear, and social and economic considerations will become the dominant factors. Socialists who are now working within the Congress Party are preparing for such developments and drawing up a program of practical socialism. Communists, whose past role has been to snipe at all other parties, see an opportunity for themselves under the conditions now opening up for India.

The territorial division of India and freedom from British control may thus pave the way for ideological divisions within the existing political parties. The left-wing forces, however, are not the only ones which see opportunities ahead of them. Princes, capitalists, and landlords, with their far greater resources, are bound to make common cause. The conflict between Hindus and Moslems may then become a class conflict between the right and the left, between haves and have-nots. The path toward social democracy for India will not be either smooth or easy. Vested interests and privileged reactionaries will make a formidable bid for power and influence.

Dixie in Black and White

BY A. G. MEZERIK

VII. Kentucky's 1947 New Deal

Louisville, Kentucky

PRACTICALLY everybody in America thinks of the Kentucky Derby when Louisville is mentioned. Thousands of visitors pour into the city for the big event, though most of them have no hope of seeing the race. They come for the special holiday excitement, to take part in a Mardi Gras centering in a horse race. Those who can afford tickets for the race feel that they have stellar parts in the pageant. Lots of movie actors come to see and be seen; those old sportsmen the Southern colonels are very much in evidence; and the variety of Broadway characters is terrific. Hotel beds sell for $30 a night, but people take little time out to sleep. Automobile horns toot through the downtown streets all night, and the atmosphere becomes that of a frenetic carnival, with ingredients of New York's Fifty-second Street, an American Legion convention, and a circus where mint juleps at $1.50 per frosted glass substitute for pink lemonade.

All this is the prelude to that electric minute at Churchill Downs when the band strikes up "My Old Kentucky Home" and the horses parade on to the track. Then comes the crowd's spine-tingling shout, "They're off!" Two minutes later the show is over, except for the important detail of collecting the bets: on that two minutes more than one and a quarter million dollars have been gambled. The next day the city cleans up and takes stock, noting particularly the amount of money that changed hands in the betting and the huge profits made by the Jockey Club, which not only operates Churchill Downs but controls the gambling at every other Kentucky track.

Louisville's interest in the "take" at Churchill Downs is more than idle curiosity, for the world-famous race track pays no taxes and many citizens think that ought to be changed. Louisville could use the revenue. It pays its teachers, for example, such small salaries that they are on the verge of malnutrition and are discussing strike action. The owners of the track, however, keep a tight hold on the reins of local and state government and so far have not been bothered by the tax gatherers. Their political power comes in handy in other ways, too. Recently the precinct in which Churchill Downs is located suddenly undertook to enforce the law there instead of winking at violations. Overnight the track moved into another and more amenable precinct—by the simple device of having the boundary lines changed.

Kentucky, to judge from the assessed valuation of its real wealth, is one of the richest states in the South. It ought therefore to have a large tax income with which to support its services. The reason it doesn't is that the political machinery has always been used by the big property-owners to keep their taxes low. On the basis of its resources Kentucky could be expected to have a standard of living higher than most Southern states, but it actually ranks forty-fifth in the Union in per capita income. While a great deal might be done by Kentuckians to change this condition, one important means is beyond their reach. This would be to curtail the amount of wealth taken out of the state by the hundred largest banking, insurance, and manufacturing corporations in the United States and to build up industrial ownership in the South. The South fervently hoped that this change would be brought about by its industrial growth during the war, but it is now obvious that the miracle has not come to pass. The South has a few more plants than it had before the war; the East has almost doubled its manufacturing capacity. America's largest corporations profited most from the war boom, and the two greatest beneficiaries were General Motors and du Pont. Each of these giants, which through interlocking stock ownership are almost Siamese twins, added a billion dollars of facilities to their already swollen holdings. The branches which both have in the South have not appreciably increased Southern incomes or tax revenues, and there has been little local participation in profits.

A. G. MEZERIK is the author of "The Revolt of the South and West." This series will be concluded with the next article.

Monopolies and cartels are causing havoc below the Mason and Dixon Line. I described the fertilizer monopoly in my article on the TVA in The Nation for May 31. Though fertilizer is as essential as bread—with-out it the South's exhausted lands would produce neither food nor cotton—farmers have to pay an outrageously high price for it. Reliable calculations show that the difference between a price based on cost of production and the rigged price demanded and got by the monopoly would have provided a college education for every high-school graduate in the South. Monopoly not only pays less than its share of taxes, drains off profits, and lowers per capita income, but also boosts the cost of living in various ways.

The people's inertia and the fantastic shenanigans of the politicians have made it possible for graft and venality to flourish in Kentucky for generations, and it is hard to organize effective resistance to monopoly's tyranny. However, the recent Supreme Court decision reducing freight-rate discrimination has encouraged greater effort here, as all through the South. The realization that the freight-rate victory was due in part to Southern agitation and leadership, like that of Governor Arnall, is incentive to further action. Though slow to bestir themselves, the people of Kentucky have been alerted.

The balance sheet compiled recently by the Committee for Kentucky shows how much needs to be done. Only one of the forty-eight states had, in 1940, a higher percentage of illiteracy than Kentucky. In 1943, in the midst of war-time prosperity, 4,000 Kentucky teachers were earning, on a fifty-two-week basis, less than $12 a week. Not many Kentuckians did much better: in the same year the per capita income in Kentucky was but 59 per cent of the United States average, and Kentucky's industrial pay rolls were next to the lowest in the South. Bare statistics do not dramatize the effects of poverty, but they do reveal a tragic situation. Only two states have a worse tuberculosis record. In one rural area 11,500 proud Kentuckians depend on a single doctor. One in every three Kentucky farms is valued at $300 or less. In 1940, 13,000 farmers had to haul water an average of more than four miles. Ninety-seven per cent of all Kentucky farms had no toilets inside the house, and 42,000 farms had neither inside toilet nor outside privy. One of every four persons born in Kentucky has left the state. The figures are doubly depressing to Kentuckians who remember that fifty years ago Louisville was a great center of world trade, the state was first in industrial pay rolls in the South, and its educational system ranked high among those of the nation.

The Committee for Kentucky, which has brought all this to light, was started in Louisville by a group of business leaders who can hardly be accused of belonging to any even mildly radical school of political thought. Outstanding in the group were Barry Bingham and Mark Ethridge, both of the Louisville Courier-Journal; Wendell Willkie's brother, H. Fred Willkie, a leading Kentucky distiller; and Harry W. Schacter, a merchant born in New York who as president of the committee has demonstrated regional patriotism in the larger framework of the national interest. These four men show the same progressive spirit which brought to national attention Wilson Wyatt, Paul Porter, and Edward Prichard, Jr.—Kentucky's contributions to the New Deal.

At first the Committee for Kentucky undertook to present to the people a picture of conditions within the state. As Harry Schacter put it, "Our aims were to get the facts, and to see that the people got those facts. We were intent on stimulating people to organize locally, so that they would do the job of relating the facts to their own locality and so that they would build up a desire to act for change. Not just a desire, however, but a realization that they must take the responsibility and assume a share of the cost of the change. And it was an integral part of our job to show the consequences of lassitude, of apathy, and of failure." The committee issued booklets and pamphlets and aroused interest through lectures, meetings, and newspaper publicity—all coordinated under the slogan of "Wake Up Kentucky." The pace-maker for the entire project was a radio program originating in the Louisville station owned by the Courier-Journal. This program was soon picked up by other radio stations in the state and was so good that it received a Peabody award.

The time arrived when most of the facts were on the record. Kentucky, if not yet awakened, was beginning to stir; and the committee, deciding to move from fact-finding into action, changed its slogan to "Kentucky on the March." Its statewide studies were now utilized as yardsticks for an experiment in the city and county of Henderson, a typical Ohio River community. This "grass-roots" work in Henderson has been in operation for over a year and is being copied in other communities.

At present the "Kentucky on the March" program is evolving into "A People's Legislative Program for Kentucky," in which are embodied legislative proposals to effect improvements in fields in which state government plays a part. While many different sections of the population were represented at the meeting at which the legislative program was adopted, some elements were notably absent, not because they were indifferent, but because they were against even the mild reforms proposed by the Committee for Kentucky. Some business men attended, but no representatives of the Chamber of Commerce, the Bankers' Association, or Associated Industries, which is the Kentucky version of the N. A. M. These groups felt instinctively that even the calling together of like-minded people to discuss changes threatened their power and the interests of the national monopolies behind them. Railroad unions were represented, but not the managements of the railroads, which long dominated Kentucky politics and have still a hold on the legislature. The mine workers were represented, but not the mine owners, or the largest industrial employers. The farmers sent the heads of their organizations, but the few native Kentuckians who still own some of the state's rich farm land stayed away (Kentucky's noted blue-grass horse farms are now nearly all owned by rich Easterners). Educators, Negroes, and welfare agencies were present, but there was only a tiny contingent from the aristocracy whose holdings are in Louisville's big banks. Also absent was the professional booster, who wants no public mention of facts which would lead anyone to dream that Kentucky is not perfect. The rich in general neither attended nor wanted to be told the results; they habitually close their ears to unpleasant truths for which they might have to assume some responsibility. Machine politicians not only stayed away but threw cold water and bricks.

Among the supporters of the program are some real forces for progress, such as the Louisville Courier-Journal, one of the country's outstanding newspapers. But while it is important to have a good newspaper if you want a good community, even the best newspaper can only spark change, not bring it about. That must be done by the people, and the Committee for Kentucky can be proud of the cooperation it has obtained from the people of the state. All of labor—and nearly every other important mass organization—is becoming increasingly involved in the movement. Its immediate aim, in effect, a 1947 statewide New Deal, is well worth working for. As it continues its march, it may come to grips with the deeper economic and political problems of an industrial society in which the biggest fact is monopoly control.

Canadian Labor and Political Action

BY EUGENE FORSEY

Ottawa, July 1

AMERICAN labor has in general fought shy of independent political action through a third party. The results of the last elections, however, suggest that the alternative policy of working through one or both of the old parties may be played out. In these circumstances Canadian experience may be of interest.

Fifteen years ago an article on Canadian labor in politics would have been like the famous chapter on the snakes in Ireland. For all practical purposes, taking the country as a whole, there was no labor in politics. There was a persistent tradition of independent political action by labor, a tradition which defied innumerable defeats and innumerable treacheries. But Canadian trade unionism was as non-political as American trade unionism.

The present situation is very different. Canada, like the United States, has two major labor organizations. The Trades and Labor Congress is, for the most part, made up of Canadian branches of A. F. of L. unions. The Canadian Congress of Labor consists mainly of C. I. O. unions and the Canadian districts of the United Mine Workers. In both organizations are some purely Canadian unions. The Trades and Labor Congress has usually followed the orthodox American policy and stayed clear of political action. The Canadian Congress of Labor, on the other hand, in 1943 officially indorsed Canada's third party, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, as "the political arm of labor in Canada." It has twice voted down, by large majorities, attempts to reverse the decision.

Individual unions have been particularly active in supporting the C. C. F. The United Mine Workers District 26, which takes in about half the coal miners in the country, has been affiliated with the C. C. F. for eight years and has elected one of its members to the Canadian Parliament. Steelworkers' locals in two of Canada's three basic steel plants are also affiliated: their national director is on the C. C. F. national council. Altogether some hundred local unions belonging to both labor congresses have affiliated with or indorsed the C. C. F., and many union leaders, national and local, are active supporters.

The C. C. F. also enjoys the support of a large and important section of the farmers. It was brought into being in 1932 by a group of farmer and labor members of Parliament in which the farmers were much the more numerous. Most of its twenty-eight members in the Dominion Parliament come from rural constituencies, and it has the overwhelming support of the largest wheat-growing province, Saskatchewan. It is a genuine farmer-labor party, and in spite of continuous reactionary prophecies that the two elements are bound to split, they have held together; the predominantly farmer C. C. F. government of Saskatchewan has passed what is by common consent the most advanced labor legislation on the American continent.

EUGENE FORSEY, a Canadian economist and political scientist, is director of research of the Canadian Congress of Labor.

In its fifteen years of existence the C. C. F. has developed impressive strength. Today it constitutes the government of Saskatchewan. It is the official opposition in three other provinces—British Columbia, Manitoba, and Nova Scotia. In the last election it polled a larger vote than either of the two old parties in the four western provinces. It has twenty-eight members in the Canadian House of Commons. The C. C. F. is decidedly a force to be reckoned with.

WHY THE C. C. F. WILL LAST

But will it last? Canada has had third parties before. Brief life was here their portion, brief sorrow, short-lived care. The Progressive Party, which arose at the end of the First World War, won power in three provinces and became the second largest party in the Dominion house, with more than twice as many seats as the C. C. F. now has. Yet within seven years one of its provincial governments had been disastrously defeated, and most of its federal representatives had been either defeated or swallowed by the Liberals.

The C. C. F. has already lasted twice as long as the Progressive Party; and is still growing. Why? Is it more solidly based? Are there any reasons for believing that it will not, in a few years more, suffer the same fate as its forerunner? The answers to these questions may be instructive for Americans as well as Canadians.

To begin with, the C. C. F. has four things which the Canadian Progressive Party never had, and which any third party hoping to be effective must have. The first is a clear, coherent, comprehensive social philosophy. The second is labor support. The third is a will to power. The fourth is organization.

The Progressive Party was a party of protest and nothing more. It had plenty of good-will but no real understanding of what was happening in the modern world, and so no unifying force to hold its diverse elements together. It was founded in post-war depression; the return of prosperity destroyed it. "Blown about by every wind of doctrine," most of its members fell easy victims to the blandishments of Mr. Mackenzie King and were soon transformed into "Liberal Progressives" and then into ordinary "Liberals."

The C. C. F. has a social philosophy—democratic socialism; this philosophy it shares with most of the progressive parties of the Western world. That is one reason why, though made up of people with every conceivable type of racial, religious, educational, and occupational background, it has held together and grown since its founding in the great depression through pre-war recovery, war-time prosperity, and post-war reconversion. It is also one reason why neither Mr. King nor the Communists have been able to take it into camp.

The Progressive Party never had any labor support worth mentioning. It was almost purely a farmers' movement, with a fringe of middle-class cranks and faddists. The nearest it came to labor support was a loose alliance with small, rather nondescript labor parties many of whose members had as little social philosophy as the Progressives themselves and came to the same sad end. The C. C. F. has always had a strong labor element, and in the last few years it has had direct, official union support.

The Progressives never had any real will to power. To many of them the very word "party" was sinful, the idea of forming a government a horror. They thought in terms of "cooperative" arrangements between representatives of occupational "groups," resulting in a series of pleasant and reasonably stable compromises. It never occurred to them that some of the "groups" were social classes. In the Dominion house they refused to become the official opposition, leaving that powerful role to the much less numerous Conservatives, and from the very beginning they split their vote on almost every important question. Of party discipline there was not even the shadow.

The C. C. F. has a will to power. It has a definite objective which can be reached only by taking power. It has recognized the class structure of modern society and the impossibility of stable compromise between those who will starve if they don't work and those who won't. It has faced the fact that only an organized party ready to govern can hope to solve the problems of modern society. It has seized with enthusiasm its single opportunity, so far, to form a government, and has accepted with equal enthusiasm every chance of becoming the official opposition, the potential alternative government. Its members in provincial and Dominion houses have worked and voted as a disciplined team.

Last, but not least, the Progressives had no national organization, and no provincial organization except in the primarily economic farmers' groups. They clung with fierce individualism to the most exaggerated form of "constituency autonomy." Nationally, their party was hardly more than a collection of members of Parliament who sat in the same part of the House of Commons and occasionally voted the same way. There were no national headquarters, no effective national leadership, no national funds, no provision for educating Progressive supporters in the principles for which the party stood.

The C. C. F. has a national organization with a reasonable degree of control over provincial and local organizations. It has a national headquarters, a very effective national leadership, national funds, national research and educational officers. Indeed, it has probably the most continuous and coherent—and certainly the most democratic—organization of the three major parties.

LESSONS FOR AMERICAN PROGRESSIVES

These are some of the reasons why the C. C. F. will list. There are three others which also may have their lesson for American progressives. First, the C. C. F. is unshakably democratic. It is run by its members. It has annual provincial and biennial national conventions which decide policy and choose officers and leaders. To each convention the officers and leaders must render an account of their stewardship, and if the account is not satisfactory they must make way for others. Secondly, the C. C. F. conception of social ownership has been broad and flexible, and has always strongly emphasized co-operatives as a valuable means of carrying out social ownership. Thirdly, the C. C. F. has steadfastly refused to have anything to do with the Communists under any of their numerous aliases or disguises. Communists and fellow-travelers have occasionally wormed their way into the organization and behaved as they always do; as soon as they have shown their hand clearly, they have always been thrown out by democratic action of the membership or its elected officers. The result is that the C. C. F. has suffered a minimum of damage from the changes in the C. P. line; the Communists have never been in any position to cripple the organization by suddenly getting out because they were never in, except in negligible numbers in isolated spots for a negligible length of time.

This explains why the Communists have offered the bitterest and most persistent opposition inside the unions to their affiliating with or indorsing the C. C. F. Indeed, within the Canadian Congress of Labor they have offered almost the only opposition. They have been met with absolute frankness and with vigor. At the last convention a Communist attempt to substitute for the existing Political Action Committee, which supports the C. C. F., a "non-partisan" P. A. C.—which would of course mean reversing the decision of the 1943 convention—was defeated without a recorded vote.

It must be admitted that the necessity of a third party has hitherto been more evident, and the task of building it easier, in Canada than in the United States. For one thing, Canadian unions have never embraced "free enterprise" with the enthusiasm of American unions. On the contrary, even the traditionally cautious Trades and Labor Congress has for many years demanded "public ownership and democratic management of all public utilities and nationalization of banking and credit" and "government control and fullest development of all natural resources"; the Canadian Congress of Labor has specifically declared for nationalization of the banks, the coal mines, and all existing privately owned broadcasting stations, a vast public housing program from which private enterprise should be "excluded," and "free hospitalization and surgical and medical attention for all workers and their families"; District 26 of the U. M. W. has called for nationalization of the eastern coal mines; and the Canadian districts of the Steelworkers ask for nationalization of the Canadian steel industry. Aims like these cannot be achieved through the old parties.

The influence of the British and Commonwealth Labor parties has been strongly felt in Canada. Great Britain, Australia, and New Zealand have all long had Labor parties, and all three have had Labor governments for appreciable periods in the past twenty years. Sometimes that influence expresses itself in British-born Canadian trade-union and C. C. F. leaders who acquired their first taste of politics in a Labor Party local. The Canadian parliamentary system itself makes the emergence of a third party a more natural phenomenon. The old parties—Liberal and Conservative—are closely knit organizations with tight party discipline. Members elected to Parliament must support the official party policy on pain of political death. A phenomenon like George W. Norris would be completely impossible in Canada. The liberal dissenter makes little headway, and new ideas must find a new political party. Big personalities do not play the same role as in American politics. The indispensable leader finds no place in Canadian political folklore. And during the depression of the thirties, when Franklin D. Roosevelt was pulling all liberals to his New Deal banner in the United States, the Canadian parties plodded along their well-trodden ways. It was in those years that a great many workers, farmers, and progressives from the white-collar class decided to make the C. C. F. their own party.

There is one further factor that should be noted. The Canadian economy, at any rate until recently, has been even more monopolistic than the American. Canada has never had any successful trust-busting. Most of the major industries are controlled by one or a very few concerns, and the control of industry is concentrated to an astonishing degree in the hands of the same relatively small group of men. This has made it easier than in the United States for business to control government and harder for government to control business in the interests of the people.

Whether the death of Mr. Roosevelt, the end of the New Deal, and the emergence of new problems have reduced the differences between the American and Canadian situations to a point where American progressivism is ready to strike out on the new path which Canadian progressives are treading is a question on which no outsider's opinion is worth a great deal. But even an outsider may hazard a guess that in the next few months American progressives will be doing some rather fundamental thinking about their position, and that in the process they would do well not to overlook the experience of their neighbors to the north.

Del Vayo—the Vatican and Democracy

A SERIES of articles in the Osservatore Romano by its chief editor, Count Dalla Torre, discussing the relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, have led several commentators to assume a fundamental change in the policy of the Holy See. Originating in a milieu where anti-communism is the traditional stand, the admonition addressed to both Moscow and Washington to become more "objective," to take things more quietly, and to renounce an ideological struggle which could only end in war, sounded encouraging. The articles were written in a lofty tone, with that air of authority which the Vatican paper, speaking for a Power whose kingdom is not of this earth, knows how to adopt in solemn moments. It was a vote for compromise, setting an example by treating with equal courtesy the new favorite, the United States, and the land of the anti-Christ.

I am sorry to have to inject into this hopeful interpretation a drop of skepticism. I would agree on one point: that the Vatican's statement "reflects the Pope's increasing anxiety." As early as last March I heard in Rome, from a diplomat extremely well-informed on the affairs of the Curia, that the tension between the Big Two was worrying Pius XII more than anything he had gone through during the war.

The main reason for that anxiety is the fact that the Vatican is in Italy, and Italy, no matter what De Gasperi, supported by the Allies, may do to prevent it, remains one of the countries of Europe where the revolution is most deeply anchored. Any aggravation of relations between Moscow and Washington has an immediate effect on Italy's internal politics, and at this moment, should it come to a test of strength, the Communists are the masters of the street. Nineteen forty-seven is not a good year for a showdown. The Vatican hopes that postponement of the elections until next spring will result in a central-rightist coalition so stabilized as to keep the Communists forever out of the government. Then they will begin to lose ground rapidly.

I think it is a false hope. As I have said on this page before, I believe that the Communists and Socialists, not the Christian Democrats, will win the election. But the Vatican thinks differently, and it was in that expectation that it forced De Gasperi to stay even when physical fatigue had made the Premiership an uncomfortable burden. It was a Vatican request. Believers do not ignore the voice of God.

Together with the weakening of the Italian left, the Vatican expects that within one year the process of isolating Russia will be completed. For that it counts especially on the irritation and impatience of the countries that will suffer most next winter. Just at the time when the Osservatore Romano was pleading for reconciliation, every word uttered by the Pope was intended to establish the responsibility of Russia for Europe's present distress. The desire to prevent a conflict while the odds are still against the Vatican can be reconciled with other more permanent interests. After the articles in the Osservatore Romano, as before, the disappearance of the Soviet regime and the prevention of a Socialist Europe remain the cherished dream of the Holy See. But the Vatican has had a thousand years of experience in world affairs, and Pacelli's mind is infinitely more subtle than that of other statesmen who, in lieu of other ideas, pin their last hope on the atomic bomb.

It is a question of strategy, not of fundamental attitudes. Through the centuries the papacy has always been on the sides of reaction. Its very hierarchic system contradicts the concept of democracy; it is built from above down. It has never modernized itself; on the contrary it has grown more authoritarian. The waves of freedom that have battered mankind and swept over old privileges of various sorts have broken at the Vatican gardens. With the proclamation in 1870 by the Council of Rome of the infallibility of the Pope in matters of belief and morals, any chance of democratization from within ended. Half a century later, in 1918, the new code of the Catholic church, the Corpus juris canonici, was adopted and the totalitarian papacy received its final touch. A careful study of the famous Encyclical "Immortale Dei" (1885), which has been used to prove the liberalism of the church, shows that even the "Socialist" Leo XIII had no faith in government of the people, by the people, for the people. There never was a Lincoln in the Vatican.

If fresh evidence should be required that Count Dalla Torre's sensational series does not herald a more progressive attitude on the part of the church, there is the insolent pro-fascist display of the Spanish hierarchy in favor of Franco's plebiscite. Everybody knows that the plebiscite was a farce; and Monarchists as well as Republicans decided to sabotage it. To counteract that move the Dictator called upon the church. The reply was instantaneous and unqualified. The Spanish hierarchy did not even take advantage of the occasion to request that the political executions stop. The excuse for not intervening has always been that the church must not mix in state affairs. But the plebiscite came along, and the church threw itself into the campaign.

It began with an appeal by Enrique Cardinal Pla y Deniel, Archbishop of Toledo, in which in the best Jesuit style he said: "The church does not take sides but feels the necessity of appealing to the faithful in moments which may be as decisive as those of 1936." In 1936 the Spanish archbishops and bishops openly declared their support of the Franco rebellion; thus the reference to 1936 is an order to vote for Franco. The Bishop of Orense followed with a pastoral letter exhorting his diocese to vote, and to vote "the right way." After that came the Bishops of Sigüenza, Granada, and Salamanca, and finally the Bishop Prior of the Military Orders, Dr. Echevarria. The behavior of the church has been scandalous, and I know of very sincere Spanish Catholics who are horrified by the support given to Franco. All this happened only a fortnight after the series of articles appeared in the Osservatore Romano. It confirms my belief that those articles merely registered a maneuver, not a conversion of the Vatican to the principles of democracy.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

The D-Day for Sterling

JULY 15 is D-Day for the pound sterling. On that date it becomes once more a relatively free currency, and the first stage in the demobilization of the sterling area will be accomplished. Henceforth all sterling arising from current transactions plus all that released from blocked balances will be convertible into other currencies. Thus in spite of its current difficulties the British government is punctually fulfilling one of the major conditions on which the American loan of $3,750,000,000 was granted last year.

What does sterling convertibility mean in practice? Let us suppose that Mahmoud Abbas of Cairo sold £10,000 worth of cotton to Manchester last month. He could use those pounds to finance purchases anywhere within the sterling area, but he could not change them into dollars with which to pay for American fertilizers. In order to get dollars he had to apply to the Egyptian exchange control, which would decide whether his need was sufficiently urgent to warrant an allotment from the dollar quota assigned to Egypt by the British managers of the sterling area's dollar pool. After July 15, however, when Mr. Abbas sells Egyptian goods to British customers, he will be permitted to exchange his pounds for dollars, pesos, kroner, or any other currency. But this privilege will not apply to sterling arising from capital transactions. Mr. Abbas will not be able, for instance, to realize an investment in Imperial Chemical Industries and use the proceeds to buy du Pont stock.

There is no reason to suppose that July 15 will be followed by any sort of crisis. The total demand for dollars in London is not likely, in fact, to be appreciably increased. For while, in principle, convertibility applies to all sterling paid out for foreign goods and services, in practice it is only the net balances arising from each country's trade with Britain which will be converted. Moreover, as far as the "hard-currency" countries are concerned—the United States, Canada, Argentina, and so on—transferability of current sterling has been effective for some time past, and it is with these countries, as a group, that Britain has an adverse trade balance. British payments to and from the rest of the world broadly cancel each other out. Thus India and Egypt, which since the end of the war have bought from Britain far more than they have sold, will not have any current sterling surplus to turn into dollars.

The future ability of India and Egypt to command dollars beyond the amount they earn by exports to this country depends largely on releases from their accumulated sterling balances. Up to now these balances have been available for use inside the sterling area, but they have not been convertible into "hard currencies" except in connection with the operations of the dollar pool. The Anglo-American financial agreement, however, provides that after July 15 all releases from such balances must be convertible into any other currency for current transactions.

The total British external unfunded debt represented by foreign accounts in the London banks amounts to upward of three billion pounds, or twelve billion dollars. No such sum could be made available for transfer into other currencies without smashing the pound. The British government, therefore, is seeking agreements with its sterling creditors providing for the release of these balances over a long period of years. Negotiations have proved far from easy, and only with Argentina, which offset a large part of the debt by taking over the British-owned railroads in the country, has a final settlement been achieved.

India and Egypt, two of the largest sterling creditors, have not been disposed to accept the terms offered by the British negotiators. In particular, they object to proposals to scale down substantially the total debts on the ground that they really represent contributions made by Britain to the defense of India and Egypt against the Axis. There is also disagreement about the amounts to be released immediately and the rapidity with which the balance will be repaid. With the July 15 deadline approaching, it seemed possible that the British government might have to take a unilateral decision to block these balances. But a temporary agreement with Egypt has just been announced which will probably provide a pattern for standstill arrangements with India, Iraq, and other sterling creditors. Under the plan Egypt will withdraw from the sterling bloc and its existing sterling assets will be frozen in special London accounts. However, during the next six months it will be permitted releases of fully convertible pounds equivalent to $40,000,000, or considerably in excess of its recent share of the dollar pool. This should mean a fillip to American trade with Egypt.

The fact that Britain, contrary to earlier predictions in some quarters, has not asked the United States for more time before implementing the convertibility clause of the loan agreement is no indication that its long-term balance-of-payments problem is becoming any less intractable. On the contrary, the first six months of this year have seen a marked deterioration in its position, and there is grave reason to fear that the American and Canadian loans will be exhausted before the end of next year instead of lasting until 1950. In the first five months of 1947 the monthly average of British imports has been some $20,000,000 more than was planned, while exports have been scarcely more than one-quarter of the total planned for the whole twelve months. The rise in American prices is an important contributory factor in the expansion of imports; the winter crisis in Britain took a heavy toll of exports.

Some improvement in exports should be registered in the remaining months of 1947, but there is little hope that the target—140 per cent of the 1938 volume—can be hit; for the first five months the average was only about 100 per cent. Consequently, the British government has reluctantly decided to cut imports of gasoline, tobacco, and newsprint, and perhaps of other goods. This is a new blow for the long-suffering consumers, and the question arises how much farther austerity can be carried without reducing incentives to production and thus endangering the export drive itself.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

SOME TIME AGO a correspondent in Iowa asked me to name the best novel published in the United States since 1900. She was choosing a subject for her study club next winter. I suggested that she consider "The Wings of the Dove."

"Your suggestion, I blush to admit, is a novel I don't know," she wrote back, "but I shall certainly read it with eagerness. I reread a number of Henry James's novels when the centennial of his birth occurred a few years ago. How do you suppose I missed this one?"

Two weeks later she wrote: "Thanks again for recommending 'The Wings of the Dove.' I reveled in it." She went on to say that the public library in her town had acquired the book in 1923. "I was the first to borrow it! But I won't be the last. It is already circulating."

It is pleasant to know that "The Dove" is circling in an Iowa town this summer after perching for twenty-four years on a library shelf. But this small episode, of a great American novel forgotten and recovered only by chance, sets one thinking about the cultural life in America—it isn't, after all, as if there were any great American novels to spare. Unquestionably there are thousands of people who would revel in "The Wings of the Dove" but who are not even aware of its existence. And one scandalous reason why they are not aware of its existence is that no inexpensive complete edition of the works of our most accomplished novelist is available. As a result his books cannot be come upon casually and easily by the exploring but not all-knowing reader, particularly the young reader whose taste is very much affected, for better or worse, by what he reads in his first passion for books. Instead, to read James requires an initial effort—that of actually getting hold of the books—which presumes a prior knowledge and a taste already acquired. And James is only an example.

Sets of books, as a friend of mine often complains, have gone out of fashion. The fashion should be revived. Publishers might refrain, for instance, from spending vast sums getting out de luxe editions of the most widely known and most frequently published "classics"—usually with elaborate illustrations which are almost always inappropriate and often downright inaccurate. They could put the savings into sets of American authors in small legible volumes that are even more convenient to carry than the ubiquitous magazine.

Snob appeal could be exploited in distributing the best old books just as it is in distributing the "best" new books. And if the American consumer could be led to believe that it is quite as disgraceful not to have a set of standard American authors in the house as it is to be without a car, publishers would get rich, and the child who always has his nose in a book—there's likely to be one in every family—might have his nose in a good book at least part of the time.

A WEEK OR SO AGO a woman named Anna who lives by herself was lying in bed with a cold. She heard someone knocking at the door of the next apartment, which was occupied by another woman whose name also happens to be Anna. Then there was a knock at her own door. When she answered she saw a man and a woman standing outside. The woman asked her if her name was Anna. She said yes, whereupon her visitor said, "Come with us, we're going to take you to a doctor." That made sense somehow in the immediate situation, yet Anna was puzzled. "I had a cold but it wasn't that bad. . . . They didn't give me a chance to argue much, they just kept telling me to hurry up. I put on a dress and coat and went with them, which was a mistake."

All the way in the cab Anna kept thinking, and by the time she got to the hospital she knew that something was wrong. At the hospital she told them that they had the wrong woman, "but they wouldn't believe me." As a doctor at the hospital explained later, people who are committed—it's a mental institution—generally declare that a mistake has been made, and little attention is paid to them.

Anna was rescued four days later by a relative who had called on her, heard from neighbors that she had gone to a hospital, and after checking all the regular hospitals in the vicinity, went to the police and reported Anna missing.

To the inhabitants of a mad world complete with "flying saucers"—the cups come separately—to which we were all committed, surely by mistake, not days but years ago, Anna's story offers a gleam of hope. It's at least possible that someone has missed us by this time and is riding to the rescue.

Brod on Kafka

FRANZ KAFKA. A Biography by Max Brod. Schocken Books. $3.

MAX BROD is in an impossible position. A lifelong friend of Kafka, he is himself a writer and is therefore expected to write a biography. But in the eyes of the world he has become a mere figure in the Kafka myth; he has lost independent existence. He is evidence. An ordinary citizen could perhaps tolerate such a relationship, but for a writer it is self-obliteration. No wonder then that, despite its value as a document, Brod's book is so painfully self-conscious and unsatisfactory as a biography.

What we expect from Brod is recollection, portraits, conversation, detail, minutiae; a memoir of personal experience which may illuminate his friend's genius. We expect more from him than from Kafka's other intimates because as a novelist Brod was at least in a position to grasp Kafka's problems. But even as a memoir this book is uneven.

There are some very good things in it. A partial portrait of Kafka as human being does emerge—a very stirring and lovely portrait. Kafka was one of those rare souls incapable of the ordinary dishonesties which we all practice as a matter of course; he had a compulsive urge toward the center, the inner core, of a human structure or relationship. Even when he indulged in private ironies or little games of secrecy, he meant them as oblique, yet somehow more direct, versions of the truths which burned in him and eventually helped destroy him. He was not delicate or shy or precious; nor did he have any bent toward the weird or bizarre. Like his books, he can only be understood in the most central and typical terms of modern existence; as Brod points out, he was in this world. Perhaps the greatest tribute which Brod pays to him and which his narrative independently suggests is his remark that Kafka deeply and unequivocally respected people, so much as to provoke the periodic crises which paralyzed his life. In turn he expected others to respect him. Taken seriously, as it was by Kafka, this was an impossible program.

All this Brod suggests with genuine feeling. The last part of the book, describing Kafka's illness and his love affair with Dora Dymant, reaches a high emotional level: a threnody of genius destroyed after its first surge of productivity.

But there are parts of the book which, even as memoir, are simply annoying. Brod tries to deny the relevance of Freudian concepts to Kafka's relationship to his father, as if they were somehow sordid or disrespectful to Kafka's genius. As it happens, Kafka's relationship to his father was the major fact of his personal life, and it is most clarified by psychoanalytical concepts—the extracts from Kafka's remarkable Letter to My Father quoted by Brod make that clear enough. (Which is not the same at all as the crude error of viewing Kafka's novels as mere projections of that relationship.) Brod, however, attempts a rather prissy refutation of the Freudian analysis of Kafka's father-complex. But he need not fear; it will not soil Kafka's memory—on the contrary, it will only bring him closer to all of us.

Similarly Brod becomes a bit queasy when he describes Kafka's love affairs; he takes too seriously his own remark that Kafka was on the way to becoming a saint. (Were that true, Kafka would be a bore; who can get excited about a mere saint?) And here we reach a major weakness of Brod's book: too much Brod and not enough Kafka. We are simply not interested in Brod's reflections on life; they are a nuisance when they interrupt his recollections of Kafka. The same difficulty extends even to Brod's writing: how can his prose interest us when it is interspersed with long quotations, ablaze with genius, from Kafka's diaries and letters?

For all its faults, the memoir is unique and therefore indispensable. The difficulty, however, is that a satisfactory biography of Kafka cannot be written as a mere memoir. His external life is of least importance; it is more true of him than of most writers that his life is in his works. A biography of Kafka must therefore be primarily a criticism of his work, a comprehensive theory of Kafka's meaning. This Brod does not achieve, and I doubt that it is possible for him. He was too close to Kafka to view him in perspective. He offers several interpretations: the novels as versions of man's striving toward God and as comments on the situation of the Jews, in whom Kafka became increasingly interested in his later years. I do not question the validity of these theories, only their sufficiency.

For the younger generations Kafka is now assuming a special meaning, one which it is rather difficult for Brod's generation to include. In a sense Kafka no longer belongs to Brod's generation; he belongs to the generation which has experienced the full results of the contemporary débâcle and must now live most of its life in the aftermath. Perhaps he will belong even more fully to the next few generations.

Kafka's great contribution now—it may not be fifty years hence—is an incomparable vision of the modes, the moods, the patterns of contemporary existence stripped of all its contingency. That is why he provokes in us such powerful emotional reactions, why we feel that he speaks especially of and for us. He is not merely our exposed nerve, as has so often been said; he is that nerve at the extremity of its quiver—only in that sense is his Jewishness relevant. This is of course not an interpretation of Kafka, but I think it points the direction to a satisfactory one.

Kafka as viewed by the theologian, the sociologist, the psychoanalyst, the existentialist, the Jewish nationalist—each has validity, but only if subsumed under a more general and immediate vision. We cannot speak for the future, we feel only what he means now.

What, then, of the "universal relevance" claimed for him? Surely, it may be said, his work is not merely of transient significance. I agree, but I should want only to add that most of the current theories of universal relevance in terms of which Kafka is interpreted are themselves largely indices of our time. For us the present is enough, more than enough, and Kafka belongs uniquely to it. For us the present seems almost "universal" too—perhaps that is what Kafka meant when he wrote in his diary, "Everything that happened to me was forever."

IRVING HOWE

Growing Up in Brazil

WHERE THE SABIÁ SINGS. By Henriqueta Chamberlain. Sketches by Ken Chamberlain. The Macmillan Company. $3.

BRASIL is where the Sabiá sings, and this "partial autobiography" tells perhaps more about Brazil than it does about Mrs. Chamberlain. The author, daughter of an American missionary and his missionary wife, was born in a small town in northern Brazil between Natal and Recife, moved to Bahia when she was still a little girl, then to Rio after a few years, and finally to Sao Paulo, during her adolescence. Her father died there. After that she and her mother went on a long journey into the interior state of Goiás, and the narrative ends when her mother took her to the United States for college—and to escape the ardor of a Brazilian suitor, Jaime.

"Never once did my parents take us to live in an American or English colony," says Mrs. Chamberlain. "We did not join country clubs nor did we attend English-speaking schools. We were brought up as Brazilians, with Brazilians, and our loyalty and passionate love of country were for Brazil."

So, through the eyes and ears and feelings of a sensitive girl, the reader gets to know a good deal about everyday life in Bahia, Rio, Sao Paulo, and the back country. There are a richness of emotion and a simple charm about the book that give one a friendly feeling both for the country and the girl.

But it is the contrast between life in Brazil and in the United States that makes the most vivid impression on the American reader: for example, carnival in Bahia. "In those days Carnival was terrific. . . . Everyone, high and low, black and white, plunged with abandon into the gaiety of a wide-open city. . . . Everyone got drunk; not with liquor, but with the monotonous, barbaric music."

And then there are the Brazilian feelings toward sex and marriage which run through the whole pattern of the book—a combination of rigidities and easy, matter-of-fact tolerances. Mrs. Chamberlain says that to her "the ideal wife was Dona Carola, who always submitted to her husband—as a woman should. She guarded her daughters fanatically from all contact with men . . . and groomed them to be good wives and mothers. But the boys! . . . They were allowed every liberty and complete freedom. . . ." (Men, too, as witness the wedding of his bastard son openly attended by Dona Carola's worthy husband, and Dona Carola's friend Evelina making "baby clothes for her husband's mistress, who was expecting a child soon.") Unlike the mothers of the Brazilians she knew, the American women Henriqueta met "were all fools for work. They were always doing something. One woman even went to an office every day, just like a man. . . . They were always hustling, as if they had never learned the art of keeping still to feel deeply the beauty and joy of each living moment."

Another contrast is in color. As one of Henriqueta's friends said, "Brazil is the one country in the world where the white man doesn't consider himself better than the red or black." Henriqueta's schoolmates in Rio couldn't believe she didn't have some Negro blood and made her undress to prove there wasn't "a brown line on the skin over the spinal column." As her father said of his children, "All their lives they've chosen their friends because they liked them as people and these friends range in every shade from white to black."

The last few pages of the book recall how shocked Henriqueta was when she came to the United States and stumbled over the color line in a Kansas City street car. The behavior of North Americans she thought "belied their speeches and glamorous movie propaganda. I preferred our Brazilian system—with all its mistakes—because at least we were decent to human beings." But eventually she "learned to know many fine North Americans"—including the man she married—and "became adjusted to their way of life." Her husband's sketches, which illustrate the book, are full of the warmth and gaiety of the Brazil Mrs. Chamberlain loves so well.

EVANS CLARK

"Monty"

MONTGOMERY: A BIOGRAPHY.

By Alan Moorehead. Coward-McCann. $4.

ALAN MOOREHEAD, ace British war correspondent, followed Field Marshal Montgomery in action from Alamein to the Rhine and has described his campaigns in several previous books. Now he presents us with a fascinating study of Montgomery the man.

Seeking a clue to the strange, even eccentric, character of the Marshal, the author rightly pays much attention to a childhood spent in pitting his will against that of his mother, a straight-laced Victorian matron who had very decided ideas about bending the twig. Montgomery escaped to school, where his natural ability in sports gave him the leadership for which he craved and helped him overcome the social handicap of ultra-aggressiveness. Entering the army, he rose slowly through the hierarchy, recognized as a keen officer but distrusted by many of his superiors because he was addicted to ideas and tactless enough to expound them in season and out. Assertive, experimental, intolerant, and unsocial, it was almost a miracle that he was never cashiered but instead rose to the top in a crisis.

Mr. Moorehead, combining judgment with careful research, has painted a living, not an official, portrait. The personality that emerges is not, perhaps, endearing, but it is thoroughly believable. Reading this book we can understand why "Monty" has aroused so much antagonism: we can also appreciate the devotion he inspired in the men of the Eighth Army.

KEITH HUTCHISON

New Life of Wilson

WILSON: THE ROAD TO THE WHITE HOUSE. By Arthur S. Link. Princeton University Press. $5.

THE first volume of Professor Link's new life of Woodrow Wilson is a model of political biography. Thorough, accurate, objective, and readable, it gives the first full account of Wilson's life in politics up to his election to the Presidency in 1912. Professor Link has supplemented the Wilson and other manuscript collections with an uncommonly extensive and discriminating use of contemporary newspapers and magazines. His book traces in detail the first stirrings of Wilson's political ambition, his transformation from the Cleveland conservative of 1906 to the Bryan liberal of 1912, the long haul for the nomination, the fantastic Baltimore convention, and the exciting campaign against Roosevelt and Taft in 1912.

In particular, the book throws valuable light on Wilson's Princeton troubles and on the remarkable degree to which he was identified at the beginning with the reactionary wing of the Democratic Party. Dr. Link is a critical biographer, Fabian von Schlabrendorff's true story of his attempt on Hitler's life, as told by Gero v. S. Gaevernitz.

REVIEWERS SAY:

"A grim adventure story . . . thoroughly absorbing."—Saturday Review of Literature
 "His story deserves the adjective 'heroic'."—New York Sun

$2.50 at all bookstores MACMILLAN

They Almost Killed Hitler

not basically unsympathetic with his subject, but no cultist or rhapsodist; and his dry recognition that his leading figure indulged in ambiguities and contradictions is refreshing in a day when a synthetic conception of "folk hero" has made it impossible to see some past political leaders for their halos. Historians and the general public alike will await the remaining volumes of Dr. Link's biography with enthusiasm.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

Hares and Trappists

A MAN IN THE DIVIDED SEA.

By Thomas Merton. New Directions. $2.50.

YOUNG CHERRY TREES SECURED AGAINST HARES. By André Breton. View Editions. $3.75.

THE best thing Mr. Merton does is to communicate the complete satisfaction of the very simple but, for the believer, wonderfully significant life of the Trappist monk; a special, almost allegorical, feeling for nature seems to be a part of this life. For instance, The Trappist Abbey: Matins:

When the full fields begin to smell of sunrise

And the valleys sing in their sleep,

The pilgrim moon pours over the solemn darkness

Her waterfalls of silence,

And then departs, up the long avenue of trees.

But Mr. Merton realizes such feelings only occasionally, for there is a clash between them and his characteristic style.

This style seems to be based on a delight in the decorative elaboration of comparisons, a delight which frequently leads to the abuse of the simile, as in Holy Communion:

For Grace moves, like the wind,

The armies of the wheat our secret hero!
And Faith sits in our hearts like fire,
And makes them smile like suns.

These capitalized abstractions grow no more precise for being qualified by a succession of similes which, taken separately, are clichés and, taken together, chaotic. Frequently, too, Mr. Merton allows himself to detail the obvious aspects of the vehicle of a metaphor which has, in the first instance, only the slightest support of meaning. This is from a poem on the Annunciation:

Speech of an angel shines in the waters of her thought like diamonds.

Rides like a sunburst on the hillsides of her heart,

And is brought home like harvests,

Hid in her house, and stored

Like the sweet summer's riches in our peaceful barns.

The effect of such obvious and, for the most part, merely verbal ingenuity is to raise the question of the quality of the poet's feelings for the Communion or the Annunciation; yet it is clear from some other poems where Mr. Merton has subdued these stylish tricks that his religious feelings are finer and deeper than such obvious and muddled figures suggest. At its best this style lends itself to songs and highly fanciful and sensuous description—for example, "Ariadne"—not, except on very special occasions, to what appears to be Mr. Merton's very real faith.

The claim of his publishers is that "le témoignage d'André Breton s'impose comme gage de la tradition classique des Surréalistes, d'une imagination qui ne transige pas et d'une constance morale qui ne fait jamais défaut." This may well be true; the juror on whom only a fragment here and there, and one poem, have imposed themselves can hardly say. There is a kind of brilliance of phrase in these poems which is often impressive, but

Je prends mon bien dans les failles du roc
là où la mer

Précipite ses globes des chevaux montés des chiens qui hurlent. . .

There are places into which it is not always easy to follow Mr. Breton's understanding. ARTHUR MIZENER

Fiction in Review

I DON'T suppose that even as many as three instances in six months of a new impulse to maturity on the part of our young writers can be taken as proof that we are in the midst of a significant cultural change. But they do warm our hopes that fiction may at last be trying to free itself from the preciousness and infantilism that for so long now have been considered virtually synonymous with the highest literary talent. Last winter, while I was on vacation from reviewing, I read two novels—Peggy Bennett's "The Varminths" and Elizabeth Fenwick's "The Long Wing"—by very gifted new writers. Despite their youth, both authors had unusually adult views of life—unusual, that is, in writers of obvious sensibility. Now there is Daphne Athas's "The Weather of the Heart" (Appleton-Century, $2.75), another instance of the same kind of effort to create a world larger than the immediate world of the writer's own feelings. "The Weather of the Heart," written when Miss Athas was only twenty-two and her first published work, is strikingly talented. It is also a very remarkable attempt to put sensibility at the service of growth instead of at the service of a self-pitying retreat.

In fiction as in life one of the marks of growth is, of course, activity. In the novel activity shows itself as drama; drama is the novelist's means of translating inner conflict into open conflict and of advancing its resolution, and it seems to me that the static quality of so much present-day fiction must be understood as a refusal of growth, as a willingness to rest in the conditions given at the start of the story. Especially in novels about childhood we see how little desire for maturity our authors cherish for their small protagonists; the books end with their little heroes and heroines retaining almost exactly the same status they had at the beginning: they are still troubled children. Nor does the fact that this passivity so often presents the face of revolt indicate more than lip-service to the idea of revolt; however much these children may employ the idiom of rebellion, they never rebel in the direction of growing up. If there was a time when the first novel of an ambitious writer was almost sure to be the novel of development, in our present period it is almost sure to be a novel of non-development.

This is not the case with Miss Athas's "The Weather of the Heart," any more than it was the case with Miss Bennett's novel or Miss Fenwick's. All these are novels of drama and attempt to effect resolutions. Although the main characters of Miss Athas's book are children when we first meet them, by the time we leave them not so many years later their personalities have been deeply grooved by their experience of the world. They have acted and been acted upon, and we know just what direction their adult lives must take. It is not a happy projection: Eliza Wall will be a dry, masochistic spinster; Hetty Wall will be a wan, semi-delinquent weakling (and how full of gracious possibility the two little sisters were on first appearance); yet the evolution is entirely logical! Claw Moreau, the young precipitating agent of the girls' miseries, will always be edging criminality; Monty, the "nice" boy of the early years, will be a mild horror of concealed meanness. It is decidedly not a happy picture, and Miss Athas is not made happy by it. But it is the inevitable development from the conditions given at the start of the story. However much Miss Athas may deplore the fate that awaits her characters in maturity, she at least allows them to achieve it. She is willing, as author, to accept this maturity and the responsibility for it.

And the fierce freedom of Miss Athas's imagination is, I think, the reward of this maturity. There is a great deal of fantasy in all our literature of sensibility; but it is narcissistic fantasy, very undaring because it never dares to move beyond the range of the writer's self-love. The quality of Miss Athas's fantasy is almost frighteningly unhampered. On the one hand, Miss Athas can generate her largest dramatic conflicts out of something so apparently trivial as the murder of a pet canary. On the other hand, she can match Faulkner in the imagination of aberrant human behavior. Her story is set in Maine, and even her descriptions of the landscape and weather communicate a new bold experience. There is only a single motive or perception in "The Weather of the Heart" that seems to me to have been formed unfreely—the statement of the source of Eliza Wall's sexual fears: here alone Miss Athas works by rote, looking to the textbook rather than to the image in her own mind.

The circumstances surrounding the publication of "The Weather of the Heart" are unfortunate. The book has a singularly ugly jacket. More important, it is promoted by a blurb from Betty Smith of "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn" fame, which can only mean that its publishers fail to make the necessary discriminations. A writer with no literary reputation or connections, a writer, moreover, who fails to give the reassuring signs of literacy in her text—references to Joyce and Kafka, preferably—has a hard enough time being taken seriously by the literary critics without being given so limp a send-off.

DIANA TRILLING

Films

JAMES
AGEE

OF THE two films by Jean Vigo at the Fifth Avenue Playhouse, "Zero de Conduite," which I commented on last week, seems to me all but unblemished inspiration, moving freely and surely in its own unprecedented world from start to finish, one of the few great movie poems. I admire "L'Atalante" less; it is only the best French movie since the best of René Clair. "Zero" seems to have been made, as all the best work has to be, from the inside out; "L'Atalante," on the whole, is put together from the outside inward. It is very good, spasmodically great poetry applied to pretty good prose; a great talent trying, I judge, to apply itself so far as it can stand to, conventionally and commercially.

The story, which Vigo adapted rather than invented, could almost be one of those pseudo-simple, sophisticated-earthly things which several French movie-makers handle gracefully, to the delight of cultivated Americans who will despise Vigo's work; the sex life of a jealous barge captain and his restive peasant bride; the crawling of the claustrophobic, ironically christened barge along the Seine; a couple of weird flirtations; estrangement; reunion. But Vigo's treatment shows up the French movie "classics" of this sort for the genteel literary exercises they really are. The old familiar "civilized," "Gallic" smirk is strictly outlawed: these are horribly serious, instinctual, brainless people, presented with a naked directness that is beyond patronage or gentle laughter up the sleeve, beyond even any particular show of sympathy. The "atmospheres" which in later films of this sort are sketched in so prettily are not pretty here but gravely monumental, and all-pervasive. The ordinary clever use of props in French films is here no tender exhibition of naive trinkets before the comfortable but a solid drench of inanimate objects, passionately, all but mystically, respected for what they are, and mean to their owners.

At its best "L'Atalante" is sensuously much richer and more beautiful than "Zero"—in spite of the somewhat damaged prints it is clear that Boris Kaufman's camera work in both films should have an article to itself—and once in a while the picture breaks free into Vigo's half mad, strangely majestic kind of poetry. The bridal procession from church to barge, which opens the film, is a great passage, forlorn, pitiful, cruelly funny, and freezingly sinister; Dita Parlo (the bride) is the fullest embodiment of sub-articulate sex that I

MANY THOUSANDS of the regular editions of these books were sold at $1.75

NOW AVAILABLE—

For economical gifts to your friends who have not yet read these two great books—

The New Low-Priced

Pocket Editions

H. G. Wells, CRUX ANSATA:

An Indictment of the Roman Catholic Church.

Pocket Edition . . . 50c
Five copies for $2.00
Per Hundred, $30.00

L. H. Lehmann, BEHIND THE DICTATORS:

A Fully Documented Analysis of Vatican-Fascist Collaboration.

Pocket Edition . . . 50c
Five copies for $2.00
Per Hundred, $30.00

These New POCKET EDITIONS complete in every respect and contain, word for word, the same text as in the higher-priced cloth-bound editions. The purpose behind these NEW POCKET EDITIONS, at these extraordinarily low prices, is to encourage OUR friends to distribute them to THEIR FRIENDS.

These books should be in the hands of every American. We at Agora have done our part toward making this possible. The next steps is YOURS.

AGORA PUBLISHING CO.

Dept. 751NA

120 Liberty St., New York 6, N. Y.

P. S.—The Regular Cloth-Bound Editions of both these books are still available for your library, at $1.75 each, or $3.00 for the two books. Combination prices do not apply to the POCKET EDITIONS have seen; the trinket salesman with whom she flirts is an astonishing cross-breed of slapstick with a kind of jail-bird Ariel; and Michel Simon, as a premental old man, is even more wonderfully realized as a poetic figure, a twentieth-century Caliban. Vigo was a more experienced director by the time he made "L'Atalante," and the picture shows gifts fully as great as those shown in "Zero de Conduite." But for all its quality "L'Atalante" suggests the strugglings of a maniac in a strait-jacket; whereas in "Zero" he moves freely, and it turns out that he is dangerous only to all in the world that most needs destroying.

It is clear that Vigo picked up a good deal from German films of the early twenties, from Clair and Chaplin, and from the whole creative brew of the Paris of his time. On a foggy day, indeed, or with a prejudiced eye, it would be possible to confuse his work with the general sad run of avant-garde movie work, as several reviewers, including some whom I ordinarily respect, have done. But Vigo was no more a conventional avant-gardist than he was a Hollywood pimp; he was one of the very few real originals who have ever worked on film. Nobody has approached hisadroitness in handling reality, consciousness, and time on film (in "Zero"); or has excelled his vivid communication of the animal emotions, the senses, the inanimate world, and their interplay (in "L'Atalante"); nor have I found, except in the best work of the few masters, a flexibility, richness, and purity of creative passion to equal his in both these films.

Here is the little I know about him. He was the son of a Basque revolutionist, and learned to walk in the prison in which, as Vigo put it, his father was suicided. Perhaps that helps explain why he never so much as tried to learn to put his best foot forward. He began his career as an artist in a photographer's studio in Nice. He became an assistant movie camera man, helped organize a film society, and made "A propos de Nice," which was, I gather, a short and extremely sardonic film, nominally in the "documentary" manner. In Paris he made "Zero de Conduite" in 1933 and "L'Atalante" in 1934. He planned several other films, including one about tennis (with Cochet) and one about the French penal colonies; but all arrangements for financing these schemes fell through. When Paris censors saw "Zero" they forbade its release; even at a press screening it caused a near-riot. He was luckier with the more conventional "L'Atalante." The miseries of dying, of tuberculosis, at the age of twenty-nine, with most of his abilities still unused, were exacerbated in Vigo by his knowledge that now that he was helpless to interfere, movie tradesmen were making little improvements on the picture.

Today, according to the Hollywood Quarterly, from which I got most of this information, both films are playing the French neighborhood theaters. It is not said whether they are popular.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN HIS Symphony in Three Movements (1945) Stravinsky uses ideas and methods reminiscent of those of "Le Sacre du printemps"—particularly the obsessive ostinato of rhythmic and melodic figures—in the creation of self-contained musical structures. It is the first movement that has the most attractive ideas, the greatest coherence in what a commentator calls Stravinsky's "additive construction," and a cumulative impact that adds up to tremendous power. But there are effective passages at the beginning and end of the second movement and in the finale, which ends with a frenetic crescendo like the conclusion of "Le Sacre." Impressive and even fascinating is the assured expertness with which the sounds are put together. And constantly I am aware of how those ostinatos invite the Balanchine choreography that I have seen complete Stravinsky's music like an additional line of counterpoint. Stravinsky's performance with the New York Philharmonic, issued by Columbia (Set 680; $4), has a characteristic and appropriate hard clarity which is carried into the recorded sound.

Ormandy's selection and arrangement and scoring of the material of Handel's Water Music that he has recorded with the Philadelphia Orchestra for Columbia (Set X-279; $3) is different from Harty's in the old Columbia set. But more important is the fact that his performance is inferior to Harty's with the London Philharmonic, and is less well recorded. It is in fact amazing to find the sound of the old performance so clear and bright where the new one is so dull, muddy, and harsh.

The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe, which began its season in New York last September insufficiently rehearsed, returned to the City Center for its spring season in a state of exhaustion which made the opening performance of "Dances Concertantes" as agonizing for the spectator as it appeared to be for the dancers. One learned that a wreck on the New Haven had kept them in the Bridgeport station until four o'clock that morning; but this didn't account for the fatigue that continued evident the rest of the first week. The third week Danilova was out several days with a blister; the last week Tallchief left, Danilova was out again with a sinus attack, and Boris with an injured ankle. Even with the company intact there aren't enough first-rank dancers for all the parts that require them, or for alternation in those parts—so that one gets "Swan Lake," "The Nutcracker," and "Ballet Imperial" with Magallanes in parts in which he is embarrassingly incapable of the brilliance they are intended to exhibit; "Ballet Imperial" with Krassovska in a part which requires dazzling speed and sharpness that she lacks; Krassovska also as Danilova's alternate in "Night Shadow," in which she is incapable of Danilova's sustained intensity; Krassovska and Danielian as the inadequate alternates—without the wit and grandeur—of Danilova and Franklin in "Mozartiana"; Bliss in the Franklin part in "Rodeo," for which he hasn't the brilliance and personal force. And when things go wrong the company has no replacements: there was, last spring, more of Krassovska in place of Danilova; there were Tyven, coquettish but unimpassioned, in Tallchief's role in "Night Shadow," and Vida Brown, without Tallchief's sinister force, as the Fairy in "Le Baiser de la fée."

With luck—which I didn't always have—one got the occasional great performances of some of the greatest works in the present-day ballet repertory—"Le Baiser," "Dances Concertantes," "Mozartiana," "Night Shadow," "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme," "Coppelia," "The Nutcracker," "Rodeo." Without luck one got the less effective performances of these works and of other great works—"Ballet Imperial," "Concerto Barocco," "Serenade." If one was lucky one got, with these, at least a Danilova performance in "Swan Lake" or "Gaité parisienne" or "Raymonda"; if not, one got an evening without Danilova in anything at all. And with no luck one got, in addition, "The Bells" or "Snow Maiden" or "Comedia Balletica" or "Scheherazade" or "Le Spectre de la rose" with Danielian.

As for the new ballets, with good luck one saw Antonia Cobos's little dance-suite, "Madroños," not all of it as good as the very funny opening scene and some of Miss Cobos's own amusingly light and sharp Spanish-style dancing at the premiere (what Krassovska did with it at later performances I didn't see). With poor luck one saw Valerie Bettis's "Virginia Sampler," a long and dull piece by a modern dancer unable, in working with more richly equipped ballet dancers, to transcend the limitations of her own vocabulary and of the ideas based on it. And one had to listen to a long piece of bad music by Leo Smit.

With all these possibilities for bad luck it wasn't surprising to see many seats empty that used to be filled. The way to fill them again is to give the public assurance that it can count on seeing the great works of the Monte Carlo repertory in well-rehearsed performances by dancers of the caliber these works require. And I might add my opinion that to achieve such performances the management will have to engage a conductor with at least the ability to start with the dancers (sometimes they had to make second starts), to set a tempo they can dance in (some of the tempos were brutal), and to maintain a tempo he has set—to say nothing of the ability to get an orchestra to play correctly.

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
21st ST.
8th ST.
8th ST.
Bet. Loz. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
23rd ST.

RKO NOW

"HUMAN AND ABSORBING DRAMA."
—N. Y. Sun
Starring HAYWARD • Marsha HUNT
Leo BOWMAN • Eddie ALBERT
'SMASH-UP'
—and—
'THAT'S MY MAN'
Don AMECHE • Catherine McLEOD

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

RONALD COLMAN
'THE LATE GEORGE APLEY'

And Introducing PEGGY CUMMINS
From JOHN P. MARQUAND and GEORGE S. KAUFMAN Play
—and— From
'BEDELIA' VERA CASPARY Novel
Margaret LOCKWOOD • Ian HUNTER

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

MOTION PICTURES

So different . . . So compelling . . . So great . . .

EAGLE-LION FILMS presents

LOUIS HAYWARD • JOAN LESLIE
RICHARD BASEHART

IN

'Repeat Performance'

The story of a woman's great love for a scoundrel

POPULAR PRICES ~ CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

Scientifically Air-Conditioned

Doors Open
9:30 A.M.

RIVOLI

Broadway at 49th STREET

BETTY HUTTON • JOHN LUND

'THE PERILS OF PAULINE'

IN TECHNICOLOR

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

IN PERSON

THE HOUR OF CHARM

ALL GIRL ORCHESTRA UNDER THE DIRECTION OF

PHIL SPITALNY

Featuring EVELYN and Her Magic Viola

The distinctive voice of JOANNE VIOLA & her 17 drums

55¢

TO 1 P.M.

(Tax. Incl.)

Mon. to Fri.

Inclusive

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

STAGE PLAYS

"A very funny
play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

—Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN

LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way. CH 4-4258

Even. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN Present

In association with JOSHUA LOGAN

"A WELCOME HIT."—Columbian, Mirror

JOHN LOVES MARY

A New Comedy by NORMAN KRASNA

Directed by MR. LOGAN

MUSIC BOX, 45th Street, West of B'way

Air-Conditioned Matinee Wed. and Sat. 2:40

"A SMASH HIT."—Life Magazine

ETHEL MERMAN

in the Musical Smash

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Muscle and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON Directed by JOSEPH LOGAN

IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St., West of B'way

Air-Conditioned Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

THE NATION

☐ with Harper's Magazine . . . $8.50
You Save $2.50

☐ with Consumers Union . . . $9.75
You Save $1.25

☐ with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union . . $12.25
You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses

THE NATION by itself:

☐ 1 Year $6 ☐ 2 Years $10 ☐ 3 Years $14

☐ SERVICEMEN'S RATE $4 a YEAR

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations are listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____

STATE _____

7-12-47

SAY YOU SAW

It

ADVERTISED

in

The Nation

•

To Place An Ad

Call

BA 7-1066

Letters to the Editors

Faith vs. Platitudes

Dear Sirs: I am both disappointed and alarmed by the signs of decadence and senility shown by The Nation. For what other interpretation can be given to the publication of the article A Faith to Live By, by Jacques Maritain? The publication of such an article in a liberal magazine could be justified only if it were the basis for a vigorous rebuttal. But to publish it unchallenged is like allowing oneself to be stabbed in the back. It is also a very grave symptom of a serious disease, which unless checked will destroy liberalism.

What has happened to the liberals? Are they so lethargic that they cannot smell the opiate that Maritain offers them? No wonder that the editor of the Register, a reactionary Catholic publication, sneers at The Nation, calling it a "self-styled leading liberal weekly." The Register, echoing Mr. Maritain, thinks that we liberals are tired, defeated, without faith in anything, and ready to fall into the arms of the Catholic church, which loves liberals so much that it has always strangled them. And is plotting to do more strangling.

"Faith in man is saved by faith in God," says Mr. Maritain. Anyone who takes this meaningless platitude for a gem of sober thinking should be sent to school again. Faith in what kind of God? In the God of the Catholic church, of course. What has faith in God brought to man? History has the answer, and it certainly is not flattering to God. Murder, hatred, poverty, exploitation, hunger, and injustice—that is what millions and millions of people who had plenty of faith in God have obtained for thousands of years. Yet Mr. Maritain has the unmitigated gall to ask us to have faith in God and thus solve all our problems. . . .

The Catholic church has condemned liberals and liberalism in clear and vigorous terms, and repeatedly demanded their extermination. Mr. Maritain himself stands indicted and condemned, for his church has officially stated that "a Catholic liberal is not a Catholic or a liberal." Psychology has a name for people who like to be humiliated.

Let Mr. Maritain peddle his quack cure for an ailing world to his own confused people. A real liberal has a faith he lives by. That faith is faith in himself and faith in man. Faith that science—when applied for the benefit of mankind—will give us security, peace, abundance, and happiness, something that "faith in God" has never given man.

J. M. MARTINEZ

Miami, June 27

The Virtues of Price-Fixing

Dear Sirs: Mr. Hutchison's discussion of "Fair Trade" for Whom? in his Everybody's Business of May 3 inclines me to give you some further facts about trade practices in the book field.

The old price-cutting methods played havoc with the distribution of books, and only with the stabilization of prices did the now widely accepted lines of cheap books appear. Readers seldom stop to think that they get most of their reading at a standardized price. Price cutting of newspapers is not permitted by the newspapers. The prices of magazines are held firmly, even for subscriptions. Only in books has there been indiscriminate price cutting.

If a 25-cent book, for example, could be sold at the next store for 19 cents, thus giving the price-cutting store a sort of cultural credit mark as well as a stream of new customers, other stores would promptly drop the line and concentrate on such things as magazines, which have their prices fixed. Only since we have had price standards has the big 25-cent market, now over 100,000,000 books a year, developed. The same standardization has made possible the success of 49-cent and dollar lines. The Modern Library was battered around at one time with prices down way below the production costs. Today it is a cultural asset in thousands of communities, because it is displayed and sold at a uniform price across the country.

The cost of new books will always depend on the cost of production, but publishers are prohibited undue increases by the nature of their business. In the first place, they are in competition, as no other industry is, with endowed institutions producing similar books—and producing them, it will be noted, at no lower prices than the commercial publishers. They produce merchandise, too, with full awareness that if the price is higher than the public wishes to pay, the public can get this same material without payment at a public library. This is highly desirable, but obviously it is a restraint on any undue price increases.

It is so easy to stir up the feeling that the price cutter is a great benefactor that it is worth noting that low-priced books have been made possible by price standardization and fair-trade laws. It is also worth noting that in every other book-producing country the natural expectation of the trade and the regular practice is that prices will be maintained. Only in this country has the opposite expectation been created.

At one time, some fifteen years ago, the English government investigated the question of whether the fair-trade price of books was to the detriment of the public. It came to the conclusion that maintained merchandise was less likely to have a wide margin of mark-up than lines not maintained.

FREDERIC C. MELCHER, President, Publishers' Weekly

New York, June 17

Good Man Gone Wrong

Dear Sirs: As a former officer of the St. Louis Chapter of France Forever, which supported De Gaulle in the years following the fall of France, I should like to register my protest against De Gaulle's present high-handed attempt to override French democracy.

It was absolutely correct, I believe, for democratic forces in and out of France to press for recognition of De Gaulle when the American State Department and the British Foreign Office were snubbing him, just as it was sound patriotic policy for the French underground to give official adherence to his provisional government in opposition to the Pétain-Laval regime of ignominy and betrayal. This attitude was of course based also on the assumption that recognition of De Gaulle's official leadership would strengthen and unify French resistance, and thus hasten liberation. Events have proved that this assumption was correct.

Today, however, it is clear that De Gaulle has repudiated democracy, owing to his innate political and economic conservatism, his strongly reactionary background, and the pressure of big business, aggressive clericalism, and the Truman Doctrine. This possibility was in fact clearly foreseen by many supporters of De Gaulle in this country with whom I had the privilege of working, as well as by underground leaders whose first allegiance was to the French people themselves and to the inherent democracy of France.

This in no way alters the reality of democracy's historic homage to De Gaulle at a time when he had the intelligence and courage to stand up for the French Republic against fascist aggression and its far-flung army of quislings, stool-pigeons, and highly-placed apologists in America and elsewhere.

J. KNOWLES ROBBINS

St. Louis, June 19

The Closed Frontiers

Dear Sirs: Your supplement on the Palestine problem seems to me on the whole well reasoned and fair. One section, however, seems wide open to challenge, that entitled Are There Other Countries to Which the Jews Can Migrate?

It seems to me an error in thinking to consider the immigration laws of the countries listed, including our own, any more final than the protests of the Arabs. Australia, Canada, the United States, and the rest have no more moral right than the Arabs to keep the Jews of Europe from their shores. True, they have the legal right, defined by the size of their armed forces. Australia has great areas in the interior which might profitably be developed. Canada has only a slightly larger population per square mile. And though the United States has a considerably denser population, we have Alaska, much of it virtually unsettled, whose development is vital to our national defense.

Unless we open such areas as these to immigration and development, it seems to me we cannot with clean hands demand of the Arabs that they move over and make room. Aesop's dog in the manger had nothing on us.

HELEN BUGBE

Los Angeles, June 13

A Socialist Historian

Dear Sirs: I am collecting material for a history of the Socialist Party and I hope that some of your readers may be of aid. I am especially interested in back files of old Socialist papers, convention proceedings, factional documents, party committee minutes, correspondence, and so on. I will return in the same condition any material lent. Readers who have such material can communicate with me at the University of Chicago, Faculty Exchange.

DANIEL BELL

Chicago, June 20

Crossword Puzzle No. 219

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 CL—the rest is on the other side of the page
- 6 Jug never found on the dining table
- 10 One of London's four tabloids
- 11 Fever latent in Crete
- 12 Richardson's heroine
- 13 Mr. Root
- 15 I leave Russia in a state of great confusion
- 17 Micawber-like
- 19 This guide to mariners is always at sea
- 21 "And ----- trembles when he sees The weakest saint upon his knees"
- 23 Love game! That's the end
- 24 High-speed water installation where there's a lack?
- 27 One of our seaboards
- 28 Prickly pear? No, the pulpy kind
- 29 Firm relations
- 30 The one cent class?

DOWN

- 1 Used by descendants of mine
- 2 So clear should be the voices of the prophets
- 3 Cause of "blacking-out" in the stratosphere?
- 4 A key man may be needed in his industry

- 5 A center of attraction at the circus
- 7 I. Walker turns out to be hostile
- 8 That's telling
- 9 They give point to views of the countryside
- 14 Machines soporific to cattle
- 16 Had enough
- 18 I come in to displace a petitioner
- 20 Name of two Hollywood film actors
- 22 "-----," chorus the children, in Hansel and Gretel (3, 2, 2)
- 24 Does winceyette shrink? To a certain extent
- 25 Am mounted—with others
- 26 Committed, not to paper, but to memory

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 218

ACROSS:—1 CLOTHES; 5 SKYBLUE; 6 BOILING; 10 CULTURE; 11 ART; 13 LIN NET; 15 PONDER; 16 DEWCLAW; 17 RODE; 19 AROW; 20 EASY CHAIR; 21 ROLL; 23 MOBY; 26 NOT EVER; 28 MAMMON; 29 ROSTER; 30 ISM; 32 ADAMANT; 33 AMERICA; 34 ENDLESS; 35 NOSTRUM.
DOWN:—1 COBBLER; 2 ORIONID; 3 HAIRIED; 4 SAGA; 5 SECT; 6 YELLOW; 7 LAUNDER; 8 EYEBROW; 12 RICHARDS; 14 TENSION; 15 PALAVER; 16 EEL; 19 ARM; 21 RUMMAGE; 22 LON BARD; 24 OUTLIER; 25 YARDARM; 26 NONAGE; 27 ROWERS; 30 ITIS; 31 MAINE.

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then your credit for further books. Let us send you a detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-2
599 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

FUR REMODELING

Superb Workmanship and Styling
Economically

M. SCOTT FURS

236 West 30th Street New York 1, N. Y.
Longacre 5-4917

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, New York. Farms in the Mass.-New York Berkshires. Also consulting broker for organizations.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peckskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515 M.

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Available under GI Bill off Rights. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20, N. Y.

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

MILLIONS OF USED, RARE and out-of-print books stocked in 15 cities. Mention interests if catalogues are wanted. TAAB, 529 S. Melville St., Phila. 43.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocation, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

CURRIES

HOW TO MAKE GOOD CURRIES: Your request with a 3¢ stamp will bring you our Recipe Booklet of precise Indian recipes for making curries of chicken, lamb, shrimp and vegetables. Learn the simple principles of using this condiment; it changes ordinary foods into new and delightful dishes.

JAVA-INDIA CONDIMENT CO., IMPORTERS

442 Hudson Street New York 14, N. Y.

Classified Advertising Rates

74¢ A LINE (SIX WORDS)

Minimum three lines

Box No. counted as three words

Classified Display $7.39 per inch

Attractive Discounts for Multiple Insertions

THE NATION

30 Vesey Street New York City 7
Bklyn 7-1066

RESORTS

The HEALTH REST

Dr. Alice Chase • Spring Valley, N. Y.

Enjoy a health-building vacation at this Vegetarian Resort complete with sun-baths and exercises, special diets under professional supervision, cheerful, comfortable rooms, beautiful surroundings, stimulating activities. All this and more at moderate rates.

RESERVE NOW • Phone Maruet 2316 or 967 everything is just perfect of the Glenmere

(ask anyone who's been there!)

the Glenmere
CHESTER, NEW YORK
PHONE CHESTER 200-N. Y. PHONE NECTOR 2-5047

Alpine Meadows Farm

A charming remodeled farmhouse with all modern equipment, wholesome cooking, delightful landscape, sparkling swimming pool, informal recreations. 12 miles north of Saratoga.

$40 per week during season

write: Mrs. Rose Rice

PORTERS CORNERS NEW YORK
Ph: Greenfield Center 48411 or in N. Y. RA 8-3899

Pine Crest in the Berkshires

WEST CORNWALL, CONN.

the beautiful Housatonic River

A delightful Adult Resort

Main House and Deluxe Bungalows for Two. Boating, Swimming, fine Tennis, Bicycling, Music Recordings and Dancing.

DIANA & ABE BERMAN

Phone—West Cornwall 89-12

GLACIER LODGE
CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.

A picturesque Estate.
Diversified Book and Music Library.
Swimming Pool . . . Golf.
An Adult Resort 45 miles from N. Y. C.
TEL. HIGHLAND HILLS 3071

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT

Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes; interesting hiking objectives through woodland trails; the tennis and handball courts, basketball, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping pong, square dancing.

JULY & AUGUST Rate: $55, $65

OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

From

WESTERN VIEW FARM

high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an inn which is in its Twenty-eighth season under the same ownership-management.

Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week

TED OHMER

New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

LOVERS OF NATURE

find charming surroundings and privacy on the scenic views high up in the Catskills, good table, sports. Number of guests limited to 10. About $40. Phone Bklyn 9-4887 for information and reservations.

ROSE BROOK FARM

SPRUCETON, NEW YORK

Say You Saw It ADVERTISED
in The Nation

RESORTS

White Horse Lodge

P. O. Box
Westbrookville
New York

71 Miles
From
New York City

Adult Resort Hotel • All Sports

150-Foot Swimming Pool • Superb Cuisine

Excellent Accommodations Including Private Baths

Rates $57 to $63 weekly. Booklet on request

SUGGEST EARLY RESERVATION

Phone Port Jervis 35-190

New York Office: Bklyn 9-5468

DOROTHY & NAT LUKIN, Prop.

PLUM POINT
Vacation Fun Year Round
on the majestic Hudson

• seasonal sports
• delicious food
• care informality

45 MILES FROM NYC • NEW WINDSOR, NY • NEWBURGH 4230

HATHAWAY LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces. Tennis courts, handball, badminton. Swimming pool, sun pavilion. Horseback riding. Golf course nearby. Delicious food. Easy transportation. American-Jewish cooking. Attractive rates.

For reservations or booklet write or call

HATHAWAY LODGE, Maines Falls, N. Y.

Telephone: Tannersville 299

This Adult Camp...

Sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports.

Gloucester, Mass.
Abram Resnick
Director

Write for booklet and rates

"THE WEATHERVANE"

ON THE MOORS

Gravine Road • East Gloucester • Mass.
Located in entrancing art colony. Five minutes walk to beach. Inspiring surroundings—intriguing people.

The Location Also of

FRANK PACK School of Painting

Write to: BERTRAM OPPENHEIM

Gravine Road, East Gloucester, Mass.

Relax, Rejoice with Summer at

Lakecrest

On Hunn's Lake Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N. Y. C. R. R. to Amenia, N. Y. Open all year.

WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS

EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 2828

INDIAN LAKE LODGE

INDIAN LAKE, N. Y.

In the heart of the Adirondacks

Moderate Rates

Informal Entertainment

SPORTS • NIGHTLY DANCING

For complete information call

N. Y. Office—Stuyvesant 9-1986

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 19, 1947

NUMBER 3

The Shape of Things

THE SIXTEEN-NATION CONFERENCE OF PARIS has begun auspiciously. The empty chairs were noted with regret, but not too much time was taken up in answering the rather preposterous charges that the West was attempting to "isolate" Russia or that Paris was simply a big-power conspiracy against the independence and sovereign rights of lesser nations. The disappointment over the absence of the eastern nations was quite sincere. For the recovery of Europe, even with the help of the enormous resources of the United States, is but a half-recovery without the cooperation of the East. The first concern of the committees that have got down to work with businesslike dispatch will be to survey Europe's needs in the specific terms of the most urgent shortages: food and agricultural products, coal and power, transportation, and certain classes of machinery. The problem of Germany has already emerged as a pressing one. For without a plan for Germany, Western European recovery cannot be envisioned. It is here that the conference, which has emphasized its exclusively economic nature, is bound to run into political difficulties. M. Bidault said in his opening speech: "It has been alleged that the unavowed aim of our meeting is to rebuild Germany first. The resources of Germany ought to be utilized for Europe, Germany included. I want to emphasize in the name of the French delegation that any other interpretation is improper." But any positive plan for Germany that goes beyond the Potsdam agreement at once raises political questions and chiefly the very large question whether the Western nations are prepared to go ahead with a plan for western Germany without a unanimous four-power agreement. This decision seems now to be on the books, with long-term political consequences at present unforeseeable. One of the most hopeful aspects of the conference is the constant reiteration that the door to the east is left unlatched and the welcome sign is on the mat.

✱

MEANWHILE ANOTHER SORT OF DIPLOMATIC activity has been evident in Eastern Europe. The humiliation suffered by the Czechs in having to cancel their acceptance in response to a telephone call from the Kremlin may have been assuaged to some extent by the new trade agreement Prime Minister Gottwald brought back with him from Moscow. Since then, a trade agreement has been announced between the Soviet Union and Bulgaria, and others will doubtless follow. As Constantine Poulos notes on page 64, the Eastern European countries will certainly carry out their plans for an integrated economic order to the best of their ability. But what is also evident, as one studies the reports of the agreements the Soviet Union has drafted, is that the desires of the eastern countries for the means of industrialization will not be met. The surpluses which Russia can offer are for the most part agricultural surpluses and raw materials in which its satellites are rich. Czechoslovakia and Russia most nearly approximate complementary economies, but Russia will not be able to supply the Czechs with the high-grade machinery they now urgently need. Bulgaria may be glad to dispose of its tobacco crop for Russian wheat, but given decent crop conditions Bulgaria will soon show a food surplus and will be looking for machines. So also in the case of Poland, Yugoslavia, Rumania, and Hungary. Without trade with the West, they will maintain, as Poulos describes it, "the slow dreary tempo of recovery." It is hard to believe, however, that the present political considerations that have dictated Russia's fiat against the eastern nations' participation in the Paris meeting, will, in the long run, survive the economic pull between East and West. Even Russia will surely be brought to the conclusion that economically dissatisfied neighbors are not good neighbors.

✱

FROM NO MATTER WHERE YOU SIT, THE Greek drama looks bad these days. In Greece the government arrests 2,800 "reds" to forestall a "Communist coup." In Washington Norman Armour, the new State Department top policy man, announces that the United States is naturally interested in the arrests but regards them as a matter of internal administration. The United States, he adds, is interested, also, in seeing peaceful conditions restored in Greece; the matter of what steps the Greek government may find necessary to take to preserve law and order is for Athens itself to decide. In New York Dwight P. Griswold, on the eve of leaving to head the American aid program, declares in a broadcast that the object of that program on the military side is "to assist in providing the Greek national army with the equip-

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	57
The Economic Outlook	59
Atomic Witch-Hunt	60
Ring Around a Law	61

CARTOON

No Exit by Ezekiel Schloss	62
-----------------------------------	----

ARTICLES

The Soviets Say No by Léon Blum	63
The Eastern Bloc by Constantine Poulos	64
Tribal Town by Richard L. Neuberger	66
Race Bias in Housing. I. The Great Hypocrisy by Charles Abrams	67
The French Crisis by Michael Clark	70
Justice in the Army? by Leonard M. Wallstein, Jr.	71
Letter from Italy by Mario Rossi	73
In the Wind	74
Everybody's Business: Russia's Vicious Circle by Keith Hutchison	75

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The German Tragedy by Reinhold Niebuhr	76
Arturo Barea by Ralph Bates	76
The Jaded. A Poem by Rolfe Humphries	77
Smaller Than Life by James Baldwin	78
Haunted by Felicity by Parker Tyler	79
Films by James Agee	79
Music by B. H. Haggin	81

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

82

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 220

by Jack Barrett	83
------------------------	----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchway

Managing Editor

J. King Gordon

Literary Editor

Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Casey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

ment and supplies necessary for the restoration of internal order." And now from government sources in Athens comes the news that an "army" of 1,000 men has crossed the border from Albania in an attempt to relieve a beleaguered guerrilla garrison. From all these excursions and alarms, one fact emerges clear—so clear that everybody seems to know it except the State Department: our Greek policy is off on the wrong foot. The present corrupt and reactionary Greek government is incapable of bringing about the peaceful conditions which the United States "is interested" in seeing restored; the non-intervention which Mr. Armour and Mr. Griswold so valiantly profess constitutes in fact the worst form of interference in the affairs of the Greek people. The official American view, apparently, is that the only alternative to the present government is a Communist regime controlled by Moscow. This is a stupid and defeatist view. Persisted in, it is guaranteed to encourage bigger and better "red plots," more and more mass arrests—in short, an extension of the civil war. The end result will be the very one the American policy is designed to prevent. As to the situation on the Greek northern frontier, it is high time for this to be brought under international surveillance. The sooner an international border commission, such as has been proposed in the United Nations Security Council, gets into active operation, the better for the Greek people and the world's peace of mind.

✱

GOOD HOUSING WILL NOT CURE EVERYTHING that's wrong with us, but bad housing lies close to the root of many sicknesses of the body politic. Certainly the most unpalatable and most devastating phase of the whole shoddy housing situation is that of discrimination—the maintenance of ghettos, in twentieth-century America, for one or another minority group. As Charles Abrams makes clear in his acute analysis, Race Bias in Housing, starting in this issue on page 67, the ghetto ripens into a political and social institution once it has been sanctified by the courts. And it has, for many years, either received such sanction or received the equally substantial benediction of judicial approval by default. Today, as Mr. Abrams' series appears, we may be on the verge of a change for the better. Three weeks ago the Supreme Court of the United States decided, for the first time in history, to review two state court decisions upholding the restrictive covenant. The restrictive covenant has long been a prime tool of the real-estate fraternity that has learned how to merchandise prejudice. The cases, involving covenants in Michigan and Missouri, will probably come up in October; the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Civil Liberties Union, and the American Jewish Congress are throwing their considerable legal talents into the fight; this magazine will observe developments closely. Almost as exciting as the Supreme Court cases is the suit now being brought by three Negro war veterans (for whom Mr. Abrams is counsel) against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, builders and owners of the racially restrictive Stuyvesant Town. The N. A. A. C. P. and the A. J. C. are backing this fight too. The Stuyvesant Town formula would establish a pattern for government subsidization of discrimination. To forestall the creation of such a pattern, the several plaintiffs have submitted briefs asking that Metropolitan be prevented by injunction from barring Negro tenants in Stuyvesant Town. The Supreme Court of New York is at this moment weighing those briefs.

★

WE ARE INDEBTED FOR THIS EDITORIAL TO Eva Madden of New York City, who last week called to the attention of the editors of the New York Herald Tribune the following "Prayer for Landlords":

We heartily pray Thee to send Thy Holy Spirit into the hearts of them that possess the grounds and pastures of the earth, that they, remembering themselves to be Thy tenants, may not rack or stretch out the rents of their houses or lands, nor yet take unreasonable fines or moneys after the manner of covetous worldlings, but so to let them out that the inhabitants thereof may be able to pay their rents and to live and nourish their families and remember the poor. Give them grace also to remember that they are but pilgrims and strangers in this world, having no dwelling place, but seeking one to come, that they, remembering the short continuance of this life, may be content with that which is sufficient . . . that after this life they may be received into everlasting habitations.

This passage, Miss Madden notes, is taken from the Book of Common Prayer of Edward VI. Edward VI was the son of Henry VIII; he was studious, somewhat retiring, and devout, and died at the age of fifteen in 1553 A.D.

★

THE APPOINTMENT OF DR. RUSTEM VAMBERY to represent Hungary in Washington is an indication that the Budapest regime, despite its supposed total subservience to Moscow, is making a genuine effort to improve relations with the United States. No one can accuse Dr. Vambery of being either Communist or fellow-traveler. Courageous liberal, scholar, and jurist of international reputation, he will bring to his office a wisdom and experience equal to its responsibilities. Member of a distinguished Budapest family, he took an active part before the First World War in resisting both the dominance of German culture and the strident chauvinism of the Magyar nationalists. In 1918 he was a member of the group of liberals who supported Count Michael Karolyi in his shortlived regime. During the dark night of the Horthy dictatorship, Dr. Vambery courageously fought for the liberties of the Hungarian people, using his talents as a lawyer to defend those unjustly arrested for their political beliefs. He came to the United States in 1939 and until 1944 lectured on criminology and penology in New York's New School of Social Research. During the war he was active in organizing the American Federation of Democratic Hungarians and became chairman of the Committee for a New Democratic Hungary. In the first Hungarian national elections, he was unanimously elected an honorary member of the Hungarian National Assembly. Dr. Vambery is an old friend of The Nation and a frequent contributor. We wish him well in his new post. His wit, his charm, and his wisdom will serve him well as an ambassador between East and West.

The Economic Outlook

IN HIS forthcoming report to Congress on the economic outlook, the President, it is believed, will minimize the threat of an early recession. At the same time, it seems likely that he will call attention to the imminent danger of a new twist to the inflationary spiral, which will in the end lead inevitably to a more certain and deeper recession.

Currently the economic outlook has many favorable aspects. We have reached a new high in employment, topping Henry Wallace's mark of 60,000,000 jobs, and average weekly take-home pay has risen above its war-time peak. However, the hope that rising production would make possible the equation of supply and demand at a high level, thus checking any further rise in the cost of living, is fading. After their very sharp jump in the first quarter of the year, prices receded a little and then gave signs of settling on a plateau. But in the last few weeks a new upward thrust has become apparent. There are signs that consumer resistance to high prices is weakening, and merchants are once again showing eagerness to buy forward in anticipation of higher quotations. Meanwhile, output of many of the most basic commodities—cotton, steel, oil, meat, and lumber among others—continues to lag behind demand.

The President would be failing in his duty if he did not call the attention of Congress to these facts, particularly as many measures under consideration on Capitol Hill seem calculated to encourage rather than counteract inflationary trends. For instance, the Senate Banking and Currency Committee has just approved a bill relaxing instalment-purchase controls; the corresponding House Committee wants to abolish them altogether. Again, while action may be postponed until the next session, there is strong sentiment in Congress for permitting immediate cash conversion of some two billion dollars of G. I. terminal-leave bonds—clearly an inflationary move. Above all, we have the attempt to put through the tax-cut bill unchanged except for the alteration in its effective date from July 1, 1947, to January 1, 1948.

Commenting on the President's veto of the previous bill, we agreed with him it was "the wrong kind of bill" but expressed some doubts about his point that it was the wrong time for cuts. Since then, indications of growing inflationary pressure have convinced us that the government cannot safely add to the volume of purchasing power by tax reduction. That is a weapon which, as Senator Wayne Morse has very sensibly proposed, should be held in reserve for the time when production and employment show clear evidence of a decline. Unfortunately, the Republican majority is intent on making fiscal changes dependent on its political time-table, whereas they ought to be determined solely by the national economic time-table.

Since most of the press favors the tax bill, its inflationary implications have not received much publicity. Moreover, the newspapers have already decided that if prices take another upward spin the responsibility will lie with labor in general and the miners in particular. Consequently, the effect of the coal settlement on costs is being grossly exaggerated. The new wage level will raise average costs of coal-getting by 61 cents a ton, if production declines proportionately to the decrease in working hours. According to Business Week, however, coal experts believe that output per man day will be little affected, in which case the increase in labor costs will be much less than 61 cents a ton. Nevertheless, coal operators are raising prices more than 70 cents a ton, and Pittsburgh retailers have added $1 a ton.

There is also a great deal of talk about the "inevitability" of a sharp rise in steel prices, with one "steel man" quoted by the Wall Street Journal saying, "Our prices must be increased if the industry is to survive." Suggestions of as much as $5 a ton have been freely canvassed, although it takes no more than two tons of coal to make one ton of steel. It is claimed, however, that the advance in coal costs is merely the last straw breaking the steel masters' backs; the rise in steel wages, higher railroad rates, and inflated raw-material costs are combining to reduce steel profits to zero. Actually, there is reason to believe that these factors are being offset by increased labor productivity and the economies of capacity operation. We feel safe in predicting that second-quarter reports from the steel companies, due in a few weeks, will show that the industry is far from bankrupt. In fact, industry in general is generating profits at such a prodigious rate that it is easily able to absorb recent wage increases. If, nevertheless, prices are boosted again, the blame should be assigned not to labor but to the business instinct to grab all that the traffic will bear.

Atomic Witch-Hunt

FOR some months the United States Atomic Energy Commission has been voicing a lugubrious complaint: barriers have been placed in the way of its hiring scientists, engineers, and administrators which make it extremely difficult if not impossible to assemble a first-class staff.

There were difficulties enough in the first place, the commission points out. The work which top-flight scientists are asked to do—in large part, to perfect ever more devastating atomic bombs—is utterly antipathetic to the scientific spirit. Moreover, the stringent security and secrecy rules under which government scientists must work are contrary to the honored methods of science. And, finally, government scientists are denied the psychic wage of prestige, since they are forbidden to publish their findings.

On top of all this, Congress recently forced a drastic reduction of salary schedules—below the point which permits the government to compete with offers from outside employment. And now, for political, reactionary economic, isolationist, and the Lord knows what other reasons, Congress has chosen the Atomic Energy Commission as principal field in a fanatical witch-hunt. The mouthings of J. Parnell Thomas, John E. Rankin, and other legislators have made a man's acceptance of a job with the commission in effect an invitation to have his character assassinated and a declaration that he is an agent of red Roosia.

Last week's phony revelations about "unknown agents" stealing A-bomb secrets illustrate the situation. The New York Sun and the Patterson papers devoted yards of type to reviling the AEC and to proving that it differed from the Politbureau only in geographic location. Crowning with glee, Thomas said, "I told you so." The story backfired, as effectively as any in journalistic history: it turned out that the theft was the act of two army sergeants and took place at Los Alamos—not Oak Ridge, as reported—when Los Alamos was under military control, indeed under the direction of the super-safe and hallowed General Groves. And it was the stumblebum civilians, those subversive fellows, who detected the theft. Their story shot from under them, Thomas and his press pretended not to notice and repeated the calumny, muttering new Gruelemärchen, the more terrifying for being the less specific.

Thus, the commission's complaints are only too well founded. But recently, by its own action, the AEC added the capstone to the barrier against its employment of high-caliber personnel. It joined with the State, War, and Navy departments in requesting permanent legislation to permit these "sensitive" agencies summarily to fire any employee, without even telling him the reason for his dismissal, without granting hearing or review.

It is alleged that such procedure may be necessary, in rare cases and where subversive action is clearly established, in order to achieve "maximum security." But no explanation of why it may be necessary has been furnished by any of the four agencies; no hypothetical case has been cited. And one can scarcely be imagined.

Suppose the worst situation: an employee with access to secret and vital information is discovered to be an enemy agent. Without any power of summary dismissal, the AEC or one of the departments can suspend him, sequester him, stop the flow of information to him, transfer him elsewhere—in fact, stop him cold, instantly—all under its normal powers. The subsequent hearings necessary to kick him out of the government entirely need not be too onerous or time-consuming—and they protect the employee's civil, indeed, his constitutional rights.

Suppose the commission or the department or the FBI wants to avoid tipping off the spy ring with which the employee is working. In that case, surely, the suspect would not be discharged without explanation. No clearer tip-off could be imagined.

The rationale for the request for legislation, if there is one, seems to be that sometimes a "sensitive" agency may want to fire a man without any red tape. But red tape is a small price to pay for civil rights. And preservation of his civil rights is the minimum guaranty which the AEC ought to be able to offer to a man it wants to hire.

Ring Around a Law

THE language in the new coal contract provides the first examples of the devices which strong unions will use, not to evade the Taft-Hartley act, but rather to operate as far as possible outside its scope. The trick clauses which Lewis wrote into the settlement do not save his union from being charged by the National Labor Relations Board with the commission of the various unfair labor practices specified in the new law. Those are matters of public interest, not to be set aside by a contract between two parties. But the clauses do have the effect of depriving employers of almost all the weapons which the law sought to put into their hands. They have a legal right to waive them, and waive them they did because Lewis was in a position to force them to do so. Thus the employers promised not to use any of the unfair labor practices mentioned in the law as the basis for damage suits. At the same time, Lewis made no other promises of performance; accordingly there is nothing in the contract for him or the miners to breach.

Both C. I. O. and A. F. of L. have indicated that they will use similar tactics and devices. The "no-strike pledge," a useful and stabilizing instrument in the hands of a responsible union leader dedicated to preventing wildcat strikes, will drop out of future contracts wherever unions are strong enough to force its omission. Such promises have now become too risky. Under the Wagner act, they could not be used as pegs on which to hang damage suits when wildcat strikes occurred; under the Taft-Hartley act they very probably can be so used.

Strong, well-organized unions, particularly those in the skilled-crafts field, may well do without any contracts whatever. A group of compositors or bricklayers, for example, will simply meet in their union hall and determine what the wages and working conditions will be. Employers will comply, or do without workers.

Similarly, strong unions, craft or industrial, will not use NLRB procedure to obtain recognition as bargaining agents. They will wait until they are well organized in a plant and then demand a contract. If the employer refuses to recognize them, they may strike, and quite legally, for the law does not prohibit or penalize organization strikes in the absence of prior NLRB certification.

The use of these methods—and there are several others equally effective—means that the future will see less, not more, collective bargaining and less, not more, resort to the peaceful procedures of the law. The A. F. of L.'s directions to its component organizations, and statements and instructions already issued by the C. I. O. steel and electrical workers, demonstrate that the law is operating to defeat the exact aims which it was explicitly designed to achieve.

It will constrain the strong unions to become stronger. They know that there is no hope or comfort for them in the infinitely cumbersome and delaying procedures of the NLRB as these have now been revamped, and therefore they will be obliged to gain their ends by their own strength. This means strikes. It means also that there will really come to pass that "collective bludgeoning" against which Taft and Ball were so fond of inveighing.

What has been said above applies to strong unions. To repeat, the law forces them to grow stronger. But it will make weak unions weaker and will effectively prevent organization in areas where the going was already tough. Against skilful and determined employer opposition, no weak union has a chance. Using the provisions of the new law and the new NLRB procedures, and dealing with a union unable to pull an effective strike, an employer can delay certification for at least a couple of years. Then he can harass the union, challenge it, fire its leaders, and commit every unfair practice in the book for many more months before the NLRB can worry the case through the courts, catch up with him—and slap his wrist. Against such activities, no union that is only a "little fellow" can survive. Every union knows it. It can scarcely be that Taft, Hartley, Ball, and the N. A. M. don't know it too.

NO EXIT

The Soviets Say No

BY LEON BLUM

Paris, July 5

THE Paris conference did not open in a very favorable atmosphere. Only a few maniacal optimists like myself were inclined, or rather forced themselves, to envisage its success. The memory of Moscow was still too fresh and vivid. Most people dreaded the delays, the chicaneries, the long and bitter discussions, and then the final deferment of any decision. But nobody foresaw such a sudden and complete break. That was the reason the cruel blow caused general consternation.

Yes, cruel—I cannot take back the word. Even if no cruelty of method on the part of the U. S. S. R. marked the break—sweet smiles and tender handshakes were exchanged between Molotov and Georges Bidault according to the press photographs—the Soviet Union withdrew from the conference with brutal abruptness, without trying to understand its purpose, without looking for a possible basis of agreement, without formulating any positive counter-proposal.

It is even harder to understand what happened if one recalls the sequence of events between the announcement of the Truman Doctrine and the Paris conference. The President's severe and almost menacing speech dealing with the Greek and Turkish question made an American loan look like an anti-Soviet defense measure and even like a para-military operation. A few weeks later, after the alarmed reaction of international public opinion, an almost equally resounding speech by Assistant Secretary of State Dean Acheson corrected this view. An American loan was to be granted only as a contribution to Europe's economic recovery. However, political affinity between the governments of the credit-demanding nations and the American system was still a condition of the loan; the Parisian papers of every political shade, the Monde as well as the Populaire, pointed out this difficulty. It was then that General Marshall spoke at Cambridge, after the failure of the Moscow conference, in an effort to dissipate the existing confusion and apprehension.

According to General Marshall's plan the United States would no longer carry on isolated transactions with France or any other European nation. American aid would be furnished to Europe collectively. Europe would be invited to set up a comprehensive plan to aid itself, which it would submit to the American government.

Everybody was struck by the economic and non-political character of the plan. Its only political influence would be indirect—through its very benefits, inasmuch as the misery or well-being of a people is a political factor of prime importance. Moreover, the American government could no longer be suspected of political discrimination, for all Europe was called upon to draw up a statement of its needs upon which American action would be based.

The Foreign Ministers of Russia, Great Britain, and France met in Paris to decide the wording of a joint answer to General Marshall's proposal. The conference had no other object. How is it possible that not even a common pledge of adherence to the fundamental principles of the plan could be agreed upon? How is one to understand the Soviet Union's resistance to these principles, which had been evolved precisely in order to overcome its distrust and opposition?

I continue to insist on this point because it is of capital importance. If the American government had offered to negotiate separately with the various European states, these negotiations might have been expected to have very uneven results, according to the favor with which the government in question was viewed by American public opinion and the American Congress. There would certainly have been suspicion of political pressure and fear of a "Western trap."

But the Marshall plan dissipated, even excluded, such suspicion and fear. As I said above, the Marshall plan seemed made to order for the Soviet Union and its satellites. Why, then, did the Soviet Union oppose it?

Did the Kremlin fear that elements of political pressure, inequality of distribution, partiality, however categorically denied by the United States, might still be introduced into the preparatory work by some European power, especially by Great Britain or France? This would seem to be a strange charge to bring against a government headed by an Attlee or a Ramadier. But even if it were justified, against any semblance of probability, it was up to the Soviet government to suggest methods of organization and action which would have insured the good faith, impartiality, and justice necessary to place all European nations on an equal footing. I am certain such suggestions by the Soviet Union would have met with no objection. If they had been introduced into the discussion, all the democratic forces in Great Britain and France would have rallied to their support. Nothing would have been easier for the Soviet Union than to take steps in this direction. But it did not do so.

It is therefore not difficult to place the responsibility for the failure of the conference. No doubt about it exists. But this sort of certainty is no consolation. On its arduous path toward order, amity, prosperity, and peace the world has just experienced a harsh setback. We must now recover from the shock and continue our task despite the hardships ahead.

The Eastern Bloc

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

New York, July 12

SOME five weeks ago, shortly after the Communists had strengthened their position in Hungary, one of the Americans serving at the legation in Budapest told me that the inclusion of Hungary in the American post-UNRRA relief bill passed by Congress in late May had had a great deal to do with the Soviet Union's decision to tighten its hold on that country.

Two days ago, on July 10, the Soviet High Commissioner on the Allied Council for Austria demanded the withdrawal of the conditions placed on the American aid program for Austria, which were the same that Hungary would have had to meet. They require, among other things:

[that the recipient country] has taken or is taking, in so far as possible, the economic measures necessary to reduce its relief needs and to provide for its own future reconstruction.

Upon request of the President, it [the recipient country] will furnish promptly information concerning the production, use, distribution, importation, and exportation of any supplies which affect the relief needs of the people of such country.

Fulfillment of these two conditions, not to list the several others—including one providing that "full and continuous publicity will be given within such country as to the purpose, source, character, scope, amounts, and progress of the United States relief program carried on therein"—would automatically force a deviation in the pro-Russian orientation of the countries of Eastern Europe. Russia feels that it cannot permit this to happen. At all costs it will try to prevent American influence from "infiltrating" into Eastern Europe.

This was apparently in Molotov's mind at Paris. But Molotov is not only opposed to American aid for Europe with a dollar label and to any strengthening of American interests in Europe, he is also afraid of a stable, economically integrated Europe which might get to be comparatively independent of both the United States and the Soviet Union.

Although the division between East and West is deeper today than ever before, the United States can still prevent the elimination or reduction of its influence if it will reevaluate the forces of Eastern Europe and revise its past policies and approaches. American policy in Eastern Europe up to now has concerned itself with two matters: first, American interests, and second, establishment of a formal Western democracy which would theoretically protect and enlarge those interests.

The war had hardly ended when Washington started sending notes to the Eastern European countries protesting against various anti-democratic activities. The notes were naturally suspect and therefore usually ignored. They were suspect because men and women in power today have long memories. They remember that when they were tortured and imprisoned and their comrades were killed by the pre-war dictatorial regimes, the United States did not utter one word of protest. And they know that there is less freedom of expression in Spain and Portugal than in Poland and Bulgaria; yet the American government does not protest.

The notes were apparently based on the fallacious theory that democracy could be "created" in this part of Europe. This fallacy was in line with the conception that a good, possibly misguided, but orderly society existed in Eastern Europe on which an armed minority was imposing a new political and economic pattern. Actually, the old order was destroyed and new patterns are being worked out with the elements at hand.

Our getting angry with the governments of Eastern Europe only strengthened the Communists there and weakened the moderate elements. More than anything else these governments need understanding. As has been said many times, the new regimes are victims of circumstances more than forces of evil. They have shown courage and exceptional energy and have put many long-overdue reforms into effect.

Instead of attempting to understand the new social and political forces that have found expression in the Eastern European governments, the United States has based its policy so far on support of "the opposition." But "the opposition" is cankered, bankrupt, and negative. Lamely it blames its failure to present any social or economic program on the presence of Russian troops. It uses the old formula of covering up its social and economic impotence with nationalist slogans. Although it is based on peasant support, it has no plan to oppose to the sincere determination of the governments to improve agricultural methods and production and to alleviate the poverty of the peasants by increased industrialization.

The peasant parties of Poland, Austria, and Rumania do not represent the peasants any more than the Small CONSTANTINE POULOS has just returned to this country after a long stay in Eastern Europe. This is the last of a series of three articles.

Holders' Party of Hungary does. The real peasants lost the leadership of their parties twenty years ago to middle-class merchants and urban professional people; they are not likely to regain it now that the parties have been inundated with ex-fascist collaborators and upper-class business men.

Poland's Stanislaw Mikolajczyk is a particularly fair-headed boy of the West if one is to judge by the support ostentatiously given him. That support, coupled with the pressure from the violently right-wing forces he has had to accept into his following, has led him far astray. Seeking only to demonstrate his opposition to the left bloc, he departed from the traditional position of his party last year and called on the peasants to vote for the retention of the "gentry" senate which had always fought against land reform.

In Rumania it is even more obvious that the existing opposition is not a peasant movement but a reactionary nationalist movement, exploiting the discontent and misery of the people in an attempt to restore the old order—all in the name of anti-communism and anti-Sovietism. In the preelection campaign last November the National Peasant Party leader, Iuliu Maniu, said, "The National Peasant state will be a labor state," and mumbled something about his platform "guaranteeing the rights of the working class." But when Maniu was in power in 1933, the police shot down 480 striking railway workers.

The nepotic Liberal Party of the Bratianu family also appealed to the peasants in the November campaign, but everybody in Rumania knows that the Bratianu family has been sucking the peasants dry for a century and a half and leading them to the polls at the bayonet point.

In Bulgaria the story is much the same. One of the leaders of the Bulgarian "peasant" opposition is listed in British records as having received funds from Mussolini for the propagation of the fascist faith.

A Small Holder deputy said recently, "Hungary does not need a three-year plan: it needs rain."

The vacuum in which the peasant-party leaders are functioning forces them to rely on extremist, chauvinist support. Last summer Mikolajczyk's men in the Cracow area offered to take me to the terrorist forest bands and boasted that a membership card in the Peasant Party was a laissez-passer through the territory they dominated. A Rumanian professor in Cluj, who is also a leading member of Maniu's party, earnestly assured me that Rumania would have no peace until all Hungarians and Jews had been cleaned out of the country. The Small Holders implicated in the childish plot against the Hungarian left last January were conspiring with the left-overs of the Horthy, irredentist, anti-Semitic army caste.

The hierarchy of the Catholic church offers the strongest and most serious opposition to the present regimes in every country of Eastern Europe except Rumania and Bulgaria, where the number of Catholics is small. The Catholic church is fighting Russian influence and consequently the new regimes on every level of social and political life.

Totaling up the opposition and studying its performance to date, one reaches the conclusion that the available alternative to the present governments is nationalist, anti-Semitic, clerical, counter-revolutionary oppression. Does anyone believe this would be a step toward "Western democracy"?

Among the peoples of Eastern Europe the announcement of the Marshall plan raised the hope that American policy had changed. That is why they must have been sorely distressed when Molotov walked out of the Paris session. They had had their misgivings, of course. They remembered the Truman Doctrine. They recalled the recent statement by former Under Secretary of State Acheson, which was much publicized in Eastern Europe at the time, to the effect that "free peoples who are seeking to preserve their independence and democratic institutions against totalitarian pressures, either external or internal, will receive top priority for American reconstruction aid." They were familiar with the conditions that Congress placed on the post-UNRRA relief programs.

Nevertheless, the economic problems of the governments of Eastern Europe made the Marshall plan extremely tempting. These governments hoped that the simple fact of economic necessity would cut across ideological lines. They envisioned an end to the present slow, dreary tempo of recovery and the possibility of raising living standards much earlier than they had planned.

Only a few days before Molotov met with Bevin and Bidault, Polish officials in London told me they believed their government would take part regardless of what Russia did. But unfortunately Russia wasn't having any.

The Marshall plan will revitalize the shaky economic structure of Western Europe, whatever obstacles the Communist parties of France and Italy may devise. Recovery in Eastern Europe will also go on—in its own way. The economic interdependence and cooperation within the area which I discussed in my last article is a serious effort, and its development, which Russia may be inclined to encourage and aid, has tremendous possibilities. Moreover, the recovery of Western Europe will inevitably help the recovery of Eastern Europe. Trade relations between the two areas are an economic necessity to which any tendency toward trade restrictions imposed for ideological reasons is bound to give way.

Washington has as yet given no hint as to whether or not the countries of Eastern Europe can get any aid outside the Marshall plan. It would be a mistake to assume that channels of direct influence created by industrial and trade relations are completely closed to the United States.

Tribal Town

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Metlakatla, Alaska, July 1

WHERE salt water washes the edge of the great green mountains, canneries convert the life of sea and river into food which is sold across the face of a hungry world. Practically all these canneries are owned outside Alaska, by people who have never seen them. The owners live in Seattle and Miami and Santa Barbara; they are the stockholders of the Atlantic and Pacific, the New England Fish Company, and Libby, McNeill, and Libby.

But there is a cannery at Metlakatla which is owned by the 750 residents of Metlakatla. And because the cannery is owned by the people, so are the light plant and the water works and even the little movie theater, though elsewhere in Alaska the picture houses belong to the chains. No one in Metlakatla pays an electric bill. You use all the current you need for your light fixtures and appliances as your share of the plant's output. You get your water in the same way. During the winter when the Chinooks and Cohos are not running, the fishermen of Metlakatla are paid from the cannery fund to repair the Town Hall, build roads, and drive new piles for the long timbered docks. Since the sawmill at Metlakatla is also owned by the people of the village, there is no shortage of lumber, and the price is not too high.

All of Metlakatla's inhabitants are Tsimpshean Indians. No white man stays in Metlakatla overnight without permission of the council. Around North Country campfires many tales are told—of the cheechakoes who sought gold, of the fur poachers, and of the scarlet-coated police at Aklavik and Arctic Red River. But no story is more astonishing than that of the Tsimpshean tribe, which was saved from extermination by filth and disease and exploitation because it was taken in hand by a zealous commercial traveler who crossed the sea from England nearly half a century ago.

William Duncan, youthful salesman for George Cousins and Son, dealers in hides and leather, was shocked by the conditions he found among the Tsimpsheans. White traders were inducing them to part with valuable pelts and fish for a few worthless trinkets. Naked Indian girls were delivered to the factors at the trading posts. All trade was floated on liquor. Duncan decided that the Tsimpsheans needed a missionary. Although not an ordained minister, he would be that missionary.

It took him a year to learn enough of the Tsimpshean tongue to preach a halting sermon. He warned the Indians that they were being debauched and exploited at the British Columbia tidewater outpost of Fort Simpson. A chief tried to kill him, but he was saved by a faithful retainer. He built his own store at Metlakatla, which was then in British Columbia. The Hudson's Bay Company at Fort Simpson determined to drive him to the wall by underselling him. He could get no cargo off the Bay steamers; so he bought his own steamer on credit and navigated it to Victoria without a chart.

The Tsimpsheans quit cannibalism and the drinking and debauchery which were killing them off. But Bishop William Ridley of the Church of England did not approve of the success of the unordained minister in Metlakatla. Jealousy may have influenced him when he questioned the right of the Tsimpsheans to the ground on which their village stood. The Canadian government, counting votes, backed up the Bishop. Duncan traveled overland to Washington and managed to see President Grover Cleveland. If the Tsimpsheans were not wanted in Canada, would the United States welcome them?

On August 8, 1887, Duncan went ashore on the timbered ramparts of Annette Island, off the Alaskan coast, followed by the Tsimpsheans. The American flag went up on a newly cut hemlock pole. Duncan organized a brass band and taught the Indians to play the martial airs of their new country. He himself helped to build the sawmill and the cannery. Never would white men put a cash register in the new Metlakatla if he had his way. Duncan was now a hero. An American writer produced a laudatory biography. But when Duncan discovered that in one sentence the author referred to the Tsimpsheans as "savages," he reacted ferociously and bought up all the unsold copies. Under his architectural direction the "savages" built the largest church in Alaska, modeled after what he remembered of Westminster Abbey. In 1918 a gray and bearded Duncan, eighty-six years old, was buried on a green hillside beside the church.

Today the churches of Metlakatla can seat more people than those of any other Alaskan community. The Episcopalian and the Presbyterian church work together in harmony, although Duncan, a benevolent autocrat, at first opposed the coming of the second denomination. The new Metlakatla has more than seven times the population of the old, which is now deserted and overgrown, a memorial to the timidity of a government which ruled in Ottawa long ago.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, an Oregon journalist who served in Alaska during the war, has returned there this summer and will send The Nation a number of articles.

In the Metlakatla village fund, accumulated out of profits from the cannery, more than $800,000 is earmarked for local improvements. A new power plant will be built in the granite mountains above the town. Metlakatla will sell surplus current to Pan-American Airways and the Civil Aeronautics Board, which operate the huge airfield on the other side of the island. By the word of Grover Cleveland himself all of Annette Island belongs to the Tsimpshans, but during the war, when the invader crouched in the Aleutians not far away, the tribe allowed the air forces of both the United States and Canada to use the coastal lowlands for an airport. Indeed, lumber from the Tsimpshane sawmill went into the barracks, hangars, and control towers. In both churches at Metlakatla hang placards bearing the names of the men who answered America's call to arms.

Metlakatla's cannery and freezing plant are valued at a half a million dollars. Officials of the Food and Drug Administration say it is one of the cleanest establishments on the North Pacific coast. Its salmon and halibut are never remanded for impurities. A fishing-boat tender, the Annette, is worth another $100,000. The utilities of the town are valued at $750,000. Residents of Metlakatla pay 40 cents to go to the movies, while fourteen miles across Tongass Narrows in Ketchikan people pay 75 cents to see the same shows. Indian children often trudge up the hill to put wild flowers on the grave of the Englishman who long ago said to their ancestors, "We are not Indians or whites. We are simply Christians."

Race Bias in Housing

I. THE GREAT HYPOCRISY

BY CHARLES ABRAMS

THE housing shortage poses one of the most crucial questions on the racial issue since emancipation.

With twelve million houses ripe for the wrecking crew and an additional seven million needed for new families, national housing requirements for the next ten years will equal about half the existing number of dwellings. This pent-up demand can be held down for a time but sooner or later must be met. Eventually, thousands of new projects and subdivisions will spring up from coast to coast. In the process the racial patterns of our neighborhoods will inevitably be redrawn.

On the eve of this largest building program in our history we face the choice of recasting our communities in a democratic mold or isolating minority groups in segregated areas and thereby losing the opportunity to level out social differences. The decision will depend on whether the pressures to perpetuate segregation have already become too strong to be resisted.

SEGREGATION A FIXED PATTERN

Four score years after Gettysburg the proposition that all men are created equal is again an issue. Segregation has won social sanction, political respectability, and judicial benediction. The Negro may once have won equality in law but never in fact. Today he is well on the way to losing it in law—worse still, the way has been paved for the segregation of other minorities as well. This setback may be ascribed to developments after the Civil War when the Supreme Court approved the doctrine that facilities for the Negro could be separate if they were equal. It was a mischievous conception from the start. It substituted equivalence for equality, for men who must be separate will no longer be equal. Separation accentuated differences and prevented the development of a better understanding between the races through educational processes.

The segregation of Negroes in schools and transportation was bad enough, but their segregation in housing had even more vicious implications. The relegation of children to separate neighborhood schools and playgrounds overemphasized differences in race and color; the establishment of Negro ghettos converted the distinctions into priorities. Segregation in housing received great momentum from the northern migration of Negroes after World War I, when sections in which Negroes had lived side by side with whites were transformed into almost wholly Negro districts. Landlords responsive to tenants' attitudes became reluctant to rent to the racial minority; landowners were unwilling to sell them land for houses; mortgage lenders rated property occupied by them as risky. The private restrictive covenant under which owners agreed to bar Negroes from occupying homes in white sections fixed the segregation pattern in thousands of areas. Japanese, Chinese, Mexicans, Jews, and other groups are now often included in the ban.

CHARLES ABRAMS, author of "The Future of Housing," was formerly general counsel to the New York City Housing Authority. The three articles of this series will be reprinted, in substance, in a pamphlet to be issued by the Civil Liberties Union.

The twentieth century thus brought a change in the underlying reason for the ghetto. Segregation of minorities, once more or less voluntary or the result of social or economic disadvantages, is now forcibly imposed for reasons of race or color. Even improvement in economic status gives the proscribed no freedom to move elsewhere. American slums are no longer exclusively the product of a discrepancy between rent and wages; they are also caused by social pressure against the unwanted minorities—in the North as well as in the South. Exclusion practices are common in the flop house and roadside camp as well as in the great hosteleries. Discrimination is an epidemic contagion affecting rich and poor. Even persons free of any racial bias feel compelled to abide by a rule which has now become part of the code of social propriety.

When segregation of one race receives social approval, the practice is soon extended against other races; when it receives judicial blessing, it tends to ripen into a political institution. This is precisely what is happening in America today. Segregation in housing is no longer exclusively a Negro problem, though Negroes are still the most affected race.

It is enforced by tacit understandings and by legalized agreements. It flourishes in states without civil-rights laws and in those with them. It is embodied in "codes of ethics" of respectable realtors and is countenanced even by enlightened public officials. Newspapers jealous of any encroachment upon their freedom to write as they choose carry advertising limiting the freedom of minorities to live where they choose. There is today hardly a private community in the United States where the atmosphere for a rapprochement between the races exists.

DISCRIMINATION IN URBAN REDEVELOPMENTS

Prejudice is a malady for which law is no specific. It afflicts not only the individual but the body politic, where its most virulent aspects may be noted.

When it appeared that the housing problem could not be solved by private enterprise alone, that the homeownership structure must be bolstered, the mortgage system reformed, and slum areas rebuilt, public aid was extended to private building companies. The aid took the form of condemnation by public agencies of property needed for the private projects, tax exemption, and conveyance of public streets. The federal government also helped private mortgage lenders by purchasing or insuring their mortgage loans.

As public intervention in housing increased after 1937, the question of segregation in publicly aided private housing came into clearer focus. The first important post-war test on segregation is presented by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company's Stuyvesant Town, a vast redevelopment undertaking in the heart of New York City, which will house about a quarter as many people as live in one of our smaller states.* The stock of urban redevelopment corporations like Stuyvesant Town is privately owned, but the projects are usually subsidized by tax exemption and street grants, and the power of eminent domain may be used in their favor.

The basic philosophy of the Metropolitan's chairman of the board, Frederick H. Ecker, is, in his own words, "Negroes and whites don't mix . . . perhaps they will in a hundred years." On the eve of renting Metropolitan has again reaffirmed its intention to exclude Negroes from its housing projects.

The Stuyvesant Town formula, carried to its logical conclusion, would establish subsidized discrimination as the future policy for our housing undertakings. It would authorize the use of public moneys and public powers to establish ghetto patterns in our cities. Worse still, with their establishment, freedom of passage would be more restrained than under passport regulations, for all the streets in an urban redevelopment area may be owned by the company and the public has no right to walk upon them without permission. Here under the name of slum clearance was a device for the evasion of the troublesome Bill of Rights with its insistence on equality and due process. If the formula for using public powers and moneys for private purposes could be carried over to other enterprises, the way would be cleared for a remarkable innovation in government.

After vigorous protests were registered against Stuyvesant Town, a local law was passed, applicable only to New York City, barring tax exemption for any urban redevelopment company practicing discrimination. Stuyvesant Town, however, since it had already been contracted for, was not affected. The issue is now again being tested in the courts. To check any further attacks upon Stuyvesant Town, Metropolitan has undertaken to build Riverton, a nine-million-dollar project for Negroes in Harlem. This move was intended not only to allay public resentment but also, as disclosed in Metropolitan's papers in the litigation over its discriminatory policy, to forestall any attack on its selective practices in renting Stuyvesant Town apartments. Metropolitan argued that it could now discriminate because it was offering "separate but equal" accommodations in the two projects. For the first time an effort was being made to set up the ghetto pattern for subsidized housing for the middle and upper income groups.

New York's urban redevelopment law has stimulated similar legislation in eleven states. In only one, Pennsylvania, is discrimination barred. Upon Stuyvesant Town, therefore, hangs an issue of crucial consequence to the future of minorities in the United States.

* See The Walls of Stuyvesant Town, by Charles Abrams, in The Nation of March 24, 1945.

NO EQUALITY EVEN IN FEDERAL HOUSING

Racial equality should have been incontestable in the policy of the federally owned housing projects. However much federal officials may be tempted by expedience to ignore this broad ideal, it is more than idle folklore. The principle of equal rights for all citizens was laid down by the Constitution and has been reaffirmed by the United Nations Charter. For eighty years a federal statute has declared that all citizens "shall have the same right, in every state and territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property." The government charged with enforcing this statute should at least observe it. Moreover, if the principle of equality is permitted to degenerate at the very seat of government, the whole structure of rights based on it will crumble, bringing down with it public respect for law.

Such practices, therefore, as those of the Public Works Administration, which followed the old segregated patterns in housing, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which respects local prejudices in the sale of repossessed houses, are inexcusable. Some of the concessions to local racial patterns made by the war-housing projects were no more pardonable. A statutory directive barring discrimination or segregation in federally owned or aided projects is necessary to uphold the principle of equality where it is most essential—in the federal government itself.

It will be argued that there will be no federal housing projects if the government abides by the rule of no discrimination. The experience of local housing authorities shows that this need not be so. But even if it were, we should only be paying a high price for a high principle. In the resolution of great issues the advantage of gaining one objective must often be measured against the cost of losing another. If the federal government uses its funds and powers to support segregation or discrimination in its own projects and the practice receives public approval or even acquiescence, hope of ever restoring the lost equality between races may be irretrievably shattered.

THE FHA AND RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS

The Federal Housing Administration was set up as a nationally owned insurance agency which for a premium paid by the owner would insure to a lending institution the full repayment of mortgage principal. It has become the most important factor in home building. The conditions which professedly justified such an intrusion into the private-mortgage field were the dearth of mortgage lending during the depression, the demand for more and better homes at reasonable prices, and the need for sounder mortgage-lending practices and improved planning. The agency is in every sense public. Its administrator is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Its losses on war housing are met by Congress-sional appropriation. The credit of the United States stands behind its guaranties.

Yet this government agency has indulged in the most flagrantly discriminatory practices. Its official underwriting manual long said, "If a neighborhood is to retain stability, it is necessary that properties shall continue to be occupied by the same social and racial classes." It has told its agents that one of their responsibilities is the "prevention of infiltration." It has warned against "adverse influences," among which it includes "inharmionious racial groups." The "stability" of housing communities, it says, depends on occupancy by "the same social and racial classes to which they are accustomed." It has even offered a model covenant stipulating that "no person of any race other than (race to be inserted) shall use or occupy any building or any lot, except that this covenant shall not prevent occupancy by domestic servants of a different race domiciled with an owner or tenant."

These are no slips of the pen or the irresponsible utterances of a P-I clerk. They have been part and parcel of FHA policy for years.

While discrimination in the South can be superficially defended on the ground of local autonomy, having been legally sanctioned by the local citizenry, the principle of equality still governs federal action. For open encouragement of discrimination responsible officials deserve to be promptly removed. Yet protests which should have made the rafters ring have been tempered and smothered. Thousands of real-estate subdivisions throughout the country are today forever entailed against use by proscribed minorities.

The present FHA Administrator has modified the manual somewhat, but it is clear from the new wording that the discrimination policy is unchanged, and that the agency will still respect restrictive covenants and insure mortgages on property subject to them. The FHA, as one former high official put it, is a "sales tool" for realtors. Its administrators are likely to subordinate the welfare of the people to that of the balance sheet. The FHA must respect the prejudices of the lending institutions which are its exclusive customers for federally guaranteed liens and of the subdividers, by whom exclusion of unwelcome races is taken for granted. Like private enterprise, it must handle a certain volume of business if its actuarial formula is to function, and it will not get that volume unless its practices and its ethics conform to those of the market place.

Revision of the FHA manual is no longer enough. There must be an amendment to the National Housing Act and to the federal civil-rights law barring discrimination by the FHA. A further provision forbidding insurance of mortgages on houses subject to a restrictive covenant would help reestablish an ethical responsibility for government agencies.

The French Crisis

BY MICHAEL CLARK

Paris, July 10

THE crisis in France, as the Western nations assemble for the conference on the Marshall plan, is at once economic, political, and moral. Much of the trouble is the legacy of two ruinous wars. A notion of the country's financial condition can be obtained from the statement that its total national wealth expressed in francs germinals, after reaching a maximum of 285 billion in 1912, sank to between 75 and 80 billion in 1945. The shrinking of its economy, in addition to the amputations and devastations of war, has forced France to nibble away at its capital for the last thirty-five years. Living on one's capital is a workable system only as long as one's reserves are great, and France's reserves are practically exhausted. The last devaluation brought the franc to one-thirty-ninth of its 1913 value; the income from savings, which was 13 per cent of the national income in 1938, has dropped to only 4 per cent in 1947. Gold reserves have dwindled to barely $700,000,000. The trade deficit has reached $75,000,000 a month.

A substantial increase in production combined with intelligent and stringent economic planning might still, perhaps, save France from wild inflation and financial collapse. But the hard work and austerity implicit in such a solution would require a degree of social discipline, governmental stability, and administrative skill that is unfortunately lacking in post-war France. Indeed, the breakdown of authority has induced more and more Frenchmen "to get along as best they can." Individuals as well as group interests, obeying a natural instinct of self-preservation, are developing a kind of autonomy of their own, each trying, independently of the community at large, to carve out a private area in which to survive. That explains the incredible extension of so-called "lateral" or "parallel" operations of all kinds and also, in part, the present epidemic of social conflicts.

This social and economic semi-anarchy is gradually overwhelming the government. Lacking a solid working majority in Parliament and constantly harried on the left, the Ramadier Cabinet has none the less made a brave effort to bungle through. Its economic policy, based on the Blum experiment, was designed to increase the buying power of the franc by lowering prices, to check inflation by holding the line on wages. Unfortunately, a governmental decree is not enough to hold prices down for long; there must concurrently be a real improvement in production. By its decree—which was in the nature of an act of faith—the government invited the population to have confidence in the country's recovery. At the same time it sought to create a climate of social peace, a respite conducive to increased output. Production curves were actually slowly tending upward, and the franc did rally on the international market. But confidence was not fully restored; the centrifugal forces remained to be neutralized; the government's economic controls, particularly in the field of agriculture, proved ineffective. The price index, held stationary for a moment, soon resumed its upward course, wholesale prices going from 842 at the end of December to 946 at the end of May and retail prices from 865 to 886 in the same period (1938 = 100).

On the political front the Ramadier Cabinet fared no better. The Communists, obedient to imperatives of their own, for a while managed by a sort of hocus-pocus to preserve Cabinet solidarity without abating their parliamentary and extra-parliamentary agitation against the government's colonial policy. In the matter of wages and prices, too, their tactics were "dialectical" in the extreme: they contrived to let the pot of social discontent simmer but to prevent its coming to a boil. They tentatively supported the Blum experiment, but proclaiming themselves skeptical of its success, agitated for an upward revision of the basic minimum wage. All this reflected the dilemma in which they found themselves as partners in the coalition Cabinet. The dilemma was that of a revolutionary party too weak to seize power but strong enough to demand several choice ministries. As a revolutionary party the Communists could under no circumstances allow themselves to be outflanked on the left by the renascent Trotskyite and Anarcho-Syndicalist movements. As a governmental party they were forced to refrain from knocking the pins out from under the government by promoting social upheaval or imperial collapse. At the same time their reasons for remaining in the government were multiple and compelling: namely, (1) to neutralize any effort by their colleagues to align France in a Western bloc; (2) to get the hang of public administration in anticipation of the Great Day; (3) to avoid losing face in the eyes of their political clientèle by appearing too weak or too cowardly to take a hand in public affairs; (4) to plant their members in strategic spots; (5) to learn exactly what was going on in all branches of the government.

It is not surprising, then, that the Communists, ever since they were expelled from the Cabinet, have had but a single thought—to get back in again. They repeatedly asserted—and this was a threat—that no government could long survive without the participation of "France's No. 1 party." To make their threat good they did not hesitate to enlist the help of the Communist-controlled General Federation of Labor (C. G. T.). But their best ally was the growing distress of the workers and of other low-bracket wage-earners. Immediately after their expulsion an epidemic of strikes broke out. (Though visibly embarrassed, the Communists were forced to support the wild-cat strike in the Renault plant, which occurred before their expulsion, and the railway strike, both of which were inspired by dissident Marxist elements.) The railway strike upset the apple-cart; the government, powerless to resist, capitulated, and authorized new contracts in all industries. Theoretically wages were not to be raised; the increases were labeled "production bonuses" of from 5 to 7.5 francs an hour, a disguise whose fragility becomes apparent when one realizes that the bonuses are for past rather than for future production increases. The strike wave, however, continues.

MICHAEL CLARK is The Nation's Paris correspondent.

Ramadier and his colleagues are not yet at the end of their troubles; far from it! They have now discovered, a little tardily, that the Treasury is running dry. The Finance Minister, Robert Schuman, has proposed a series of financial measures designed to cover the deficit. The rule-of-thumb nature of these measures, none of which jibe with any comprehensive plan for economic rehabilitation, is such that they can at best bring only temporary relief. They are vexatious and demoralizing without going to the heart of the problem. They bear heavily on the urban population, while the rural population is virtually untaxed. On the one hand, they increase the cost of living—the prices on bread, milk, coal, and rail transportation are raised; on the other, they seem likely to produce a serious economic contraction—new corporations are taxed, "solidarity-tax" payments accelerated. More capital will be diverted from productive to clandestine operations, savings will be discouraged, and inflation will be stimulated. The government appears to ignore the fact that only economic expansion can provide real sources of increased revenue.

This situation could of course be altered if as a result of the Paris meeting France receives the credits, not only to purchase needed food and supplies, but to rebuild its capital equipment. Meanwhile, the split in Europe, widened drastically by the Molotov refusal, has forced a change in the Communists' line. Now they are compelled to oppose the government policy, and any suggestion of their return to the Cabinet is meeting stiffened resistance. Even the left-wing Socialists, in their recent national council, decided against welcoming the Communists back. The Communists' tactics, therefore, will be to take advantage of any dissension among the Western European nations as they move toward a co-operative economic plan and to exploit with greater fervor the desperate conditions faced by the French people. The French government will need all the help it can get from America if it is to ride out the storm.

Justice in the Army?

BY LEONARD M. WALLSTEIN, JR.

THE movement for reform in military justice, stalled for a while, now shows signs of progress. The House of Representatives is taking a hand, and it may be hoped that corrective legislation is near. Protests against the present system, growing in volume during the war, swelled to an insistent chorus in the post-war period. The movement for reform appeared to get off to a good start early last year when the War Department, with considerable fanfare, sanctioned an Advisory Committee on Military Justice nominated by the American Bar Association and composed of experienced civilian lawyers and judges. This committee, under the chairmanship of Dean Arthur T. Vanderbilt of the New York University Law School, made an extensive study of the subject and in December submitted a careful report to the War Department recommending a large measure of reform. The War Department apparently accepted the report with enthusiasm. Actually it was willing to make only a few minor changes and rejected the committee's central proposals. Army "brass" thus gave notice that it wanted to continue the much-criticized court-martial system pretty much as it was before.

The Vanderbilt committee made findings of fact that cut most of the ground from under the system's apologists in and out of the army. It found that commanding officers, through their direct and indirect power over the members of military courts, often influenced the judgments of the courts; that sentences were "frequently excessively severe and sometimes fantastically so"; that defense counsel were often incompetent; and that there was some discrimination in the treatment of officers and enlisted men.

LEONARD M. WALLSTEIN, Jr., a New York lawyer, was attached to the Judge Advocate General's Department during the war.

A mass of evidence supported these findings. There was a case in which a regular-army colonel directed a second lieutenant serving as defense counsel to concede facts which the prosecution could not prove and without which the accused soldier could not have been convicted. There were cases in which soldiers were tried on capital and other serious charges without being given any opportunity to consult a lawyer; in which courts handed down sentences of twenty years' imprisonment or more when a few months or years would have sufficed under any reasonable standard; in which officers received reprimands for offenses for which enlisted men would have been punished by dishonorable discharge and years of imprisonment.

To remedy these defects, the committee made one central recommendation with several important corollaries. The central recommendation was that the function of appointing general courts martial and reviewing their sentences should be separated from the function of command. This was to be effected by transferring the power of appointment and review from the lay commander acting on the advice of a legally trained judge advocate to the judge advocate acting in his own right. Thus the commander would no longer be free to reject the advice of his judge advocate on a legal question—any more than he is free to reject the opinion of a medical officer on whether a soldier should undergo surgery.

As one corollary of this central reform the committee recommended an inflexible requirement that trained lawyers should act as defense counsel and that the law member of each general court martial, who performs the functions of a judge in a civilian criminal court, should also be a trained lawyer. Other recommendations on the same level were that commanders be prohibited from influencing courts and that enlisted men be eligible for appointment as members of courts martial in the discretion of the judge advocates, who were to have the appointing power.

Secretary of War Patterson announced that he approved the "principal recommendations" of the committee. In fact, he rejected the substance and approved only the trimmings. He rejected the central recommendation for separation of command and judicial functions. The power to appoint courts and to review their proceedings, he said, must remain in the unit commanders. He approved the recommendation that commanders be prohibited from influencing the deliberations of courts, but this prohibition would add little to existing rules which have proved meaningless in practice. It would be ineffective as long as commanders retained the judicial power of appointment and review as well as the command power to promote and reassign the courts' members. It would not prevent the indirect control of decisions which has been one of the chief vices of the present system.

The Secretary also rejected the proposal that the defense counsel be a trained lawyer and substituted a provision that the defense counsel must be a lawyer only when the prosecutor is a lawyer. This provision takes no account of the fact that an accused person's right to competent counsel has traditionally been wholly independent of the relative professional training of the prosecutor and that the injustice suffered by soldiers convicted of serious offenses for lack of advice by competent counsel was not in the least mitigated by the prosecutors' lack of training. The Secretary's provision would probably increase the number of cases in which neither prosecutor nor defense counsel is a lawyer and which, consequently, bear no resemblance to judicial proceedings.

The Vanderbilt committee's work was thus largely discarded by the War Department. It deserved a better fate, though the committee displayed a certain lack of realism owing perhaps to the fact that not a single veteran of World War II was a member. An example of this lack of realism was the proposal, concurred in by the War Department, that in the future the law member of a general court martial must be a trained lawyer and must be present throughout the trial—an admirable idea. Congress long ago embodied that requirement in plain English in the Articles of War. The army simply interpreted it out of existence. The army, through the Judge Advocate General's Department, ruled that the law member of a court need never actually sit in the cases which the court decided. In the absence of new methods of supervision, the army would find ways of rendering the proposed new requirement as impotent as the old.

An unrealistic assumption made by the committee and concurred in by the War Department was that an enlarged Judge Advocate General's Department with increased powers of review did not need new leadership and supervision. The committee was content to leave the department in the control of the regular army, though this has caused much of the trouble in the present system. Of course, any increase in the power of the army's legal officers over its judicial system would be an improvement. But it must be remembered that it was the Judge Advocate General's Department, as now constituted, which emasculated the requirement of a trained law member. It was this department which generated much other decadent doctrine—by approving, for example, a soldier's conviction of an offense barred by the statute of limitations on the ground that the defense counsel, through ignorance, had failed to plead the statute as a defense. It was this department which in the case of a soldier convicted and imprisoned on the testimony of an officer refused relief to the soldier when later the officer was driven to suicide by pangs of conscience over his perjury at the trial. The real remedy lies in giving the Judge Advocate's Department new civilian sources of leadership and supervision—not in simply enlarging its capacity to continue in the same old rut.

Fortunately, there is still a chance of improvement. Congress has under consideration a legislative program drafted by the House Committee on the Armed Services. If it examines the available evidence, it is bound to conclude that court-martial reform requires the maximum freedom of the system from command control, together with continuous civilian supervision and scrutiny.

General courts should be appointed and their sentences reviewed by a legal officer functioning independently in each area. All the Judge Advocate General's duties in the supervision of military justice should be transferred to a civilian Assistant Secretary of War, or, under the proposed unification of the services, to a civilian Assistant Secretary of National Defense. This official should be required by statute to be a lawyer of broad experience.

When severe sentences have been imposed—for example, imprisonment for more than ten years—appeals to the Federal Circuit Courts of Appeal should be allowed, whether the trial occurred in the United States or abroad. This would not only prevent injustice in the particular cases appealed but provide a continuing source of fresh, corrective doctrine to counteract some of the more unfortunate rulings of the army boards of review. It would exercise a beneficent influence in all cases, imposing a sense of restraint and discouraging resort to questionable practices. There would be no encouragement of delay, for an accused would begin to serve his sentence, as he does now, as soon as it was approved and ordered executed by the officer who appointed the court.

Finally, whatever other measures are taken, a permanent civilian advisory commission of able lawyers, including some who served in World War II, should be ready to consider and prepare changes in existing practices as they become necessary. Bar associations and lay organizations should be encouraged to become as interested in military courts as they are in other courts and administrative agencies. Military justice should never again be the secret concern of the army.

Letter from Italy

BY MARIO ROSSI

Rome, July 10

THE first anniversary of the proclamation of the Republic of Italy calls for a cheer for the magnificent accomplishment of Italians in the reconstruction of their country.

Count Carlo Sforza recently told the foreign press that Italy is a country where nothing new ever happens—everything has happened before. Invasion and destruction have occurred frequently in Italian history, and now as in the past Italy has found the strength and will-power to rebuild itself.

Two years after liberation Italy has almost wrought a miracle. The people went to work by themselves, practically without government directives or coordination, guided by their common sense and their natural industry. Some ministers, of course, tried to plan for reconstruction: these were mostly the young and enthusiastic ones who came from the resistance and for whom public life is not a profession but a mission. Too many of their colleagues of both the right and the left were more concerned with the interests of their respective parties.

The first job tackled was the communications system, which had completely broken down. Until it was restored, no industrial or commercial revival was possible.

One-fourth of all the bridges and 4,500 kilometers of track had been destroyed, together with 59 per cent of the steam locomotives, 78 per cent of the electric locomotives, and 73 per cent of the freight cars. Two years later 50 per cent of the track and 42 per cent of the bridges had been rebuilt. I have seen coaches and locomotives which Allied experts classed as scrap iron beautifully remade. What Italian engineers and workers have done in this field is truly impressive. Practically every town in Italy today can be reached by train, and strangely enough 50 per cent more persons travel today than before the war. A few months after the liberation a trip from Rome to Milan took thirty-three hours; it is now nearly back to the pre-war six-hour schedule.

Italian agriculture suffered heavily from the war. According to figures released to this correspondent for the first time by the Ministry of Agriculture, the damage amounts to more than $110,000,000,000. Some 600,000 hectares of land have had to be cleared of the debris of heavy fighting; 600,000 cows, 140,000 horses, 1,000,000 sheep and goats, 400,000 pigs, and an equal number of asses were either killed or taken away by the Germans.

I was introduced to the official whose task it has been to record the agricultural losses. "Are you the specialist in war destruction?" I asked him. He looked at me sarcastically and replied, "Not me! You Americans have been the specialists in war destruction!" He told with pride how farmers had refused to sell foodstuffs to the Germans, just as they had refused to betray Allied war prisoners hiding in their homes. When the Germans retreated, they carried off grain and animals and mined the fields. As soon as the battle moved past them, the farmers returned to their fields. "Thousands died clearing away the mines."

Of the many tables I was shown, the following is interesting for its summary of the decline of production during the war and the progress made since. These figures have not been published until now:

AVERAGE PRODUCTION PER HECTARE IN QUINTALS

	1936-40	1941-42	1943-44	1945	1946
Wheat	14.6	13.4	12.6	9.3	13.2
Corn	20.7	17.6	14.5	10.9	15.0
Rice	53.1	50.3	37.8	31.5	38.5
Potatoes . . .	69.8	67.2	52.3	37.3	57.9
Beetroot
(for sugar)	257.5	262.5	238.8	139.7	228.7
Vegetable
gardens . . .	84.1	77.7	76.9	72.0	80.5

The Ministry of Agriculture experts were hopeful for the future but stressed that full recovery was conditioned on American help in obtaining oil, coal, machinery, fertilizers, and insecticides. Italian industry is producing such items but not in sufficient quantities.

The great obstacle to industrial recovery is the lack of coal and raw materials. Italy used to get most of its coal from Poland, Germany, and England. These sources have been almost cut off since the war, and practically all coal has been supplied free of cost by UNRRA. While the rapid conclusion of hostilities in the north and the intervention of the partisans saved the bulk of Italian industrial plants, Italy is in no position to replace the machinery and stocks taken away or destroyed by the Germans. Moreover, the equipment of many factories must be modernized. Immediately after liberation industrial production was reduced to 25 or 30 per cent of capacity. Six months later it was still very low, about 31 per cent of the 1938 figure. After another six months it had risen to 70 per cent. But in January, 1947, it fell to 48 per cent of the pre-war standard because of serious curtailments in electric power, the strike of American coal miners, and, to a degree, unrest among the workers.

Before the war Italy maintained a sufficient dollar reserve through emigrants' remittances, tourists, and the merchant marine. Emigration to America having been at a standstill for so many years, remittances have practically stopped, and the tourist business has not yet started. The merchant marine has been reduced to about one-third its pre-war size. As a result, the commercial balance with America is expected to show a gap of $600,000,000 to $800,000,000 in 1948. This lack of foreign exchange with which to buy machinery and raw materials has greatly hampered reconstruction.

But much has been done against incredible odds. Traveling through the war-torn regions of central Italy, one cannot help marveling at the vitality of the Italian people, at how after twenty years of fascism and a disastrous war they have again landed on their feet.

In the Wind

HERE'S THE WIND'S favorite Statement of the Week, uttered by one of the Wind's favorite champions of the people—Herbert U. Nelson, executive vice-president of the National Association of Real Estate Boards: "Eight million small property-owners of fifteen million tenant units have been waiting for five years to hear one word of fairness and appreciation from the White House for what they have done to build up the country and keep things going."

MEANWHILE, TENANTS across the land were quaking in their boots in appreciation of what Mr. Nelson's outfit had accomplished. But in Sweden there are other terrors for tenants. The Nation's Stockholm correspondent recently obtained an apartment, and he informs the staff that "the lease is a panic. In it we have solemnly promised, among other things, not to feed pigeons, not to cut down the trees, not to invite our friends up to take baths, and not to deny access to chimney sweeps. Also can't draw lewd pictures on the staircase walls or beat rugs on the stairs or hold an auction."

MAN CALLED UP this week to tell the Wind that the June 11 Tokyo-Yokohama edition of Stars and Stripes ran a front-page two-column reproduction of the Chicago Tribune's Hundredth Anniversary Edition's front page. The Wind's informant added that to the best of his knowledge the Tribune has been honored in this fashion only once before—in an Anzio beachhead newspaper—published by the Nazis.

A SOMEWHAT DIFFERENT NEWSPAPER, the Clarksburg, West Virginia, News, has taken to running "Forecasts" on its front page, something like this: "Forecast—World War III unless Hate, Greed, and Poverty are stamped out."

NOW A BIT OF FAST PATTERN from Lew Hahn, president of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, speaking in Los Angeles: "The retailer of today has got to be open-minded, an experimenter. We don't know what price lines the public prefers now. The proper level may be higher or lower."

STILL FASTER PATTERN from Charles E. Murphy, general counsel of the Advertising Federation of America: "While advertising has received its honorable discharge from the war, it has never broken ranks, but today marches as solidly and as resolutely in the cause of peace and prosperity, here and abroad, as it fought and worked during the days of blood, sweat, and tears." Amen, brother.

[We invite our readers to contribute to In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Russia's Vicious Circle

THE Soviet Union's refusal to participate in any integrated planning for European recovery would seem to imply confidence in its ability to restore and expand its own war-shattered economy without substantial outside assistance. It is not, of course, as isolated as it was during most of the inter-war period. Now it is in a position to develop close economic ties with the large group of states in its political orbit. Yet in the short run at any rate, exchanges with its neighbors can hardly compensate Russia for the limitation of trade with the West. With the exception of Czechoslovakia, the nations of the eastern bloc are too backward industrially to supply many of Russia's needs.

Molotov's retreat from Paris means that, more than ever, the Soviets must rely on their own economic resources. Potentially these are enormous, sufficient to provide the Russians with as high a standard of living as that of any people in the world. The vast expanse of the U. S. S. R. with its varied terrain and climate contains almost every essential mineral and can grow most of the world's useful crops. But the gap between potential wealth and realized wealth is a large one, and despite their tremendous progress since the revolution, the Russians, in terms of currently consumable goods, remain desperately poor.

In the long run their poverty can only be fully relieved by the accumulation of capital equipment and acquisition of those skills needed to use it to the best advantage. From the inauguration of the First Five-Year Plan the Soviet government, therefore, has concentrated on the development of basic industries. Steel, mining, railroads, tractor factories, and so forth have enjoyed a high priority compared with housing and factories producing textiles, shoes, and pots and pans. Consumer purchasing power has been held to a minimum so that as large a proportion of available materials and man-power as possible could be used for new investment.

The Fourth Five-Year Plan, promulgated in early 1946, is carrying on the same policy. It looks to a rapid recovery of ground lost during the war and a renewal of the onward march of industrialization that the Nazi invasion interrupted. True, it also promises a large increase in the production of food and consumer goods, but even if the plan is completely fulfilled, living standards will remain extremely low. For instance, boot and shoe output is scheduled to reach 240,000,000 pairs in 1950, or only a little more than one pair per person. In the United States, where people use their feet much less than in Russia, output is about three pairs per person. Plans for housing offer even less hope for consumers. They call for a five-year total of 100,000,000 square meters of dwelling space, which is merely the equivalent of just over five square yards apiece for each of the 20,000,000 persons rendered homeless in the war. They hold out no hope of progress in relieving the overcrowding that has been acute in Russia for the last thirty years or in meeting the needs of a constantly expanding population.

Facts like these raise the question whether the policy of rapid industrialization at the expense of living standards has not been carried too far, has not reached the stage of diminishing returns. In a newly published report of the Foreign Policy Association dealing with various aspects of Russia's problem of underproduction Vera Micheles Dean points to "the potential danger that persistent disparity between the growing needs of the population and the quantity of available goods may lead to demoralization, resulting by a vicious circle in still lower productivity."

The extent to which production schedules are now being met cannot be gathered from the notoriously deficient Soviet statistics. According to the State Planning Commission, in the first year of the fourth plan industry "basically completed the post-war reconstruction of industrial production." The commission's report stated, however, that civilian production in 1946 increased by 20 per cent over 1945, which seems a very small gain considering that during most of 1945 industry was almost wholly concentrated on military needs and huge numbers of workers were in the armed forces. It is also noteworthy that official pronouncements and press articles both suggest that news from the economic front is unsatisfactory. There are few claims of industrial victories and many tirades against slackness, inefficiency, mismanagement, and corruption. "There are still no few people," fulminated the magazine Bolshevik in a recent issue, "who place their individual interests above public interests and endeavor to organize their lives at the expense of other members of the socialist society. This is manifested in violation by individuals of the discipline of socialist labor in state enterprises, in collective farms, in government institutions."

The Soviet government has so far shown no inclination to meet such ills by reducing the tension. On the contrary, it is relying on stronger doses from the old bottle, increasing the severity of its measures against idlers and "saboteurs," and demanding from the workers more output for the same return. Thus "norms" for industrial workers are being raised 20 to 25 per cent in an effort to increase productivity. In other words, in order to maintain his wage, which, incidentally, has declined sharply in purchasing power in the past nine months, a worker must speed up very considerably. The piecework system is also being introduced for the first time on collective farms.

Physical pressures of this sort are reinforced by propaganda appeals to overcome by devoted labor the alleged threats of the imperialist powers. It remains to be seen whether the combination of pressure and ballyhoo will restore Russian élan. Much depends on the coming harvest, which Moscow predicts will be good. Last year's crop failure, which led to a steep rise in food prices and caused near famine in some districts, was a severe blow to morale. Should it prove possible this fall to abolish bread rationing and make food cheaper, the current lethargy may be overcome. But as long as a vast majority of Soviet workers are ill fed, as well as ill housed and ill clad, any considerable increase in their productivity seems a lot to expect.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The German Tragedy

REPORT ON THE GERMANS. By W. L. White. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THIS is a report on the "Report on the Germans" by one who was not too enthusiastic about Mr. White's "Report on the Russians," despite some ideological affinities with him absent in most of his critics. This lack of enthusiasm for the previous volume is mentioned merely to give greater force to the praise which must be accorded the present one. It is very good reporting indeed. Its virtue seems to lie in Mr. White's ability to relate very personal accounts of what Germans think and say with an admirable general survey of the total situation.

A good review of Germany during the war is furnished by a long interview with a German newspaperman, married to an American wife, who was known to the author before the war and who brings him up to date on history between 1939 and 1946. One could not find a more illuminating story of the rise and fall of Hitlerism in brief compass. Other interviews reveal the plight of the Jewish remnant in Berlin, the shifting opinions of various anti-Nazis, quasi-Nazis, and non-politicals; their attitude toward American and other occupation troops; the characteristic virtues and weaknesses of American policy; and the problem of the Russians. A concluding chapter dispenses with personal narratives and compares the present peace with that following the First World War, arriving at the conclusion that it contains even less promise for Germany and Europe than the earlier peace.

The value of the personal accounts lies in the fact that with a minimum of generalization we are allowed to see the German tragedy through the different reactions of various types of persons to it. Not only are the personal accounts interesting in themselves, but pieced together they bring out almost every aspect of the bottomless evil, the confusion of good and evil, the confusion which led to evil, and the feckless virtue which were compounded in the Germany tragedy. The report is thus a most valuable antidote to all the illegitimate generalizations with which most people, including most reporters, seek to comprehend complex historical reality.

The general temper of the book is revealed in words with which I would want to agree even if no one else could be found to agree with them, though I dare say there will be others. Mr. White writes: "Fashions in ideological millinery change rapidly. It is curious now to remember that prior to the war European and American liberals felt that Hitler was the result of confused policies toward Germany, and were disposed to pity the German masses who were in his power rather than to blame them. I believed this fervently in 1939 and rather regret that it is now so badly out of fashion, for most of it I still believe."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Arturo Barea

THE FORGING OF A REBEL. By Arturo Barea. Reynal and Hitchcock. $5.

PREVIOUS to the appearance of "The Forging of a Rebel" only one vital and authentic talent, Ramón Sender, remained active in Spanish prose. The aged Baroja, apparently still living, is a spent force. Even before his death in 1936 nothing comparable to the Sonatas and the Esperpentos was to be expected from Valle-Inclán. Azorín had made his peace with the angel of indifference and had been overtaken by that literary pietism which always threatened him. The most powerful intellect of the generation of 1898, Pérez de Ayala, had become silent. The conservative Ricardo de León continued to bore one with his tired rhetoric and post-siesta vacuity. Of the next generation, the men of fantasy and aesthetic posture, Gómez de la Serna still liberates his annual glycerine bubble. Bergamín, Giménez Caballero, Benjamín Jarnés, and Antonio Espina—none of them now appear to possess the merit attributed to them in "the days of the liberated imagination." Sender alone had kept and had concentrated his powers. I have not read Barea's one novel, but the present book, set beside his excellent essay on García Lorca, is sufficient evidence that at last one major talent has been thrown up by the catastrophe that has dispersed and checked so many writers of promise.

It would be too facile to say that neither the liberal criticism of the school of 1898 nor the imaginative athleticism of the '30's was able to survive the great shock of the Spanish civil war, though it is relevant to point out that both Barea and Sender are men of the revolutionary tradition and that neither is by birthright an inhabitant of the literary world. But the profounder truth is that in the turmoil of Spain, the endless and necessary rebellion against corrupt authority, only those who have somehow combined the liberal and the revolutionary spirit have been able to preserve those permanent values upon which a conservative literature is professedly based. It is significant, too, that both Sender and Barea have met the necessity of reevaluation imposed by the Spanish war by returning to a consideration of their own lives. Whatever may be the documentation of Sender's "A Man's Place" and "Chronicle of Dawn," these lovely and precise books are clearly autobiographical novels. In them poetry and realism are at no discord.

Barea's "The Forging of a Rebel" is pure autobiography, also in the great tradition of Spanish realism. To some extent, of course, the realistic method, which is not to say the naturalistic method, is imposed by the very nature of autobiography. But there can be no mistaking the quality of Barea's mind; the realism is integral with the man's imagination and is matched by the special talent. The brilliance, the precision with which the life of popular Madrid is set down in Part I makes it the best account of that city to be written in this century, and it is all done without ostentation and without wearisome device. To find its like one must go back to the great pícaros and realists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. But it is not only the street and the noisy tenement, the baker's shop and the sour atmosphere of the corner church that Barea so startlingly presents. It is the same when he describes the harsh and somber life of Brunete and the villages of the Guadarrama. The outer and the inner phenomena are here; the sunlight that drugs the brain and dulls the eye, the morbid materialism, the suspicion and hatred, the burden of a tradition that has lost all power to enlighten. And the whole procession of imagery is absorbed into a stream of powerful emotion.

Part II is even more successful. *Marruco*s! The name of Morocco, for a Spaniard, itself sums up the bitterness and the frustrations of this century's politics. The Spanish empire gone, the corrupt military hierarchy still imbued with its frivolous and murderous pride, the old political parties splintered into a thousand meaningless groups, the Spanish rulers of the first decade of this century easily fell victim to British high politics and accepted the appointed task of keeping France at a distance from Gibraltar. The result was tragedy. The disastrous defeats of the Riff war brought the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera, and the last stages of that war brought Franco into eminence and gave that ambitious and skeptical sadist authority over the Foreign Legion and the Moorish contingents. In what sense Morocco led to the civil war and gave victory to the militarists is vividly described by Barea, not by means of historical analysis but by a superb account of life in an infected army. A score of scenes remain in one's memory as if they had been personal experiences. The brothel at Tetuan, the woman Luisa, the catching of the big fish in the Straits (a quite unconscious tour de force), the uprooting of a fig tree, and the tapping and waste of a water source.

When a man who took part in the Spanish civil war glances over a bibliography of that conflict he is astonished to find how few are the pages that convey anything of the nature of that experience. The whole of Sender's "Counter-Attack," a few chapters of Malraux, a single chapter of Hemingway, and here and there a paragraph of certain French writers are about all. Over-sharp crystallization, absurd simplification due

THE JADED

They have come from far; they have come from very far,
And they are wearier than they are wise.
Their manliness is spent; their cheek-bones are Hollow below their old beleaguered eyes
Which seek, once more, the cities of the plain
With dubious nostalgia, and in vain.

Listening, they have seen confusion darken,
And, watching, they have heard disaster sound;
They do not, any longer, care to hearken
To oracles and prophets, having found
Belief a stimulus which made them strong
For a few moments, never very long.

And now their will is tenuous as smoke
Or veils of mist from vales of mist arising;
Their courage, thin as any beggar's cloak,
Shrinks at advice, and shudders at advising;
Sun is no less endurable than rain;
Both laurels and forget-me-nots are vain.

Gray mountains rise before them, whence they hear
No water, only wind across the rock,
And time, their one attraction, draws them near
To space where time is measured by no clock,
To boundaries beyond the power of song
To stir them, by its brevity, for long.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Fundamentals of Naval Warfare

By LEE J. LEVERT

An outline of the principles and methods of naval warfare, comprehensive and excellently organized, this book will interest the general public as well as naval personnel. The section headings below indicate the scope of the subject matter. Illustrated with diagrams and sketches by William T. Brady.

$5.00 at all bookstores

MACMILLAN

Contents

- | | |
|---------------------------|-------------------------------|
| 1. Introductory | 7. Engineering |
| 2. History | 8. Communications and Control |
| 3. Weapons | 9. Staff |
| 4. Ships | 10. Staff Problems |
| 5. Shore Installations | 11. The Future |
| 6. Types of Naval Warfare | |

to this or that imagined necessity of propaganda too often render the account worthless. Or the writer has not understood Spanish values and thus casts his protagonists after alien images of the hero and the villain. The great proportion of Spaniards are capable of prompt and bold action, but in a sense Ramón Sender, an Aragonese peasant, is too able and confident a man to be able to describe the shock of the war's outbreak upon the less well-equipped humanist.

Barea, a brave man and surely one of the most honest of chroniclers, has given in his final section a wholly credible account of the first year of the war. In a revolution, dramatic as its incidents may be, there is a greater sense of eventfulness than of events. One sees the untested ideas, the worn stock in trade of theory, the whims and fantasies, the personal myths and equivocations of dissident men, subjected to the abrasion of necessity. What was a mood becomes a party, and a mode of feeling becomes a cause. Party and cause almost insensibly become estranged from each other, and the whole dynamism of the revolution drifts into a new course, virtually without the participant's being aware of it. And almost invariably the ideal becomes the equivocal, and the intelligent and honest man finds himself to some degree at odds with the tenor of the enormous process. It is this I find in Barea's account of the Spanish war.

A non-party Socialist brought to effectiveness by the Communist Party, he was eventually distrusted by the Communists and was compelled to leave Spain during the war, largely because of their hostility. Yet he has resisted all temptations to make his account polemical, and while there is penetrating criticism of the Communists there is no bitterness at all. As he portrays it, the party remains the focal point of resistance to Franco.

In part, insight into his own condition has prevented Barea from losing himself in rancor. Sick of a terrible neurosis and made aware of it by the instantaneous and automatic responses of his body to the stimuli of fear, responses which even preceded awareness of the stimuli, he consciously refused to rationalize. His loyalties were to the revolution and to Spain. Their purity and their force, his own honesty and ability, have produced a superb account of an event which still retains, I dare to say, far greater significance for the understanding of human values than the Second World War itself or anything that has happened since. Barea remains a whole man; his interest in himself is neither clinical nor egotistical; and he has used his great sensitivity to the most dignified of purposes.

RALPH BATES

Smaller Than Life

THERE WAS ONCE A SLAVE. The Heroic Story of Frederick Douglass.

By Shirley Graham. Julian Messner. $3.

IN HER biography of Frederick Douglass, Shirley Graham has gathered together an absolutely staggering number of details and has approached her subject with an all but breathless reverence and a high purpose—that of revealing the extent of the heroism of this former slave and his significance during the most crucial period of our history. Since she has won the Julian Messner Award for having written the best book combating intolerance in America, the larger implications of her subject are inescapable—the position of the Negro in American society today. Yet I cannot see that Miss Graham has made any contribution to interracial understanding, for she is so obviously determined to Uplift the Race that she makes Douglass a quite unbelievable hero and has robbed him of dignity and humanity alike. As serious biography this performance is very nearly ludicrous; and in the battle against intolerance it seems to me that the book's effect will be negligible.

Part of the trouble lies in the serious limitations of fictionalized biography. At best it usually manages to be simply a readable account of a historical figure: most often the validity of the characterization suffers in the degree that it is fictional. It is just not possible for a contemporary biographer to know what So-and-So said to his wife at the breakfast table in 1866, or how he felt walking through the woods, or his physiological reactions to heartbreak. The attempt, presumably made in order to bring the reader closer to the subject, actually operates to alienate the reader and to inject an element of unreality.

And the false intimacy vulgarizes the subject.

Miss Graham begins her story when Douglass is sixteen and, wild-eyed with adoration, follows him till he drops, some three hundred pages later. From the first sentence to the last his eyes are on a star; the people Sharing his Vision are sometimes allowed to be confused or misguided but are intrinsically noble, and all, with the same monotonous flash of insight, are struck with awe when they see him. The people who are against him are all bilious or drunken or devilishly clever, and it is Miss Graham's peculiar ability to create the impression, no matter what the facts, that these people too tremble at the mere mention of the name of Frederick Douglass. Miss Graham drags in the Forces of History, as many as she can lay her hands on, and as often as the mood strikes her dumps them on the reader and dashes on to the next Douglass triumph. In her account even history bends before the force of this man.

In Miss Graham's history book voices "crack like whips," people fight "like tigers," are "struck all of a heap"; hero and saint alike "shake with rage" or bite "trembling lips," in spite of which time "deals kindly" with them; and every one of them, even Lincoln, realizes that "few men are like this Douglass!" (Italics Miss Graham's). Douglass comes to painful, spasmodic life only when she allows him to speak for himself—as she, mercifully, often does, but not often enough.

There is a tradition among emancipated whites and progressive Negroes to the effect that no unpleasant truth concerning Negroes is ever to be told, a tradition as crippling and insidious as that other tradition that Negroes are never to be characterized as anything more than amoral, laughing clowns. Frederick Douglass was first of all a man—honest within the limitations of his character and his time, quite frequently misguided, sometimes pompous, gifted but not always a hero, and no saint at all. Miss Graham, in her frenzied efforts to make him (a) a Symbol of Freedom, and (b) an example of What the Negro Race Can Produce, has reduced a significant, passionate human being to the obscene level of a Hollywood caricature. Relations between Negroes and whites, like any other province of human experience, demand honesty and insight; they must be based on the assumption that there is one race and that we are all part of it. JAMES BALDWIN

Haunted by Felicity

THE IRON PASTORAL. By John Frederick Nims. William Sloane Associates. $2.50.

THE WOUND AND THE WEATHER. By Howard Moss. Reynal and Hitchcock, $.2.

CHILD of green lovebird and the raven death" is the last line of a poem by John Frederick Nims called "Dollar Bill" and concerned entirely with descriptions of that object. I think the emblematic raven could have cropped up like this only in the land of Edgar Allan Poe. Not that there is the least tentativeness or obliqueness about Mr. Nims's Americanism. His fast, flip, high-handed metaphors crowd together much as do subway riders in the rush hour, and his éclat—colloquial as hell—is no less than expected in a literary era licensed by Mr. Eliot's early steely quatrains as much as by the Bill of Rights. It is apparent that Mr. Nims never feels so poetic as when wffelding the whiplash of campus irony or staring down at life—albeit cutely—from the steepness of Mr. Auden's "F-6."

One thing bristles from Mr. Nims's pages as well as from those of Howard Moss, and this is their anxiety—thus deprived, as a term, of its Freudian prestige—to formulate their porousness toward the social environment. Mr. Nims tends to overwhelm us with sardonic accolades to life as a football game, or to poolroom, movie, penny arcade, waitress, magazine stand, while Mr. Moss, a daintier linguist and more metaphysically inclined, tends to contemplate our lakes and shores, a zoo or a symbolized skull, with the intellectual brio of Wallace Stevens. Yet impressive is the fact that in certain poems (vide "Theater Cliff" and "The Robbery") Mr. Moss is almost indistinguishable in spirit and idiom from Mr. Nims; on this mutual ground, indeed, they stand in full chorus with Karl Shapiro. Although assuredly Mr. Nims is a more formidable leg man among poetic local events than Shapiro, Shapiro has it over the present poets because of superior lucidity and a grand manner—however critically vulnerable—traceable somehow to what both Eliot and Auden would be constrained to term "faith." Let us not quibble. What Nims and Moss have in place of faith is not other than awareness; pert or reverent, pondered or facile, but the essence of what every young poet should know in these atomic days.

The ironic slant of the attitudes of Nims and Moss formally rejects any moral positivism, except perhaps as to love, but here, even though Nims exhibits the stern will of a Krafft-Ebing when tackling the softer sentiment, they both have the gingerly touch of the earlier Auden when it comes to an apostolism of the faith. Mr. Moss affirms, for example, "Death is your lover." And yet he can turn around and call "love," à la Nims, "the number on the family phone." The fetishism of things seems to have reached a point for Mr. Nims where the crude statistical experience quite supersedes the criticism, the moral reaction, though the latter is present metaphorically fortissimo.

A sure clue to the compromised situation of both poets is the bathos into which they habitually fall. This for instance is quite in Mr. Nims's stride:

Our fat and mooncalf nation tubs forever

God in the clotted fishbowls of the eye.

And Mr. Moss in an otherwise fairly decorous poem can say without mincing metaphors: "Medusa wore her most becoming gown." This may be Moss at his worst rather than his best, but it is a measure of his pervasive slipperiness; again, he will finish off poems of Stevensque equilibration with a flat lifesaver like this:

Saying, Welcome to the Stranger
And to the heart, Out of danger.

The tremendous mobilization of modern modes in poetry—ripe for quick pupils—bestows a willy-nilly grace on the work of these poets. I cannot account in any other way for my apprehension, while reading, of an attractive warmth in Nims, a gesture of metaphysical elegance in Moss; of a fine impasto of words in Nims, a fragile music in Moss. Some felicity, I would not gainsay, but these poems are much less made of it than haunted by it. PARKER TYLER

Films

JAMES
AGEE

GREAT EXPECTATIONS" does for Dickens about what "Henry V" did for Shakespeare. That is, it indicates a sound method for translating him from print to film. The method is not one of the most exciting that could be imagined, nor in its own terms is it used as excitingly as could be imagined; but the film is almost never less than graceful, tasteful, and intelligent, and some of it is better than that. The first few reels, on Pip's childhood, are especially well done, one strangeness and surprise unfolding from the center of another without flurry or overemphasis, with something of the cool enchantment there has always been in sped-up shots of the blooming of a flower. It looks as if the director, David Lean, and his associates have understood Dickens's novel as a work of literature and as a literary but good moving picture and also with the help of Freud and perhaps to some extent of Marx, and have had the wisdom not only to get guidance and leverage from these kinds of knowledge but also never to urge them on to the screen or the audience. Whether or not they went about it in this way, the picture has a good deal of the tone and the extra resonance of dreams, legends, or fairy tales. I thought it very provocative, for instance, as a symbolized intuitive image of nineteenth-century England, with the century (Pip and Estella) moving as if hypnotized by the vengefulness, gratitude, and deviousness of great ancestral forces: Magwitch as the archetype of the nameless swarm; Miss Favisham as the embittered Virgin Queen; the sinister-benign Jaggers as Law and Government.

SEND FOOD DIRECTLY TO AN ANTI-FASCIST

Write for the name and address of a sick and needy anti-fascist: Spanish, French, Austrian, Jewish, Italian, German, Norwegian, Polish. Full shipping instructions will be sent you, or contribute for CARE food packages and medicine. A new list of Austrian names, veterans of the February revolt, just received.

They need help now.

INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY COMMITTEE

Room 518, 303 Fourth Avenue
New York 10, N. Y.

Nearly all of the casting and playing is so good that it is useless to clog a lot of space trying to list preferences, but it should be said that Anthony Wager, as young Pip, is so extraordinarily fine that it is a great pity he was not used more often before he outgrew childhood roles; and that good as she is, Jean Simmons, as young Estella, seems affected in a wrong way, on a second seeing. I regret with the English reviewer Dillys Powell that more minor characters were not sketched into the background; as she observes, a great deal more of this could have been dared, for the screen can communicate in a second or two what may require pages in print.

I also wish that the Dickens illustrations had been studied still more faithfully and imaginatively—that the whole tone of the film had had a kind of india-ink darkness, psychologically as well as visually: for it seems to me they had hold of a story much more cruel and mysterious than the one that got told. If this had been felt, the picture would not only be darker; the whole smooth, middle-distance narrative style, which so often merely illustrates the story nicely, would have been contorted into a style much more subjective and more visually expressive. I doubt that such a film would have been so popular as this one, and I am sure it could not have been so charming. All I can say for it is that it would have been still more faithful to Dickens—or my idea of him, anyhow—and at the same time less subservient; that it would have been a really original movie, a transfiguration rather than a translation; that it would have run the risks that are always run when primary creative intelligence rather than the best that good taste can do is turned loose on the screen. It is depressing to realize how many people feel that "Great Expectations" is about as good a job as the screen can do; how can people who believe that, think they really know or care much of anything about movies? But that is the prevailing taste, and I will admit that in its relatively mild terms this is a very good and enjoyable piece of work.

I enjoyed "Great Expectations" more than Carol Reed's "Odd Man Out," but I was more interested in Reed's film, and liked it more. Essentially, though not on the whole in effect, it is a much more difficult and ambitious film, aimed in a more useful direction. The hero, a murdering and fatally wounded fugitive revolutionist, is an image of much of the best in contemporary mankind. The picture tells the story of his flight through the night streets of Belfast. This night city is civilization; on that intricate stage a wide variety of people try to help or hinder or capture the fugitive. Many of them are selfless in relation to some idea or passion or conception of duty of their own; not one is capable of the selfless charity it would require to deal with this hounded, doomed soul purely for its own sake. This seems to me a just image and useful diagnosis of the world, and an exceedingly good idea for a film; but quite a bit falls short in the making.

The early reels are exciting and beautiful—purely in movie terms, they are the best—yet they fail all but entirely to communicate the revolutionary edge that is so well got in F. W. Green's novel; in that respect John Ford's "The Informer" was better; and even some of the best purely movie details that Green wrote down are surprisingly omitted from the film. In the later reels the film, like the novel, tries for broader and broader allegory and phantasmagoria, but much as I respect this boldness, I don't think it succeeds. The story seems merely to ramify too much, to go on too long, and at its unluckiest to go arty. Most unfortunately the central character, effectively yet monotonously played by James Mason, is given

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
21st St.
80th St.
80th St.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th St.
REGENT
23rd St.

RKO NOW

"BRIGHT YARN... A DANDY."—N.Y. Times
Hudson O'HARA • John PAYNE
'Miracle on 34th Street'

with EDMUND GWEEN

—and—
'BRASHER DOUBLOON'
George MONTGOMERY • Nancy GOULD
Based on Raymond CHANDLER'S "High Window"

BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
W.H. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PACIFIC
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Canoy Island

"HUMAN AND ABSORBING DRAMA."—N.Y. Sun

Susan HAYWARD • Marsha HUNT
Lee BOWMAN • Eddie ALBERT
'SMASH-UP'

—and—
'THAT'S MY MAN'
Don AMECHE • Catherine McLEOD

QUEENS
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kew-Forest
FLUSHING
Kew-Forest
RICH HILL
STRAND
For Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

STAGE PLAYS

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

—Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Million Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEAT., 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4256
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

MELVYN DOUGLAS & HERMAN LEVINE present

"CALL ME MISTER"

THE NATION'S TOP MUSICAL REVUE

Songs by Harold Rome • Sketches by Arnold Auerbach • Staged by Robert Gordon

New York: NATIONAL Theatre, Air-Conditioned
Chicago: BLACKSTONE Theatre, Air-Conditioned

"BROADWAY'S BIGGEST REVUE HIT!"—Life Magazine

RODGERS & HAMMERSTEIN Present

In association with JOSHUA LOGAN
'HILARITY IN PLINITY.'—Barnes, Her. Trib.
JOHN LOVES MARY
A New Comedy by NORMAN KRASNA
Directed by MR. LOGAN

MUSIC BOX, 45th Street, West of B'way
Air-Conditioned Matinee Wed. and Sat. 2:40

"ALL TRIUMPHANT!"—Barnes, Her. Trib.

ETHEL MERMAN
in the Musical Smash

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Music and Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN
Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON. Directed by Joshua Logan
IMPERIAL Theat., 45th St., West of B'way
Air-Conditioned Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30 Sharp

BETTY HUTTON • JOHN LUND

"THE PERILS OF PAULINE"

IN TECHNICOLOR

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

IN PERSON

THE HOUR OF CHARM

ALL GIRL ORCHESTRA UNDER THE DIRECTION OF

PHIL SPITALNY

Featuring EVELYN and Her Magic Violin

The distinctive voice of JOANNE VIOLA & her 17 drums

55¢

TO 1 P.M.
(Tax. Incl.)
Mon. to Fri.
Inclusive

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

SAY YOU SAW It ADVERTISED
in
The Nation

To Place An Ad
Call
BARclay 7-1066

too little remaining life of his own. He has virtually no will or mind or strength left but almost from the beginning is just a football, deflated so far that even its kicking around by the rest of the cast is rather soggy. So, as an image and allegory, the whole film loses much of its possible force: it is not a tragic poem but a series of passive elegiac tableaux with a certain suggested relationship, generally inferior, to the Stations of the Cross. The tone of pity for man is much too close to self-pity.

Yet detail by detail most of "Odd Man Out" is made with great skill and imaginativeness, and with a depth of ardor that is very rare in contemporary films. In fact, the kind of creative energy is at large here that is lacking in "Great Expectations"; and even the mistakes made by that kind of energy are more moving and more admirable than the gentler kinds of success. It does strike me, though, that "Odd Man Out" is at its weakest with its most important ideas, and next weakest with its most important characters, and is at its best with the inanimate world and with people as denizens of that world, not as self-responsible salients. If the world should end tomorrow, as this film rather substantially suggests that it must, and may as well, this film would furnish one of the more appropriate epitaphs: a sad, magnificent summing up of a night city. Movies have always been particularly good at appreciating cities at night: but of a night city this is the best image I have seen.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

LISTENING to a London Decca record of Berlioz's "Carnaval roman" Overture I was aware, first, of how much more beautiful than I had remembered the long opening Andante sostenuto section was; then I began to realize that this heightened effect was the result of the way the music was being performed; listening more attentively now to the performance I noted a sustained impetus and unflinching control in the marshaling and shaping of the sound into a continuous, clear-textured, and beautifully contoured progression. It was very much like what one hears in Toscanini's performances, and like what I recalled having heard from one other conductor once before—in the imported C. E. T. R. A. performance of Mozart's Requiem. And at the end of the first side I looked at the label and found that the Berlioz was in fact being performed by the same man as the Mozart: Victor de Sabata, conducting the London Philharmonic.

The Allegro section of the overture was played as superbly as the Andante. And the reproduction of the performance was the first in my experience to justify the glowing descriptions in the London Decca literature and in my colleagues' reviews: for the first time there was clear, lustrous brilliance in loud passages, in addition to the marvelously distinct definition in space in quieter passages. The record (K1552; $2), then, offers much to feel excited and happy about: the experience of the music and performance, and the additional evidence that there is now a musician from whom we may hope to hear something like what we have heard from Toscanini.

Other London Decca releases: A skillfully made and impressive work by Benjamin Britten, his Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings, beautifully sung by Peter Pears with Dennis Brain and the Boyd Neel orchestra under the composer's direction, and excellently recorded (Set ED-7; $7). Dukas's "L'Apprenti sorcier," well performed by the National Symphony under Jorda, with the recorded sound of loud passages exhibiting the usual defects: indistinct, veiled violins, the confusion of reverberation, the haze of high-frequency distortion (Set ED-16; $5). Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, well-performed by Ida Haendel with the National under Sargent, its recorded sound agreeable on a limited-range machine, but the solo violin wiry and loud passages of the orchestra poor on wide-range machines (Set ED-23; $9). Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, not well played by Fistoulari with the National, the recorded sound of loud passages especially bad (Set ED-14; $7). And Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," atrociously done by Coates with the National (Set ED-6; $7).

Going to the opening of Ballet Theater's spring season at New York's City Center with high expectations, after last fall's performances, I was shocked by a performance of "Les Sylphides" in which the soloists jabbed and flung themselves in all directions with exhibitionistic violence, distorting the piece and destroying its poetic quality. And this was only the first of the performances which provided the clearest, most forceful illustration of the tendencies Edwin Denby warned against repeatedly in his Herald Tribune reviews.

As far back as 1943 he spoke of Ballet Theater's stress of obvious dramatic expression in dancing, and of how the need of getting specific points across to the audience encouraged the dancer to focus attention on himself and got him to think this was the only kind of dancing that was important; whereas, said Denby, there were old and new ballets with poetic rather than dramatic intention, which was realized by delicate finish in the execution of movements with dance meaning rather than dramatic meaning. Ballet Theater's dancers had, then, developed a fine verve in dancing, but not "the sensitive articulation of movement which people call elegance"; they "got across to the audience boldly," but overdid their parts and tried "to top each other till the effect has been silly and vulgar." He therefore welcomed their new interest in the classics which he thought the best corrective for those faults. "For though the classics need dance verve and stage presence to bring them to life, they also need dance elegance and personal reticence: a classic dancer doesn't spill his personal glamor all over the stage as a dancer in a character part is sometimes tempted to do." But what Ballet Theater's dancers did recently was to carry the faults of their character dancing into their classic dancing.

In this the company—with the exception of Youskevitch, and of Kaye, whose classic dancing was relaxed and continent in its brilliance—followed the lead of Alonso, illustrating Denby's observation that in classic ballet the ballerina sets the style for the company. Alonso's own tendency is toward brilliance in allegro, with "high extensions . . . quick balance . . . bold, clear speed"; in competition with Markova she acquired a considerable measure of quiet and reticence; with Markova gone from the company Alonso feels free—and privileged by her new status as ballerina of the company—to do again what comes naturally.

In the two performances of Balanchine's "Apollo" Youskevitch knew his part even less well than last fall—from which one got an idea of how many performances of "Apollo" he had danced in since then, and how "Apollo" was regarded by the artistic directors of the company, and what sort of artistic brains and conscience were to receive the high-powered support of the newly formed Ballet Theater Foundation.

Letters to the Editors

Advice for Bigotees

Dear Sirs: Those who plan to attend the Berkshire Music Festival may be interested to know that a Massachusetts statute makes it unlawful to discriminate against anyone on account of race or color, and in addition to imposing a stiff criminal penalty grants to the aggrieved person a right to collect civil damages (Gen. Laws, Chap. 272, Sec. 98).

EDWARD SPIEGEL

Boston July 1

No Telling Where This Will End

Dear Sirs: First let me thank you for printing my letter some weeks ago [offering to exchange used copies of the New Statesman and Nation for used copies of The Nation—Editor]. As a consequence, I had so many replies that I had to get a reciprocal letter inserted in the New Statesman. Now I have had so many replies from Britons that all my American addresses are used up, and there are still more than 650 addresses of English people wishing to exchange their New Statesman for The Nation or the New Republic. Can you help me to supply these 650 American addresses? If so, I shall be very grateful and so will the recipients. My address is still 17 Forest Court, Snaresbrook, E. 11.

P. DENIS GOODALL

Snaresbrook, England, July 5

It's Up to You

Dear Sirs: I appreciate your warm and friendly response to my last-ditch effort to block the Taft-Hartley Labor Act. It was indeed encouraging to return from the Senate floor to my office at 4 a.m. and find it flooded with over 3,500 telegrams from well-wishers who had worked through the night to arouse their neighbors to the dangers of this bill while I was addressing the Senate. I wish time permitted me to write a personal message to each of you.

The chief purpose of the Taft-Hartley bill, in the last analysis, is the lowering of wages. Even Senator Taft, in an extremely frank statement, admitted that the effect of the President's veto of the Case bill last year was to prevent a wage decrease. Any bill that limits labor's right to organize ultimately cuts labor's wages. The National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce are not seeking this type of legislation for the fun of it—they seek it because it means tremendous pay-roll savings for their members.

Most of my constituents are farmers. The worker is the farmer's best customer. When factory wages are high the worker buys more food; when they are low he buys less. Agriculture's prosperity depends upon labor's.

I think that the great mistake of the fight against this repressive law was that labor's magnificent response was badly timed. The bill could have been fought much more effectively in November, 1946, than in June, 1947. After last year's Case bill, labor had every reason to know what it could expect from a Republican Congress. The Democratic Party, in most states, had forthright and progressive candidates in the field. Throughout the country the Democratic primaries had resulted in a long string of victories for progressive, pro-labor candidates who were committed by word and by deed to the continuation of the New Deal. I know that this was particularly true of my own Northwest section.

In short, the issues were clearly drawn. There was every reason for zealous support of progressive Democratic candidates by those who are interested in protecting labor, the farmer, and the small business man.

Yet too many people allowed themselves to be confused by the constant emphasis on petty war-time shortages and annoyances in the always pro-Republican press. Too many sulked and quibbled about their own petty differences. Too many allowed themselves to forget the real issues, which had been classically stated and restated over the years by President Roosevelt. Too many were deceived by hollow Republican promises that if the giant corporations were given their own way, prices would come down, goods would flow in abundance, and the threat of unemployment would disappear.

Indeed, ever since the death of President Roosevelt, too many Americans, including some union men, are like the baseball fans whose interest in the game dropped off after the retirement of Babe Ruth. But politics is much more serious. Sure, the Champ is dead, but the game goes on, and it vitally affects you and your family every day. You can't afford to lose interest. The Democratic Party will be as progressive as you make it, but it is up to every union man, every farmer, and every small business man to do a real job. Each must get into politics, ring doorbells, nominate good men at the primaries, get out the registration and the vote.

I warn you of one thing: the Taft-Hartley Act will not stay on the books very long without change. The next Congress will amend it either for better or for worse. Which way the tide turns depends largely upon your activity and your vote at registration, primary, and election time.

GLEN H. TAYLOR

Washington, July 3

N. F. L. U. Deserves Credit

Dear Sirs: In his article King Cotton Strikes Again (The Nation, June 21), Mr. Mezerik has committed the sin of omission by not even mentioning the work of the National Farm Labor Union (A. F. of L.). Known as the Southern Tenant Farmers Union from 1933 to 1946, the N. F. L. U. is almost solely responsible for awakening liberal America to the plight of the Southern sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and day laborers.

From 1939 to 1942 the Food and Tobacco Workers (C. I. O.) had a few locals among sharecroppers in the South, but since 1942 it has been virtually inactive in the rural South. At present the C. I. O. drive is not directed toward the sharecroppers and day laborers.

As one who has worked with the N. F. L. U. for the past three years, I believe that this organization deserves the attention of Mr. Mezerik and other

"CENTURIES OF INTOLERANCE"

The documented record of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH & ANTI-SEMITISM. Should be read by everyone who wants to know the real sources of anti-Semitism, and the real reasons for the continuance of this phenomenon despite the increase of education and enlightenment.

44 Pages of Documented Facts 25¢

5 copies for $1.00

Special quantity prices to organizations

AGORA PUBLISHING CO.

DEPT. 75INE

120 LIBERTY STREET NEW YORK 6, N. Y.

liberals who are concerned about the ravages of King Cotton.

DAVID S. BURGESS,

Organizer, T. W. U. A. (C. I. O.)

Rock Hill, S. C., July 3

Books and World Recovery

Dear Sirs: The desperate and continued need for American publications to serve as tools of physical and intellectual reconstruction abroad has been made vividly apparent by appeals from men of learning in many lands and from Americans who have seen that need. The American Book Center for War Devastated Libraries has in the past year and a half shipped nearly a million volumes of highly selected books and periodicals abroad.

Continuing its program through 1947, the center is making a renewed appeal for books and periodicals of intellectual merit in all fields, and especially for volumes published in the last ten years.

Of particular value are complete or incomplete files of The Nation. Such donations to the program will help in the reconstruction which must preface world understanding and peace.

Ship contributions to the American Book Center, care the Library of Congress, Washington 25, D. C., freight prepaid, or write to the Book Center for further information.

ALICE D. BALL,

Assistant Executive Director

Washington, July 2

Books for D. P.'s

Dear Sirs: The S. O. S. (Supplies for Overseas Survivors) of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee has recently launched an intensive campaign for books with which to establish libraries in D. P. camps for refugees awaiting resettlement and to provide leisure and educational reading for Jews who are attempting to reconstruct their lives in Europe.

Persons wishing to contribute books can bring or send their donations to the S. O. S. Collection, 1 West Thirtieth Street, New York 18, New York, or to any one of the two hundred S. O. S. depots located conveniently throughout the five boroughs, or to any branch library in Brooklyn or Queens.

Anything you can do to make the public aware of the terrible dearth of reading material in the D. P. camps will be greatly appreciated.

BERNARD HANKIN,

New York, July 3 Publicity Director

Crossword Puzzle No. 220

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 What art's turned to is light and shady (5 & 3)
- 6 "Though I am not splenitive and ----, Yet have I something in me dangerous"
- 10 African gully found here and there in Donegal
- 11 A vaguely great number in the Indies
- 12 To get your hand in
- 13 Weak tea for a pet that is nursed
- 16 The clock strikes
- 17 "See the conquering hero comes! Sound the ----, beat the drums!"
- 18 Pier and tunnel-maker
- 20 Babe in holy orders
- 22 Tea, Lois? (anag.)
- 23 "He left the ---- at which the world grew pale, To point a moral, or adorn a tale"
- 24 Shown by men vying
- 25 Interrupt
- 27 Princess of Zenda
- 29 In a word, an American song of the last war but one
- 34 A potential lover, perhaps
- 35 One of those Nevada girls
- 36 Sort of flavor you might be crazy about
- 37 Take to water if you would be in the fashion
- 38 The food of fools

DOWN

- 2 A palindromic doctrine
- 3 High spot in Noah's life story

- 4 Tom Bowling lay a sheer one
- 5 Suggests a very short term credit
- 8 Hungarian goulash, as the French would have it
- 7 So bad for the harvester's nerves?
- 8 Mesmeric
- 9 A return to form
- 14 European country of acid nature
- 15 It isn't the early bird you copy
- 16 We are nearly halfway through this one
- 18 Min and Adolf in variety
- 19 How Bernard Shaw might spell the young sheep
- 21 Not a particularly stylish hair-do
- 25 An article has been omitted from the diagram
- 26 Scotsman's beehive?
- 28 We turn up by request, but not straightway
- 30 Prevent
- 31 They show up the dust
- 32 Looks like the answer to "Out of the strong came forth sweetness"
- 33 Fluid rock

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 219

ACROSS:—1 CLOVERLEAF; 6 EWER; 10 GRAPHIC; 11 ENTERIC; 12 CLARISSA; 13 ELIHU; 15 URSA; 17 INSOLVENT; 19 LIGHTSHIP; 21 SATAN; 23 OMEGA; 24 WELLADAY; 27 EASTERN; 28 AVOCADO; 29 SONS; 30 CENTIGRADE.

DOWN:—1 CAGE; 2 ORACLES; 3 ETHER; 4 LOCKSMITH; 5 ARENA; 7 WARLIKE; 8 RECOUNTING; 9 STERPLES; 14 BULLDOZERS; 16 SATIATED; 18 SUPPLIANT; 20 GLEASON; 22 TRA LA LA; 24 WINCE; 25 AMONG; 26 ROTE.

CHILDREN'S CAMP

WALTELL HOUSE ON FRANKEL FARM
MT. BETHEL, PA. Bangor 6273

VACATION FOR ALL THE FAMILY
Modern farm hotel combined with progressive children's camp, 75 miles from New York. All rooms with private bath. Meat, poultry, dairy products and vegetables from the farm.
Rates: — Adults $85 Week — Children $50 Week
N. Y.: Ella Frankel, 241 East 18th St. LE 2-5884

BUY CIGARS WITHOUT MONEY

Box of 50 "Impressive" cigars, clear havans, blunts, long filler best smoke yet, pay $5.00 after you smoke the cigars and are satisfied, if not satisfied after smoking a few, send back remainder — pay nothing.

Order today from
ACE MAIL ORDER CO.
East Orange 1, N. J.

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-2
598 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, New York. Farms in the Mass.-New York Berkshires. Also consulting broker for organizations.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515 M.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order, ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

RESORTS

"The Weathervane"

ON THE MOORS
Grapevine Road • East Gloucester • Mass.
Located in entrancing art colony. Five minutes walk to beach. Inspiring surroundings—intriguing people.
Also the location of
FRANK PACK School of Painting
Phone GLOUCESTER 1702-M or write:
BERTRAM OPPENHEIM, Prop.

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477
Delightful ... swimming and boating on our private lake
Different ... charming colonial atmosphere
Delicious ... our unexcelled cuisine
Diverting ... recordings for listening
... and dancing
53 miles from NYC—Adults Only

SAUGERTIES, NEW YORK

Tel. 590 J.

Real country, no other resort within miles. Pine woods. Interesting hiking. Attractive accommodations. Best of food. Tennis, swimming, bicycling, and other sports. Recordings. Dancing. Fair rates.

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★

In the Glorious Adirondacks

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground. 1,800 feet of elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals. Dietary Laws. Rates: $45, $50, $65 per person.

Send for Booklet — New York Office

320 BROADWAY Room 906 CO 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — PR 4-1390

RESORTS

Yours for Vacation Enjoyment

HILLTOP LODGE

On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
65 miles from N. Y. C. • R. R. Station, Pawling, N. Y.
Every conceivable Sport and Recreation
... with intimate, congenial people
Many improved features for the season!

Open from May thru October

Under direction of: PAUL WOLFSON & SOL ROTHAUER
New York Office: 104 NASSAU ST. Cortlandt 7-3595

REEZEMONT PARK ARMONK, N. Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
the nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dismitted. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
Phone Armonk Village 955

LOVERS OF NATURE

And charming surroundings and privacy on the
ROSE BROOK FARM
SPRUCETON, NEW YORK

200 scenic acres high up in the Catskills, good table, sports. Number of guests limited to 10. About $40. Phone BRYANT 9-4867 for information and reservations.

From—WESTERN VIEW FARM

high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an Inn which is in its Twenty-eighth season under the same ownership-management.
Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week

TED OHMER

New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty and rest and relaxation. One hour from New York

ALL SPORTS IN SEASON
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7085

BYRAM LODGE

ARMONK, N. Y. Tel. Armonk Vill. 906

Only 35 miles from N. Y. C. to Westchester. Completely remodeled, all conveniences, new furnishings. Breakfast, luncheon, all sports, bowling.

Rates $10 weekly; $10 daily. American plan
American-Jewish Cuisine
N. Y. Office: 11 West 42nd Street PE 6-3243

Pine Crest in the Berkshires

WEST CORNWALL, CONN.

on the beautiful Housatonic River

A delightful Adult Resort

Main House and Deluxe Bungalows for Two. Boating, Swimming, fine Tennis, Bicycling, Music Recordings and Dancing.

DIANA & ABE BERMAN
Phone—West Cornwall 85-12

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE

STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK

80 miles from N. Y. via N. Y. Central
Charming lake and countryside, rustic surroundings. Batching, boating, fishing, other sports. Beautiful walks. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for vacations and weekends.

Adults • Rate: $50
RESERVE EARLY
GRETE POPPER Tel. Stanfordville 2931

Planning to advertise in The NATION?

HERE ARE SOME VITAL STATISTICS!

General Advertising - - - - - $300 per page
Publishers & Local - - - - - 240 per page

(EVEN FRACTIONS THEREOF ON A PRO RATA BASIS)

Classified Display - - - - - $7.39 per inch
Classified - - - - - 74c a line (six words)

MINIMUM THREE LINES

Call or write today for additional data on deadlines and discounts!

THE NATION ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT

Twenty Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

BARclay 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 26, 1947

NUMBER 4

The Shape of Things

THE MIDTERM ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS leaves a most imposing slate of unfinished business. While the high-minded gentlemen on the Hill were spending months over the Lillenthal confirmation, cuts in appropriations, un-American activities, and the Taft-Hartley labor act, they were neglecting certain matters of some concern to important sections of their constituents. A few million Americans, many of them veterans, now doubled and tripled up with relatives, watched for the emergence of any housing program. None came. A few million American farmers wanted to know what was to take the place of the war-time price-support program, which expires at the end of 1949. They got no answer. A few million workers, on the sub-level of existence, wondered about an increase in legal minimum wages. Congress was dumb. The hundreds of thousands who saw their homes and lands inundated by the Mississippi floods wanted to know if they could count on the protection their friends in the Tennessee Valley enjoyed. They received an inspiring message from the President. Teachers in all states wondered about their disgracefully low salaries. Working and middle-class people wondered about how to meet doctors' bills. But Congress had no time for such socialistic measures as federal aid to health and education. The army—and all of us—wondered about the proposal for universal military training. It did not reach the level of Congressional debate. Exporters and importers, in this country and in other nations, looked for an extension of authority to negotiate reciprocal-trade agreements. They looked in vain. What have our Representatives been doing these last six months?

✱

"WE ARE DEALING WITH A HUMAN PROBLEM, a world tragedy." In these words, the President called on Congress to act, before this session ends, on the Stratton bill to admit to this country 400,000 of Europe's displaced persons during the next four years. Last week, his words were reinforced by urgent appeals from Secretary of State Marshall, former secretary of War Patterson, and Secretary of Commerce Harriman. All stressed the inhumanity of allowing these castaways of war to rot in Europe's camps. When Representative Gossett interrupted to remind Mr. Marshall that the United States had a higher alien population than any other country in the world, the Secretary replied: "That is the significance of the Statue of Liberty." Opponents of the House bill and the similar one in the Senate have pleaded there is no time to take this momentous step before Congress adjourns. (The Stratton bill has been in the House since April.) The hurry of our Representatives to get home is matched against the weary despair of those who have known no home since the war ended, many of them since Hitler first began to imprison those who believed in liberty. To refuse to take action is to deny the one hope of a new life to thousands, to weaken still further our prestige in the eyes of the world, and to lessen our own self-respect as a people dedicated to the promotion of human rights. If time runs out and Congress adjourns without acting, then the Stratton bill should be placed on the agenda of the special session of Congress likely to be called to discuss the Marshall plan. For the rescue of those 400,000 displaced persons is a vital part of any plan for Europe's reconstruction.

✱

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S DECISION TO cut newsprint imports was indorsed by the House of Commons in spite of a barrage of criticism from members of all parties. The cut means that British newspapers must either reduce circulation or return to the four-page format of war time. As a result, it is charged, publishers will lose revenue, workers will lose jobs, and the task of keeping the public properly informed about current events will be rendered immeasurably more difficult. Moreover, it is argued, the maximum saving to be achieved is $12,000,000, a minute fraction of the current trade deficit. We sympathize with British publishers and journalists but realize that the Labor government has a case too. Its thankless task is to cut down imports at a time when they are so far below the total Britain could absorb that any cut must be painful. As a first step, it has chosen to curtail the foreign exchange allotted to newsprint, gasoline, and tobacco. Reductions in the second and third items will be hard on smokers and owners of private automobiles, but these commodities cannot be classed as absolute necessities like food. Newsprint is a necessity, but in distinction to most of the raw materials imported by Britain, it does not enter directly into the

IN THIS ISSUE :

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	85
Reuther's Victory	87
What Plan for Germany by Freda Kirchwey	88

ARTICLES

A Matter of Expediency by Jerry Tallmer	90
Alaska Arms Again by Richard L. Neuberger	91
The Scope of Biological Warfare by Leonard Engel	93
Our Record in Japan by Maxwell S. Stewart	95
Coal's Inflationary Balloon by Osgood Nichols	98
Late Summer in the Parks by Horace Sutton	100
Dilemma of the Left by Del Vayo	101
Everybody's Business: World Bank on Wall Street by Keith Hutchison	102

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

A Man of Feeling by Irwin Edman	103
The "Middle Ground" by William H. McNeill	104
The Films of a Nation by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.	104
Streamlining Congress by Will Maslow	105
"Into the Sun" by Mildred Adams	106
Economic Warfare by Keith Hutchison	107
Life at the Metropole by Harrison Salisbury	107
Five Pieces by Rilke by Rolfe Humphries	108
Food, Food, Everywhere by Benjamin Harrow	108
Briefer Comment	109
Records by B. H. Haggin	109

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 110

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 221 by Mr. X 111

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor

J. King Gordon

Literary Editor

Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting

Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Library Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

manufacture of exports, and a smaller supply will do less harm to the economy than, say, a smaller supply of copper. There is no good reason to suppose, therefore, that the reduction in newsprint imports is based on anything but strictly economic considerations.

✱

NEVERTHELESS, OPPOSITION SPOKESMEN

have voiced the suspicion that the government's action was inspired by its "well-known dislike and contempt for the popular press." Such charges are perhaps no more than the normal currency of debate, but it is strange to find them parroted in a New York Times editorial. The Labor government, that paper suggests, is "making incidental use of a tight foreign-exchange position to still the voices of its British critics." And it links this "discriminatory policy" with the British government's authorization of "a secret inquiry into the British press." As the Times ought to be aware, the Royal Commission of Inquiry into the Press was authorized by a free vote of the House of Commons. Moreover, the decision to hear oral evidence in private was made not by the government but by the commission itself. It seems that working newspapermen could not afford to risk their jobs by talking frankly in public about what goes on behind editorial iron curtains—one of the things which the commission is supposed to discover. However, a long memorandum presented to the commission by the National Union of Journalists has been made public. This interesting document disproves the charge that the union favors government ownership or control of newspapers. It denounces specific abuses such as news distortion and misleading headlines but agrees that legal remedies might infringe on press freedom. Consequently, it calls for the formation of a British Press Council with authority to draw up and power to enforce a professional code of ethics. When the full text of this important memorandum is available in this country, we hope to give our readers further particulars.

✱

BIG HEADLINES MARCHED RIGHT ACROSS THE

front pages of several New York evening newspapers last week, announcing the invasion of Greece by large forces of guerrillas from Albania, including an "international brigade." The United States, in the person of Mr. Herschel V. Johnson, warned the Security Council that the situation might "burst into an explosion any day" and demanded emergency meetings on the "invasion." Editorials called for "action" before it was too late. Too late for what? No one answered directly, but presumably the new international brigade was only the advance guard of a Russian army which would presently sweep through the Balkans and Greece, precipitating the final struggle to decide the hegemony of the world. The descent from insanity occurred three or four days later. Nobody, it seemed, could find an international brigade, not even the Greek authorities who had announced its arrival, not the United Nations observers who had rushed to the spot. A battle had taken place, with results still in dispute, between guerrillas and government forces somewhere in the vicinity of Yanina. A hundred or so guerrillas were reported to have been killed. So, for the moment, the great showdown seems to have been averted. But where were the eight-column streamer heads to notify the world of its happy reprieve? The evaporation of the international brigade was briefly reported under modest headlines or sunk in dispatches about other events. Meanwhile, the Greek government, encouraged by the splendid American response to a non-existent invasion, had carried through a new wholesale round-up of liberals and leftists. Questioned about these arrests, Dwight P. Griswold, recently arrived American commissioner in Greece, stated that they were none of our business.

✕

A REASONABLY EARLY PEACE TREATY WITH Japan now seems possible as a result of American initiative in suggesting an eleven-power conference in this country "as soon as practicable" to discuss such a treaty. Press comments on the proposed conference have turned chiefly on whether or not the Soviet Union would accept the invitation to it in view of the absence of veto provisions for the Big Five. Many other issues, however, are likely to appear more important before the conference succeeds in drafting a treaty. A tough struggle is to be expected, for example, over reparations, with Russian claims to the Japanese industrial equipment which it removed from Manchuria a particularly difficult stumbling-block. Even more serious is the gap between British and Australian views, on one hand, and American, on the other, over the degree of industrialization to be permitted in post-war Japan. The United States, for reasons indicated in Maxwell S. Stewart's article on page 95 of this issue, has come to favor a substantial revival of Japanese industry. Britain and Australia wish to throttle Japanese industry permanently for economic as well as military reasons. The British are also prepared to insist on much stricter penalties against the Zaibatsu than have so far been imposed. It will be interesting to see how far we are willing to go to meet the legitimate interests of our war-time allies.

✕

WITH THIS ISSUE, THE NATION OFFERS TO its readers the first instalment of a game-within-a-game. Turn to the back of the book and you will find a crossword puzzle by a man we choose to call Mr. X, a contender for the place held by Jack Barrett until his untimely death last month. Next week there will be another contribution from Mr. X. And then we shall run two by a certain Mr. Y. And then back to X for two more, then back to Y, and so on, until each competitor has put six of his puzzles before the public. At the end of twelve weeks we shall decide, on the basis of letters from puzzle-solving readers, who is to be our regular crossword man.

Reuther's Victory

ONE of the most encouraging pieces of labor news in recent weeks was the overwhelming victory of President Walter Reuther of the United Automobile Workers on the question of a merger with the Communist-controlled C. I. O. Farm Equipment Workers. In a referendum, the merger, fought by Reuther, was defeated by a better than two-to-one vote.

The terms of the proposed merger were truly scandalous, as were its background, purposes, and the way the referendum was pushed through. The history of the affair provides a classic example of party-line methods. More important, the defeat of the proposition provides an equally classic example of how to counter such tactics. The method was democracy. The U. A. W. has plenty of that—often too much for its own apparent good, but this time Reuther made it work.

A C. I. O. convention in 1945 had proposed a merger, on decent terms, of the two unions. The U. A. W., including the Reuther group, accepted, but the F. E. rejected the plan. After two years of no progress, with the F. E. still opposing, a complete merger proposal was sprung on Reuther on the final day of a U. A. W. Executive Board meeting in Chicago last June. The deal had been made by the F. E. officers and the anti-Reuther majority of the U. A. W. board, including Secretary-Treasurer George Addes and Vice President R. J. Thomas. These officials gave Reuther fifteen minutes to read the complex and long document setting forth the terms of the proposal. Reuther had been in the same hotel where the deal was negotiated, but his board members had not been able to "find" him to invite him to sit in. His pleas for time to consider the proposal were defeated and the Executive Board, by the usual split vote, authorized the referendum.

The merger terms were tricky. The F. E. would have come into the U. A. W. only for voting purposes, adding some 400 regimented votes to the anti-Reuther bloc at the convention. (Reuther won the presidency last time by a margin of only 124 votes.) Otherwise, the F. E. would have remained "autonomous," as the Daily Worker cheerfully pointed out. With only about 40,000 or 45,000 members itself, it would have absorbed 30,000 more members from the U. A. W.'s agricultural-implementation division. It would have elected its own officers for the proposed new division. Its members would have belonged to something new called the F. E.-U. A. W. The F. E. staff of fifty-four would have been retained for about 75,000 workers. (The U. A. W. has a staff of nine for 130,000 Ford members, and twelve for 300,000 General Motors. The U. A. W. would have assumed the F. E.'s financial obligations, paid its heavy back per capita dues debt to the C. I. O., but waived any claim on a future surplus that the new F. E. division might have accumulated.)

The circumstances surrounding the referendum were tailor-made for the Communists and their backers: summertime, small meetings, unit rule, no prior requirement of announcement of the purpose of the meeting. But the Reuther group worked harder than their opponents. The vote proved conclusively how much strength Reuther has gained among the rank-and-file, how unrepresentative is the anti-Reuther majority on the Executive Board, and, indeed, how unrepresentative are the Communist and near-Communist leaders of some of the locals. In one local, with five top officers all fellow-travelers who championed the merger, the vote was 145 to 5 against the merger proposal.

The defeat of the merger certainly means that Addes will not run against Reuther for the presidency of the U. A. W.; it almost certainly means that Reuther will be reelected easily at this fall's convention. As for the campaign he waged—speeches, debates, rousting out votes, never raising the red issue but fighting entirely on points of constitutionality and organizational soundness, it provided a working model for all other unions bothered with Communist infiltration tactics.

What Plan for Germany?

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE arithmetic looked easy. European reconstruction depends largely on steel which depends on coal. The Ruhr has coal and plants for making steel—plants that suffered less damage than most of us dreamed after the battering they took from British and American bombers. Before the war, the Ruhr turned out between 18 and 20 million tons of steel a year—an amount equal to that of Britain and France together. Today its capacity is estimated at 14 million. The actual output is a little above 2 million with a permissible output of 5.8 million. What more simple, Washington inquires of itself, than to step up this amount to 10 or 12 million tons and fill the hole in Europe's economy that prevents full production and an end to shortages which can only be met by giving dollars to countries that won't ever be able to sell us enough goods to balance their accounts? It is not far-fetched to say that the Ruhr has become the keystone of the Marshall plan for Europe; and if arithmetic ruled human affairs it would be a reasonable enough basis.

Unfortunately, other influences also control events, defying arithmetic. One is fear; one is class interest; one is national interest. French opposition to any plan for increasing the industrial production of Germany, and particularly of the Ruhr, is based on considerations of security that override even the desire for dollars. Ambassador Bonnet's protest to the State Department was firm and eloquent enough to force a postponement of the plan announced last Wednesday by the State, War, and Navy departments to raise the level of German industrial production to a point where it can "contribute to the economic recovery of Europe." The French protest was animated by two intense desires: one, to prevent any agreements affecting the future of Germany, political or economic, being made without French participation; two, to prevent any increase in German economic power, which implies military potential as well, until Germany's invaded and devastated neighbors have been restored to full productivity—as far as possible with German help. Translated into policy, France wants German coal production increased first of all in order to fuel the industries of France; and it wants the French steel industry expanded, instead of the German, which would mean shipping Ruhr coal to Lorraine instead of Lorraine iron ore to the steel mills of the Ruhr.

French preoccupation with power and security has temporarily held up the American plan. But by failing to link the issue of national security with the even more fundamental political issues involved, France has been unable so far to make common cause with Britain. On the question of German recovery, Britain tends to side with the United States. At Moscow, Bevin supported Marshall's stiff attitude on reparations for Russia, and he has argued the need of increased production in Germany generally and particularly in the Ruhr. But Bevin wants the steel and coal of the Ruhr owned and operated by a German state authority (in a newly created Ruhr province), with proper supervision by the Military Government as long as it remains. On this point, the British and American policies collide. The United States is determined to "postpone" the question of nationalization until some remote date, meanwhile encouraging and subsidizing the restoration of private capital in the Ruhr, as elsewhere, only forbidding the reappearance of cartels.

The lengths Mr. Marshall seems ready to go in forcing the Labor Government to adapt its program to American ideas, has been shown by various recent happenings. Particularly pointed speeches have been made lately by various highly placed United States officials. Secretary of Commerce Harriman, in particular, did his best within the limits of diplomatic propriety to jab well-barbed banderillas into the hide of John Bull. Harriman implied that British management of coal, in Germany and Britain alike, is not what it should be, a suggestion that obviously concealed a dig at state control. He also indicated that Britain could expect no preferred treatment in the matter of loans or dollar credits.

The political meaning of these talks was instantly appreciated: America is in a position to dictate terms, and intends to do so. Help goes only to those who agree with us. We speak in terms of recovery and reconstruction, we act in terms of political conformity. Not only are financial facilities to be withheld from states that remain outside the Marshall plan; we have made it clear that if the United States is to carry an increased share of the financial costs of the merged German zones, it will be on condition that the Ruhr industries are not socialized. This is simple political blackmail; and it is blackmail of a sort that is going to produce consequences our rulers have so far blandly declined to consider.

The United States has proposed to Britain, in effect, that we take over the Ruhr, determining economic policies and largely administering its industries. The plan has not been fully disclosed but its outline, according to two recent dispatches by Frederick Kuh in the Chicago Sun and PM, is something like this: A special American-British board will be created to control the Ruhr. It will have an American chairman with the British representative as his deputy or assistant. The United States will apparently provide most of the technicians and managers under whose supervision German industrialists would operate the plants. Britain's program of socializing the steel and coal industries would be shelved for at least five years.

Already Bevin and Bidault have discussed the implications of the new American proposal. Both are reported as strongly opposed; Bevin because he considers nationalization a necessary block to the re-creation of a powerful capitalist-militarist state; Bidault because he fears expansion of German industry, whether under private or public control. Both understandably resent being asked to yield up their basic policies to get American dollars. They see in this latest move a sign that the Marshall plan may not be the clear departure from the Truman Doctrine it at first appeared. It may, instead, be a somewhat diluted extension of that doctrine; a plan aimed at building an economic Maginot line against Western as well as Eastern varieties of socialism.

If Washington forces its Ruhr proposal through it will weaken both Bevin and Bidault, and the other "moderates," such as de Gasperi in Italy, on whom the Marshall plan depends. It will weaken the Socialists in Germany on whom resistance to communism depends. It will go far to justify the suspicions voiced by Molotov at Paris and the attacks of Communists from one end of Europe to the other.

The postponement of the government's order to level up German production may indicate that the anxieties of our chief Western allies have made an impression. M. Bonnet's démarche exposed the French position very clearly. Britain's views will undoubtedly be expressed at the Ruhr coal conference to be held in Washington in the near future. But as long as Britain and France argue for two different solutions based on two different points of view, their protests are not likely to alter American decisions. What is greatly needed is a serious joint effort by both nations to modify the basic attitude of the United States government toward the economic needs of Europe. They could do this best, not by expounding the theories of socialism—to such heresies our officials are surely immune—but by setting forth the practical consequences which will flow from continued American efforts to buy off social change in Europe with food and dollars. They could explain what will happen to the precarious balance which holds moderates in office in a dozen Western nations if they are forced to surrender to American capitalist pressure. They could perhaps even convince this country of the need to prevent the return to power of those men and interests who, not only in Germany, helped lead Europe into fascism and the world into war.

But far more effective than exhortation would be a French-British plan which would unite the legitimate demands of both nations and at the same time provide for at least a moderate increase in Ruhr production. This is not, perhaps, as large an order as it sounds. France might well accept a rise in German steel output—even though it would involve the consumption of coal which the French demand and need—if it were firmly linked to a plan of inter-allied supervision of the Ruhr. (At the same time, provision could be made for increasing French and Belgian steel production along with German.) Britain, on its side, might tolerate an inter-Allied commission and a more complete union of the Western zones, including the French, as long as increased output and socialization were definitely part of the plan.

If the United States is not totally committed to the restoration of German heavy industry in private hands—but under American financial control—such a scheme would give it most of the rest of what it wants: more production to fill the gap in Europe's total production and the unity of action on the part of the European nations so earnestly requested by Secretary Marshall. If Britain and France could work out a compromise proposal and win for it the support of the smaller Western nations, their hand would be much strengthened in future negotiations with Washington. And if Washington could be led to abandon its decision to make a restored capitalist Germany the chief eastern bulwark against the Russian system, the attacks of the Western Communists would lose much of their present deadly effect.

A Matter of Expediency

BY JERRY TALLMER

Lake Success, July 18

THERE is a great joke being played on a couple of thousand people who work out at Lake Success these days, but most of them don't think it's so funny. These people are the permanent staff members of the United Nations—the hired hands—who had always thought, until recently, that they were working for an organization which was working, in its turn, to promote and encourage "respect for human rights and for the fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

The important thing about this joke is not so much what it will do to injure the respect these 2,500 people have for themselves, for their employer, for the tribal customs of the nation in which their employer has set up shop, and for the ability of mankind to carry out its professed and cleanly stated aims. What is far more important about it if its perpetration becomes complete (which is a good odds-on bet at this point), is that it will have been performed in the theater which all the world attends. A poet could not more expertly have set the symbolic framework for this gesture of expediency and harassed acquiescence on the one hand and mercantile cynicism on the other, than have the gentlemen of the United Nations secretariat and the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company.

What has happened is this: an agreement has been reached under which 600 apartments will be reserved in Metropolitan's Peter Cooper Village for U.N. employees.

White employees, that is.

It doesn't specifically say "white employees" in the contract which was signed last week after a long, finicky year of negotiation, but the announced clause which allows Metropolitan to lease directly to individual tenants, and thus to pass on its tenants, will turn the trick. For as any reader of this magazine and a great many other people know, Metropolitan frankly acknowledges that it does not think that whites and colored people mix in housing projects—not in its projects anyway. In virtue of which, Metropolitan is at the present defendant in a suit brought in the New York State Supreme Court to enjoin it from discriminating in tax-exempt Stuyvesant Town, adjoining Peter Cooper Village, and Judge Felix C. Benvenga may be writing a more important decision than he thinks—one with worldwide implications.

For make no mistake about it. People all over the world are going to hear about the U. N. and Metropolitan Life. As someone has said, the Soviets will see to that. Even without their assistance, news will spread that the words of the U. N. Charter are being belied within the doors of the U. N. itself.

Several hundred U. N. employees, for instance, who are beginning to wonder just what the Charter means, took time off from the hour they needed to catch busses and trains yesterday evening and got together in the Economic and Social Council chambers to try to take the first steps toward restoring values to words. They will undoubtedly be classified, by the authorities, as malcontents and trouble-makers, at the very least. It is said that Trygve Lie, their boss, is a stickler for discipline and proper conduct. But the employees who met and lodged three resolutions against the U. N.—Metropolitan agreement seemed to think that the impropriety had already been committed.

"The U. N. has allowed itself to be maneuvered into a position where it appears to be indorsing all the principles we oppose," said Edward H. Lawson, a tall, rugged, gently speaking man. Mr. Lawson was eminently qualified to present his resolution, for he was speaking "as a member of the secretariat of the Human Rights Division, as an American Negro, and as an employee of the United Nations who needs housing pretty badly."

He went on to explain the obscurity of the situation as it is faced by U. N. employees. Except for what they had read in the newspapers, they had been unable to determine whether or not a contract existed. The U. N. had apparently broken off negotiations with Metropolitan a month before on the basis of the discrimination issue; first word that the agreement had been signed appeared in Judge Benvenga's courtroom when Metropolitan's man, George Gove, stated that it had been, in an affidavit disputing a point of the plaintiffs'. The U. N.'s about-face was inexplicable. Everybody was keeping mum or else knew nothing; Russel Cook, for one, the chief of the Housing Division of the Bureau of Personnel, seemed sincerely to be in the dark.

The day following the meeting, The Nation received a verification of the existence of the agreement from Byron Price, Assistant to the Secretary General, Department of Administrative and Financial Services. "Of course it exists," he said. But the staff members aren't told its terms, and Lawson's draft resolution—which will be incorporated with the other two resolutions—demands that "if the existing contract is not or cannot be interpreted as permitting the free, democratic, objective, and public choice of tenants . . . on the grounds of race, sex, language, or religion, all staff members should refrain from leasing the apartments involved."

A second resolution by Jean Back, an interpreter, was milder, and "advised" employees to boycott the Peter Cooper apartments. But the third, submitted by Henri Cornil, a Security Council division administrator, was dynamite—and called upon the Secretary General to refer the staff protest back to the member governments. Cornil's resolution also calls upon the U. N. itself to provide bias-free housing.

The three resolutions have now to be hammered together, and the entire staff to vote on them. Another meeting is scheduled for this week—perhaps by the time you read this.

Meantime, delegates to the United Nations itself who sincerely want the U. N. Charter to stand for something—like Eleanor Roosevelt, chairman of the Human Rights Commission—might well ponder the words of the staff member, a doctor born in Africa—"where they have 300,000,000 black people"—, who said soberly and with great grace, into a microphone in the "Econ-Soc" chamber last Thursday, "If we do accept the use of the Peter Cooper Village now, in any form, it will not only hurt the American Negroes but hurt a great many more people abroad. All of us should understand the spirit of the Charter. It is a question of the rights of man."

Alaska Arms Again

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Annette Island, Alaska, July 20

THE generals and admirals don't want to be poor prophets a second time. In 1939, President Roosevelt asked the War Department about the condition of Alaskan garrisons and bases. The army then had 298 soldiers in the Territory, their ancient guns at Chilkoot Barracks pointed in the direction of our Canadian neighbors. However, the President was informed that "there appears at present to be no necessity from the viewpoint of national defense of increasing the military establishment in Alaska." The Chief of Naval Operations displayed equal complacency, reporting that "the Navy Department is on record as not in favor of very large appropriations for naval facilities in Alaska."

A few days later, the Aleutian Islands became the first American soil to be invaded in nearly a century and a half, bombs fell on Dutch Harbor, and army officers who could speak the Eskimo tongue desperately organized the natives for guerrilla warfare. Now the military departments are arming Alaska against a possible future enemy whose identity is by no means a secret.

Alaska has seen the wheel of international relations turn full circle. The phenomenon may be discussed around mahogany tables in Washington and London, but it happened in Alaska. Two years ago, a mission of a thousand Soviet aviators occupied barracks at Ladd Field near Fairbanks, taking delivery of fighter planes and medium bombers flown north along the Alcan Highway. Today, at Mile 26 on the Alcan out of Fairbanks, the War Department is constructing a satellite field from which super-bombers can be sent winging into Siberia. The allies who roamed the streets of Fairbanks in 1945, buying perfume and lingerie for their girls, may be met again some day on an Arctic battlefield.

At Nome, Galena, and Anchorage the army is lengthening runways and building new hangars. The Alaska Railroad, whose equipment dates back to the driving of the golden spike by Warren G. Harding, is getting new locomotives and its spurs are being extended. Tunnels are under construction to take traffic off inflammable trestles. Prime Minister King has promised that Canada will maintain its 1,220 miles of the Alcan Highway so as to keep open an alternative route to Alaska if the sea lanes should be jeopardized. Commercial airfields at Annette Island, Juneau, and Yakutat are being made ready to receive the new big bombers.

These preparations are popular in Alaska. The golden trickle from the federal treasury, turned off after V-J Day, has commenced to flow again. Alaskan towns are booming. The white population of the Territory has increased at least 50 per cent. Both wages and prices are fantastic. Carpenters earn $520 a month but must pay $1.25 a dozen for eggs, $1.50 for a haircut, 60 cents for a hamburger sandwich at a lunch counter, and $1.40 for a quart of mediocre ice cream. As during the war, the present defense contracts are on a cost-plus basis. This means that spending is reckless, with five men on hand to do three men's work.

But beyond all this, the military activities are applauded for geopolitical reasons. When World II was being fought, vast good-will for Russia was created in Alaska. Alaskans overlooked the fact that though Soviet missions were at Fairbanks, Galena, and Nome, no

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, an Oregon journalist who served in Alaska during the war, has returned there this summer and is sending The Nation frequent reports on our Arctic bastion.

American mechanic was allowed in the planes which flew westward across Bering Strait. The Russian fliers were personally popular. They drained the half-a-dollar Alaskan milkshakes at a single draft, winked at the married waitresses, and hammered the counter for another "vanilla." Warm friendly relations melted international suspicions.

There is still none of the hysteria which the Hearst press hints has gripped the Territory. People do not think Russian atomic missiles are about to zoom over from Siberia. But the spy trials in Ottawa have aroused some concern. And Russia's intransigence at the peace table is considered in connection with the 14,400 combat planes delivered to it on Alaskan soil during the war. Even liberals in the territorial legislature and local newspaper offices have bitterly denounced the left-wing labor leaders in the United States who called the army's cold-weather experiment, "Operation Frostbite," a hostile act against the Soviet Union. Delegate E. L. Bartlett, a New Deal Democrat, has asked when Alaskans will be told as much about Siberian air bases, roads, and rail lines as the Russians know from first-hand observation.

The tragedy of this vast defense boom in Alaska is that it is not accompanied by any effort to give the Territory a stable and enduring civilization. Three years ago, the North Pacific Study financed by the State Department pointed out: "When North America was suddenly threatened through Alaska, our armed forces had to begin almost from scratch in an uninhabited wilderness which lacked most of the essential transportation, communication, and other instruments and social institutions which a decently developed civilian society would already have provided. These facilities would have been immediately available to the military forces had there been in Alaska a larger, better-distributed, and more permanent population carrying on the normal economic and social activities characteristic of Americans in 'the States.'"

The housing shortage in Alaska is so aggravated that families have tried to survive in tents during the 50-below-zero winters of the interior valleys. The territorial Department of Health contends that half the housing in Alaska is substandard. Even in communities within sight of the vast spruce and hemlock forests of the Alaskan "panhandle," no method has been worked out to solve the lumber shortage. The Alaska Development Board has been drawing up detailed plans for local exploitation of Alaskan resources, but the 1947 territorial legislature refused funds to continue the undertaking. The legislature, dominated by canneries and mining corporations, turned down Governor Gruening's plea for enactment of a territorial income tax. This scandalous situation, of which little is known in the United States, means that government in Alaska is virtually hamstrung.

For many years, Alaska has been the most lightly taxed entity under the American flag. Not until a 1 per cent sales tax was passed in 1946 for veterans' benefits did the Territory have a single general tax. It still has no income or property tax. The salmon industry, worth $55,000,000 a year, pays only a few cents on each case of fish. Yet Alaska needs funds for schools, roads, public health, and law enforcement. Some Alaskan cities have only four or five miles of roads beyond their limits. Veterans have been deterred from settling on the farm land of the Territory by the almost total lack of transportation and communication. Wendell P. Kay, director of the Alaska Housing Authority, declares that Alaska's death rate from tuberculosis, already the highest in the world, has been aggravated by overcrowding in icy tents, crumbling shacks, and unchinked cabins.

Alaska has vast open spaces but no wilderness police force to compare with the Royal Mounted of Canada. A criminal recently apprehended in Alaska confessed to six murders. Territorial law-enforcement officials did not even know his victims were missing. A federal judge told me that prospectors and trappers disappear in "the bush" and on one ever looks for them. "Not only are criminals uncaught generally in Alaska," he continued, as we ate fifty-cent cheese sandwiches in Ketchikan, "but I am convinced there is no real knowledge of what crimes are committed."

Alaska is maturing. Its cities are becoming increasingly like cities in Oregon and Washington. But its government is wholly unable to cope with the needs of the region. The Territory's feeble legislature cannot set up courts of either original or appellate jurisdiction. All legislative acts are subject to repeal by Congress. With no vote in Congress, the Alaskan Delegate is without influence. Even postal regulations victimize the Territory. All parcel post in Alaska is charged the eighth-zone rate. It costs as much to send a package the fourteen miles from Skagway to Haines as it does to send the same parcel from Seattle to New York City. Last year, Alaskans voted for statehood, but the present session of Congress has declined to act. It thought a delegation should visit the Territory this summer for further "analysis"—rainbow trout twenty-two inches long are caught in Alaska.

Alaska needs families. The present white population of 58,000 is a huge proportionate increase over the 39,000 whites who lived there before the war, but it is still made up of shifting, footloose men. Pan-American recently flew in 2,500 workers to lengthen runways and clear ground. The army is recruiting construction crews along the Seattle and Portland waterfronts. Canneries ship up boatloads of Filipinos who are virtually indentured laborers. Less than 15 per cent of Alaska's white people were born in the Territory. Those who were born there seldom stay. Of 10,595 Alaskan-born whites enumerated in the census of 1940, only 4,352 were living in Alaska. Governor Gruening is compiling a pamphlet out of answers to the question: "Why did you leave Alaska?"

One of the most frequent is lack of economic opportunity. Another is the difficulty of finding a place to live.

To sustain families, Alaska requires a solid economic base. The salmon industry is principally carried on by migrant labor brought by boat from Seattle. Gold-mining is a frail reed, an artificial industry dependent on financial manipulation rather than on genuine human needs. Pulp and paper would underpin the shaky economy of southeastern Alaska, and Secretary Krug has prophesied a newsprint enterprise employing 12,000 people—more people than live in Anchorage, the biggest Alaskan city. The spruce and hemlock forests of the panhandle could supply a fourth of America's newsprint, but owing to the present soaring wage and price scales the Alaskan product cannot compete with newsprint from other sources.

Alaska must have schools, hospitals, and communications. It must be freed from absentee government and absentee ownership of its natural resources. The American West was developed when the railroads received huge land grants to subsidize low freight rates and fares; the Northern Pacific got $136,000,000 worth of timber and farm lands to underwrite a $70,000,000 railroad. But at least the rates were kept down, and people settled the Dakotas and Oregon. In Alaska, opposite policies have prevailed. The government-owned Alaska Railroad and the private Alaska Steamship Company have the highest rates in the world. High costs and high wages make it practically impossible for any Alaskan products to compete with similar products of other countries.

If war—God forbid—should ever sweep across the Arctic gables of the planet, Alaska will be more easily held if it is inhabited by half-a-million people than if it is a solitude. A country cannot be kept by forts alone. The Russians built log outposts in Alaska, put the Indians under the knout, and drained off the furs. Now only the rounded minarets of the old Greek Orthodox churches tell of their former sovereignty. The United States has the opportunity to build in Alaska a civilization which will far surpass the efforts of the power on the opposite shore of Bering Strait.

The Scope of Biological Warfare

BY LEONARD ENGEL

FROM the beginning of the debate on control of atomic energy, there has been a tendency to confuse the issue of control with the issue of peace. By this I mean that a great many people look on atomic control as a means of avoiding the horrors of a third world war. This is a fallacious approach. For a plan of control is essentially an instrument, and an instrument cannot supply what is not in the hearts of men. If men do not want peace, the plan is bound to fail. Only genuine friendship among the great powers can guarantee mankind against an atomic war. Moreover, a new war will bring other weapons which are fully as destructive as atomic bombs—and for which no mechanical control can be devised.

I refer to biological weapons. A few weeks ago, the Journal of Immunology published a long, hitherto secret report on bacterial warfare by Drs. Theodor Rosebury and Elvin A. Kabat of Columbia University. The report discusses no fewer than twenty-five diseases as potential agents of war. Yet it does not tell the story by half. For one thing, the Rosebury-Kabat paper deals mainly with the diseases of man. Livestock and crop diseases are given only passing mention, and crop poisons are entirely omitted. For another, the report was prepared in 1942. Since then, the largest biological laboratory in the world—operated by the army at Camp Detrick, Maryland—has been working without cease on biological weapons. So have other laboratories in the United States, Canada, and Great Britain, and, no doubt, in the U. S. S. R. Moreover, conservative research in biology and medicine opens up new biological-warfare possibilities every day.

Let me review briefly what BW (biological warfare) research is already known to have accomplished, and what further advances are promised for the future. We shall see then that there is no way out but peace.

BW obtains weapons from the whole of medicine and biology. It is, so to speak, medicine and biology stood on their heads. Thus, medicine studies disease epidemics for the purpose of minimizing their damage and halting their spread; the same data show the BW researcher how to make epidemics more virulent and widespread.

At the time Drs. Rosebury and Kabat prepared their report, systematic experiments in BW had not been conducted, so far as is known, anywhere in the world. But already, at least half a dozen of the possible disease weapons listed by the Columbia bacteriologists have been brought into practicable form. One is pneumonic plague, the invariably fatal air-borne form of bubonic plague. During the war, a small navy medical unit at the University of California developed an aerosol capable of disseminating a disease identified in the official announcement as "one of history's oldest killers"; the reference was almost certainly to the pneumonic plague.

LEONARD ENGEL, coauthor of "World Aflame," frequently contributes articles to The Nation on the latest developments in science.

The disease agents developed by the army have not been disclosed. Some of them can be identified, however, through a careful reading of published reports on accidental infections at Camp Detrick and in other laboratories. These reports show that anthrax is readily usable as a projectile contaminant—to send even the lightly wounded to bed for protracted periods—and that some or all of the following can be spread by means of aerosol clouds: yellow fever, psittacosis, tularemia (rabbit fever), undulant fever, melioidosis (a rare fatal disease of the Malay Peninsula), and rickettsial infections such as typhus and Rocky Mountain spotted fever.

This is a revealing as well as a formidable list. It indicates clearly the extent of the BW experimenter's resources. A number of the diseases named occur very infrequently, and rare diseases are often superior weapons, for natural immunity to them is likely to be low.

Also well adapted to BW are diseases which are usually confined to particular sections of the globe. Yellow fever, for instance, is normally found only in tropical areas with a high concentration of Aedes aegypti mosquitoes. In those regions, a large fraction of the population has acquired immunity. But "yellow jack" can be employed elsewhere with devastating results.

In order to introduce yellow fever into temperate zones, it is necessary to change its mode of transmission, for Aedes aegypti become numerous enough to serve as the carrier only under certain limited climatic and environmental conditions. However, the yellow-fever virus is easily cultivated in the laboratory. And cultured "yellow jack" can be spread through the air.

That brings us to an important point. An inexhaustible supply of dangerous biological weapons is provided by the comparatively simple procedure of disseminating old diseases in new ways. On the list of aerosol-spread infections above are three, besides yellow fever, which are not ordinarily air-borne and which in their natural form have little military value. Tularemia is generally contracted by handling infected animals; the rickettsial diseases are louse- and tick-borne; and undulant fever comes from infected milk. But all three can be transformed into readily spread, highly virulent air-borne diseases.

Though there are immunizing vaccines for plague, yellow fever, psittacosis, and typhus, they are not therefore eliminated as biological weapons. In the first place, BW is an insidious form of warfare, and an agent may not be identified until it is too late for vaccination counter-measures. Secondly, immunity can be overridden by an unusual mode of infection, a massive dose of infectious material, or an especially virulent microbe.

One of the principal activities of BW laboratories is the cultivation of super-virulent microbe strains. And it may soon be possible to create in the laboratory wholly new disease organisms of the most awesome power. In the last few years, virus chemists, paced by the Rockefeller Institute's brilliant Wendell M. Stanley, have come close to the secret of viruses, the most elemental of pathogenic organisms. Viruses have been shown to be particles of protein, and several of the chemical groupings in their structure have been identified. Out of this knowledge, ingenious biochemists may ultimately fashion artificial neutralizing anti-bodies to protect man against a wide range of maladies, from the common cold to polio and encephalitis. But the same knowledge may first be used in the construction of new and deadlier viruses.

So much for the diseases of man. In general, BW utilizes similar bacterial and virus weapons for attacking livestock and crops. Crops may also be destroyed through artificially disseminated fungus blights and plant-hormone crop poisons. I would like to say a word about the latter, which are by-products of one of the most useful developments in modern science.

At the moment of Japan's surrender, we were ready, had the war continued into 1946, to spray Japanese fields with a chemical agent that would have withered the enemy's rice crop just before harvest. The chemical that was to be used has never been identified, but there are many that could have done the job.

About twenty years ago, a group of Dutch botanists began a systematic study of the growth mechanism of plants. Growth, they found, involves a family of compounds known as plant hormones or auxins. Today, hundreds of auxins have been identified, and auxin research is under way on a large scale in every country with a sizable chemical industry, for auxins are not difficult to manufacture and they can be made to regulate plant growth in numberless astonishing and useful ways. The manufacture of one auxin, 2,4-D, which stimulates broad-leaved plants to overgrowth and death and so is a wonderful weed killer, is already a multi-million-dollar business. Another hormone, methyl alpha-naphthyl-acetate, keeps potatoes and other tubers from sprouting in storage. Still another, alpha-naphthyl-acetic acid, prevents premature dropping of fruit from trees. Yet another promises to do away with a laborious hand "de-budding" operation now required in tobacco cultivation.

Most plant hormones can also be used to modify plant growth in disastrous ways. Vegetables as well as weeds, for example, are killed by 2,4-D, since both are broad-leaved plants. Any competent auxin chemist can, in fact, pick out in a few hours a combination of plant hormones capable of destroying almost any crop in any desired manner, whether by overgrowth, destruction of root system, or inhibition of fruiting.

It is consequently no exaggeration to say that a grim assortment of nightmarish horrors is at the disposal of tomorrow's warmakers. As a means of destruction, biological weapons are certainly comparable to the atom bomb. What makes matters worse is the fact that the only possible future great war—between the United States and Russia—will provide precisely the right geographic and political conditions for BW.

Owing to the danger of a backfire among one's own troops and people, it is best to employ BW against a distant enemy. We and the Russians are as widely separated, geographically speaking, as possible. We are likewise poles apart ideologically. A clash between our two nations would pit two distinctive social systems against each other. Historically, no holds are barred in such struggles. Every available arm is used, no matter how barbaric. The sole test of a weapon is its military efficiency; fear of retaliation rarely serves as a restraint. The struggle between the Allies and the Axis brought unrestricted submarine warfare, systematic extermination of conquered peoples, mass incendiary and high-explosive attacks against cities, rocket warfare, and the atom bomb—an unprecedented collection of horrors.

A new war would see even fewer humanitarian restraints than the last. And there might well be early employment of BW by both sides. For as I said at the beginning of this article, there is no mechanical control scheme that can limit advance preparations by any nation. The raw materials of BW—disease germs and the like—are at hand in every country. The required equipment is simple and is to be found in any brewery. And the necessary techniques, which are as well known to Soviet as to American scientists, spring out of essential everyday activities in biology, medicine, and chemistry. Indeed, a biological arms race may already have started; BW research is still going on, at any rate, in the United States, Canada, and Great Britain under an agreement signed during the war. Nothing can halt such a race, nothing can secure man against the threat of biological war except peace and friendship among nations, especially the two that dominate the world today.

Our Record in Japan

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

AMERICANS returning from Japan have given very different appraisals of our occupation program. Some few have lent unqualified support to the widely held opinion in this country that "MacArthur is doing a good job." Others have been severely critical. But even the critics will admit that, though the situation is complex, surprising progress has been made toward the goals set forth in the Potsdam Declaration.

So far the occupation has been almost exclusively an American show. The Far Eastern Commission in Washington and the Allied Control Council in Tokyo have functioned chiefly as debating societies. Policy has been formulated by the State, Navy, and War departments in Washington. It has been administered by MacArthur and his staff. Because it has been a single-nation affair, the occupation has been far more efficient in Japan than in Germany. But its exclusively American character has also led to many blunders: Americans are ill equipped to understand Japanese psychology and Japanese institutions; too often, the making over of Japanese institutions along American lines has been interpreted as a "success."

As one tries to assemble unbiased and detailed information on occupation policy from individuals who have served under MacArthur, one is immediately struck by the contradictions in the evidence. It appears, for example, that although the new Japanese constitution is one of the most enlightened and democratic in the world, the new Japanese government is the organic successor to the old, and power is in practically the same hands as before. Excellent plans for the elimination of the Zaibatsu exist on paper, but the great monopolies still wield tremendous power behind the scenes, virtually dominating the Yoshida government. The Japanese government has been forced to cancel all laws limiting freedom of speech, thought, or assembly, and union organization has been encouraged; yet Philip Murray's New Year's message to the Japanese workers was censored to exclude every reference to democracy. Preliminary steps have been taken to remove part of Japanese industry as reparations; simultaneously, the United States has granted credits for the restoration of important sectors of industry. The failure to deal adequately with Japan's economic crisis threatens such success as has been achieved in the political sphere.

Some of these contradictions are the result of the same dualism that is found in American policy toward other countries. The original policy directives, drawn with a view to stamping out militarism, were essentially democratic. But the threat of rising communism, though largely illusory, has led the American military authorities to take a number of undemocratic steps and to seek the cooperation of forces which they set out to destroy.

MAXWELL S. STEWART, a staff contributor of The Nation, has written extensively on Far Eastern affairs.

Most of the shortcomings of the occupation, however, have grown out of the original American decision to work through the Japanese government. The decision to retain the emperor and the Japanese governmental apparatus was made, it will be recalled, despite the misgivings of the persons who had given the most study to the nature of Japanese society. Against their advice, it was decided that the United States did not have the trained personnel to administer Japan directly, and that use of the existing governmental structure would both cut the costs of the occupation substantially and contribute to the smoothness of its operation.

Unfortunately, it has also helped keep the Allies from attaining the primary objectives of the occupation. These objectives, as specified in the Potsdam Declaration and the basic directive of the State Department, might be summarized as (1) destruction of Japanese militarism, (2) removal of the bars to democracy, (3) creation of a stable peace-time economy, democratically organized and providing a wide distribution of income and of ownership of the means of production so as to prevent the resurgence of expansionist policies.

DEMILITARIZATION

The immediate tasks of demobilization and the repatriation of Japan's overseas troops and civilians were carried out smoothly and completely. But the larger aspects of demilitarization—the purge of militaristic elements from public life, the reorganization of the educational system, and the reorientation of Japanese thinking—have not been attacked with the expected vigor. The SCAP purge directive was sweeping. It ordered the Japanese government to eliminate from public life and from responsible positions in such private activities as the press, finance, and business, all war criminals and suspects, including professional military men and members of the former secret police, the war-time political fronts, and jingo-terroristic societies. But the Japanese government succeeded in mitigating the effects of the order by procrastination and lax enforcement. SCAP issued its first purge order on January 4, 1946. The Japanese Cabinet delayed even preliminary action until February 9, although a general election was imminent. Enforcement of the purge for many categories was put off until March 10, and not until November were purge lists issued covering local officials and leaders of the press, stage, screen, and radio.

Since some of the most important measures for the reformation of the Japanese government were initiated in the early months of 1946, the delay permitted many officials of the old regime to play a large role in the reconstruction of Japan. The Cabinet which was expected to carry out the purge directive, for example, contained four ministers who were subsequently barred from office. Many of the men affected by the terms of the purge were allowed to retire voluntarily, a concession which protected their rights to pensions, benefits, and honors and made it easier for them to return to public life at a later date. Numerous other violations of the spirit and letter of the purge directive have occurred, and the occupation authorities, bearing no administrative authority, have been unable to do more than intervene in a few of the more flagrant cases, such as that of Icharo Hato-yama, president of the Liberal Party, who would have become Prime Minister if SCAP had not acted.

Definite progress can be reported in the task of reshaping the Japanese educational system along democratic lines. Textbooks have been rewritten to eliminate the nationalistic myths of Japanese history. Some nationalistic teachers have been purged, particularly from the higher posts. Training in judo, fencing, and bayonet drill has been abolished, but the children continue to march to and from school in military uniforms. There is evidence that independent thinking is being encouraged, even in the lower grades, by means of group discussion. But few new teachers have been trained, and the older ones complain that they cannot very well teach democracy when they have no opportunity to learn what it is or how it works. In education, more than in any other field, reforms cannot be imposed from outside. Encouragement must be given to the development of progressive teacher groups who can take over when the armies of occupation pull out. This development has scarcely begun.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION

Similar shortcomings may be noted in the political field. The new constitution is generally regarded as effectively laying the basis on which a Japanese democracy could be built. MacArthur himself is largely responsible for the prevalence of this idea, having called it "one of the great spiritual reformations of mankind." As a statement of democratic principles, it is, indeed, a remarkable document. The trouble is that it is essentially an American document. In an effort to by-pass the Four-Power Control Council, with its Soviet delegate, it was prepared in a few weeks by members of MacArthur's staff. The Japanese government not only had no hand in the final draft but was forced to accept it abruptly without discussion.

Perhaps the most praiseworthy feature of the new constitution is its guaranties of civil rights. No fewer than thirty-one articles are concerned with the "rights and duties" of the people as free citizens in a free state. Article 19 declares, for example, that "freedom of thought and conscience shall be held inviolable." Article 21 guarantees "freedom of assembly, association, speech, and press." Encouraged by SCAP directives insisting on these basic freedoms, the Japanese people were quick to take advantage of their new opportunities. Demonstrations were held; new magazines and newspapers were started, reflecting various political views.

This early spontaneous exercise of the basic freedoms which we brought to Japan did not last long. Although SCAP refused to permit the Japanese government to exercise censorship, it installed a censorship of its own. It has also used its control of the allocation of newsprint to assist the older conservative papers at the expense of the radical papers which mushroomed into existence in the early days of the occupation. Undoubtedly, the Japanese people have a great deal more freedom than they ever had before. Much criticism of the government still appears in the press. However, the Communist bogey has caused SCAP to overlook certain violations of the bill of rights by the Japanese police, even to the use of force in breaking up strikes and popular demonstrations. Thus the Japanese can hardly be blamed if they feel that our interest in the protection of civil rights is often merely a pretext for encouraging the spread of American rather than Soviet ideas.

LABOR AND MONOPOLY

Yet, surprisingly enough, it is in the field of labor relations that the greatest progress has been made in laying the basis for a functioning democracy. Labor advisers on MacArthur's staff have acted on the assumption that the working class constitutes potentially the strongest support for a democratic regime in Japan. The upper class is thoroughly militaristic and reactionary; the middle class is weak; the farm population, although harshly exploited, is traditionally conservative and indifferent to politics. Under the encouragement of the occupation authorities, membership in Japanese labor unions has risen from less than half a million to approximately four and a half million. Most of the new unions have sprung up spontaneously in individual plants. American influence has been generally constructive, though efforts have been made to force the labor movement into channels that conform to American experience. Public demonstrations have been checked; collective bargaining has been encouraged; political activity on the part of labor has been held to a minimum even though labor's political power is badly needed to offset the dominant reactionary influences in the government.

Parallel with the strengthening of labor have been the efforts of the occupation to destroy or limit drastically the power of the great pre-war and war-time industrial and financial tycoons, the Zaibatsu. On paper, the steps taken seem impressive. Five of the largest of the Zaibatsu groups have been forced to dissolve. The former leadership has been purged. The assets of the wealthiest families have been converted into ten-year non-negotiable bonds, and a progressive income-tax program to reduce the wealth and power of individuals in these great family trusts is projected. Not all these measures, however, have actually been carried out. The absence of a strong middle class makes it difficult to find purchasers for the assets taken from the wealthy families. In the absence of government ownership, which has been rejected by SCAP as socialistic, no one seems to know how the Zaibatsu's property can be widely redistributed.

Such success as SCAP has had in instituting democratic reform has been seriously endangered by its incapacity to deal with the grave economic problems facing post-war Japan. As in Germany, these problems are complicated by the fact that a revival of industry carries the threat of restoring military potential. Because of the divergence of views, reparations policy has not yet taken final form. This delay, in turn, has delayed presentation of a basic program of economic reconstruction. Another obstacle has been the Japanese government's failure to cope with the inflation. The rapid and uncontrolled rise in prices has been due largely to the government's attempt to meet the high costs of the occupation by printing money—possibly with the aim of discrediting the occupation. Last year the government incurred a deficit of 75 billion yen—considerably more than the costs of the occupation. Currency in circulation has jumped from 8 billion yen to 122 billion within twelve months.

FAILURE TO COMBAT INFLATION

The defects in the administrative structure and general operations of SCAP are forcefully demonstrated by its failure to combat rising prices. SCAP is specifically exempt from the responsibility of strengthening the Japanese economy. But it is clear that without a strong economy the whole program of democratization is doomed to failure. In April, 1946, some of the lesser experts in several SCAP divisions began to be concerned about the grave economic maladjustments resulting from the inflation, but before pressure could be brought to bear on the Japanese government to set up an adequate system of industrial allocations and price controls, agreement had to be reached within SCAP itself. To this end, a program of education had to be carried on in the various divisions, up to and including the General Staff. MacArthur himself had to be convinced of the necessity of action. So much time was consumed that the economic control board was not established until August, 1946.

At first, a political hack was placed in charge, and despite continued demands from the lower levels of SCAP, no real effort was made to establish a system of controls until late May and June, 1947, when the Katayama Cabinet took power. By that time, it was generally agreed that it was too late to check inflation by a system of industrial controls alone. The anti-inflation program announced by the Cabinet in early July was essentially a retreat. Only a basic reconstruction of the Japanese economy, with adequate taxation and a restoration of export trade, would succeed today in checking the inflationary spiral. This would require substantial American financial assistance, which would mean reversing our original policy. Whether or not such assistance is ultimately given will not depend primarily on Japan's needs. It is more likely to depend on an appraisal of Japan's potential importance as an advanced industrial base in an American-Soviet war.

Thus we are confronted with the supreme paradox of our occupation policies. The democratic objectives of the occupation can be achieved only if the Japanese economy is restored, and the necessary American financial aid is likely to be forthcoming only as a means of building up Japan as a bulwark against Russia. But if Japan is to be developed as an anti-Communist outpost, the occupation authorities must seek support, not from labor and other democratic elements, but from the reactionary military groups that they at first wished to destroy.

Coal's Inflationary Balloon

BY OSGOOD NICHOLS

JOHAN L. LEWIS once said, "He who tooteth not his own horn, the same shall not be tooted." This year he was joined by a whole orchestra of mine operators, who were only too happy to accompany his inflationary solo about his theoretical 44½-cent hourly boost in the new coal contract in the belief that the louder the noise the more the audience would be willing to pay.

Last week the noise proved too much for President Truman. He pleaded with the coal and steel industries not to believe their own propaganda and hike up the consumer's bill out of all proportion to their increased costs. He also tried to explain to the public how badly the miners and operators had misrepresented their new contract. Unfortunately, he does not appear to have been too successful in either of these well-meaning ventures.

Once the miner's chieftain and the operators had settled the terms of their new agreement, conflict vanished, and they joined in a campaign to bamboozle the average citizen. Each had something to gain by making the boost seem as extravagant as possible. Mr. Lewis likes to make the rest of the labor movement jealous of the armloads of bacon he brings home to his men and

Although the effect of this paradox is clearly discernible in our occupation policies, the record to date is not on the whole a bad one. For the most part, the original goals of the occupation have been kept in sight. Despite many blunders, substantial progress has been made in most areas. However, the task of displacing the firmly entrenched way of life of old Japan is a gigantic one and has scarcely been begun. There is much to be said at this stage for placing this responsibility on the United Nations, for as long as the United States has, in effect, full power, our policies will inevitably reflect American imperialist interests. General MacArthur has expressed a desire to turn over the administration of the occupation to the U. N. If this is done before the American nationalistic impact becomes too pronounced, the high esteem in which MacArthur is held, both in this country and in Japan, may be confirmed by history. But most thoughtful observers will suspend judgement until it becomes apparent whether the seeds of democracy which have been sown are to be permitted to mature.

is not averse to putting phony labels on empty packages. The operators are not unduly shy about making a pretty profit out of a wage increase. Let us open some of these packages and see what they contain.

A little arithmetic shows how a 15-cents-an hour boost in the miner's pay became 44½ cents in the headlines. The miner will take home only $1.20 more a day, which, as President Truman pointed out, is in line with the wage increases that have been won in other basic industries. In addition to this he will get several benefits, none of which, however, appear in his pay envelope. He will work an hour less a day, his work week being reduced to the forty hours set for other workers last year. The company's contribution to his welfare and retirement fund will be boosted 5 cents a ton, or about 30 cents a day. On paper he will now also have thirty minutes for lunch, instead of the theoretically inhuman fifteen. The miner, however, has never eaten by the clock and will not do so now. He takes his lunch deep into the mine with him and nibbles at it whenever work is slack. He gets overheated digging coal and doesn't like long periods of damp, chilly idleness.

To make all this look expensive, the U. M. W. and the operators translated it into a straight-time hourly rate which has only theoretical relation to what is in the miners' pay envelopes. Under their old contract, the miners worked nine hours but were paid for the equivalent of ten, since overtime rates began after the seventh hour. Their basic daily wage of $11.85 divided by 10 gave them an hourly rate of $1.18½. The miners will now work eight hours for $13.05. To get their new rate, one should divide $13.05 by 8½ (since the eighth hour would customarily be at time and a half), which gives $1.53½, or an increase of 35 cents an hour.

OSGOOD NICHOLS, formerly on the editorial staff of Fortune, is at present writing a report on labor-management relations for the Twentieth Century Fund.

The U. M. W. and the operators, however, discovered they could make 35 cents look like 44½ cents without spending a penny. This magic was accomplished by agreeing to begin overtime rates after the eighth instead of the seventh hour in the new contract. By this simple device, they could now divide $13.05 by 8 instead of 8½ and publicize a rate of $1.63 an hour, or an increase of 44½ cents. No money changes hands in this mathematical shell game; yet the miners' theoretical hourly pay becomes higher. They cannot buy groceries with the addition, since they will take home only 15 cents more an hour in their pay envelopes, but it looks good on paper.

Now we come to the more important question of how much the new contract increases the cost of mining coal. The operator will pay the miner $1.20 more a day for one hour's less work. The amount this is going to cost him per ton depends on how much coal the miner produces in the shorter day. He averaged 5.90 tons per day in 1946, and his productivity over the previous decade increased at the rate of .13 tons a year. It is safe to conclude, therefore, that he was producing at the rate of 6 tons a day during the last months of the Krug-Lewis agreement. At the rate of $11.85 a day, this comes to $1.97½ a ton.

How many tons will he produce in the shorter day? Nine hours underground is too long for efficiency, and some operators privately say they expect their men to dig as much coal in eight hours. Conservative government economists estimate that the operators will get an average of 94 per cent of previous production, instead of the 89 per cent they would get if output was decreased in the same proportion as hours. Other factors besides lessening of fatigue go into this estimate, such as increased mechanization and an expected sharp drop in absenteeism.

Using this estimate, we get an average output per miner of 5.64 tons a day, for which he will be paid $13.05. This comes to $2.31 a ton, or an increase in cost of 33½ cents a ton. To this must be added the 5 cents per ton for the welfare fund, making a conservatively estimated total of 38½ cents.

The day after President Truman asked the coal and steel industries to wait and see how much their costs would increase before boosting their prices, George Humphrey, who with Benjamin Fairless of United States Steel made the original bargain with Lewis, announced that he had raised his prices an average of 75 cents a ton. If Mr. Humphrey were merely an average producer in the industry, this would represent a profit of something like 100 per cent on the wage increase. But Mr. Humphrey, as chairman of the board of Pittsburgh-Consolidation, the largest commercial coal company in the world, is one of the lowest-cost producers in the industry. It is anyone's guess what a price his stockholders are extracting for peace in coal. He justifies the increase in part by saying he must make the price umbrella big enough to cover the costs of his less efficient competitors. The role of Good Samaritan seems quite profitable.

What about steel prices? No one seems to know accurately how much coal it takes to make a ton of steel. Government figures show that it takes 2,656 pounds of coal, or about 1½ tons, to produce the coke needed for a ton of pig iron. In the process of making the coke, however, the steel companies get a lot of valuable by-products. This is probably more than offset by the coal they use around the mill for purposes other than making coke. A ton and a half of coal per ton of finished steel would seem to be a good workable guess.

United States Steel, which holds the price umbrella for its industry, gets its coal, as do most of its competitors, from its own coal mines. It will not be called upon, therefore, to pay for Mr. Humphrey's umbrella. Converting the increased cost of coal (38½ cents a ton) into steel costs, we get an increase of 57.8 cents a ton. The bill for United States Steel, of course, should be much lower than this because it has some of the most efficient mines in the country.

Barron's, the national business and financial weekly, predicts an increase in steel prices of $5 a ton. Last Tuesday, in Birmingham, Republic Steel and Sloss-Sheffield Steel and Iron announced that they had boosted their pig-iron prices $3.50 a ton. United States Steel is more cautious. On July 29 its Board of Directors will meet and issue their second quarterly report for 1947, which will probably show, despite the steel wage raise, that the corporation is getting along handsomely. Indications are that it will make its decision about a price increase at that meeting.

Steel has one of its best peace-time markets in history, and by hiding behind the propaganda about the cost of the coal contract it could probably get away with a raise of $1 to $2 a ton, or a profit on the bargain of between 70 and over 200 per cent. This would start another round of price increases throughout the economy.

Perhaps the corporation, which has a great opportunity to make friends and influence, for the better, the course of coming events, will conclude that the health of the economy offers a better guaranty of United States Steel's future than short-term profiteering. If it follows the President's suggestion and waits to see how much its coal costs mount, the country will not only get peace in coal—which is no small contribution—but also may escape having to pay too exorbitant a price for it.

Late Summer in the Parks

BY HORACE SUTTON

ONE of the cheapest but one of the most richly rewarding vacations available this summer is a visit to a national park. This flat statement will be enthusiastically supported, I know, by the 22,000,000 people who made the trek to one of the parks last year. In fact, the National Park Service expects an even larger number of visitors this year in the 170 areas under its supervision. Of these, twenty-seven are National Parks; the others are historical sites and monuments.

Most of the big wild parks are in the West, far from populous regions. The only ones in the East are Acadia in Maine, Shenandoah in Virginia, and the Great Smokies in Tennessee and North Carolina.

To most Americans, the thought of a visit to a national park conjures up a picture of Old Faithful, the fabulous geyser at Yellowstone Park. Old Faithful still spouts off faithfully every seventy minutes, the interval growing longer as the years pass. A thousand lesser geysers, weirdly beautiful hot springs, and an inspiring canyon are also to be seen in Yellowstone, oldest and largest of the national parks.

Established by Congress in 1872 "as a pleasuring ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people," Yellowstone's huge tract covers the northwest corner of Wyoming, and runs over into Idaho and Montana. Bear, elk, moose, deer, and buffalo roam its wild uplands. But there is no hunting. Visitors, however, may fish without a license, ride the trails, set up their tents in the camping grounds, or live comfortably in hotels and lodges. They are urged not to feed the bears, which the attendants say have only become a problem since they have been fed civilization's candy bars, cracker-jacks, and picnic leftovers.

The park is open for motorists from May 1 to October 15, and for travelers coming by rail from June 20 to September 11, when the hotels close. Rates at Yellowstone are as low as $5.50 a day for a double room without bath, European plan. Furnished cottages at the Mammoth Springs Hotel at the north entrance cost $4 to $5 a day without food. Lodge accommodations on the American plan can be had for $10 a day for two. Coffee shops serve moderate-priced meals—breakfasts from 30 cents and dinners for $1.25. The hotel will fry your fish at the rate of three for a quarter, four to six for 50 cents. If you eat a dollar's worth of trimmings, it will fry the fish for free. Hardy souls can rent a hundred oddments of camping equipment, from a stew pan for a nickel a day to a blanket for 25 cents a night. Split wood is a quarter a bundle. Drivers can be hired for $7 a day; mountain guides and cooks at similar rates.

A typical two-and-a-half-day bus tour, including eight meals and two nights' lodging, costs $42.50.

Yosemite National Park is 150 miles east of San Francisco and an easy drive from most points on the coast. It has been somewhat commercialized because it is so accessible, but it offers the striking natural beauty of the Yosemite Valley, a mile wide and eight miles long, and the spectacle of one of the highest free-leaping waterfalls in the world. The stream drops 1,430 feet, which, someone has taken the trouble to figure, is equal to nine Niagara Falls one on top of the other.

Used by the navy as a rest center until this year, Yosemite is again open to the public all the year round. A typical hotel is the Awahnee, on the north side of the valley, which houses 200 guests. It charges $14 a day for a double room and bath, with meals. Yosemite Lodge, a colony of redwood cabins which have baths and electricity, charges $3.50 a day per person. There are also some 700 tents for rent from June through August at $2 a day. Meals for tent dwellers run about $1. Tubs and showers in detached buildings can be enjoyed for a nominal fee. You can ride the floor of Yosemite Valley on a saddle horse for $5 a day. Saddle and pack animals, guides, cooks, and equipment can be hired for camping trips in the High Sierras.

Great Smoky Mountains National Park, midway between Knoxville and Ashville, lately has drawn the largest attendance of any of the government reservations. In general, the Western parks offer better accommodations, the Eastern ones being nearer to big cities, where motorists can stay. The main hotel center for the Smokies is Gatlinburg, Tennessee, on the north side of the park, where varying comforts at varying rates can be obtained.

The adjacent development of the TVA program has had a beneficial effect on the recreational facilities of the Great Smoky Park. Construction of the magnificent Fontana Dam created Fontana Lake, which stretches along nearly half the southern border of the reservation. The TVA also cooperated in the relocation of several roads important to the park.

Experience gained in the Western parks is helping the National Park Service to steer clear of commercialization in the Smokies, one of its newest ventures. It is trying to preserve the traditional culture of the Appalachians and the crafts of the mountain whites or hillbillies. Old smokehouses, corn cribs, and log cabins are being restored. Visitors can see Cherokee Indians, find some 1,200 species of flowering plants, view 200,000 acres of virgin forest, and, what is not unimportant, keep cool.

Del Vayo—Dilemma of the Left

DURING two weeks we have heard certain liberal voices, in various accents, denounce Stalin and the Russians for having split the world in two. For those who, since the end of the war and even before, have been maintaining that no possibility existed of getting along with Russia, Paris was the pay-off. Molotov's retreat to Moscow provided a final answer to the partisans of collaboration. As one of the more acute French commentators pointed out, this is a case in which tant pis should read tant mieux. The New York Times gave substance to this view by writing on July 6: "Had Russia elected to participate in the scheme it might have been difficult if not impossible for President Truman and Secretary Marshall to convince Congress that American funds were being invested wisely and in the national interest of the United States." (How ironical if, even with Russia out, Congress should refuse the funds!)

Well, let us assume the record is clear and final: the blame rests on Moscow. For those liberals referred to above, plus most conservatives, the problem ends there. But the left—and here I am not referring to the Communists, whose position is also fixed on other grounds—cannot simply quit at this point and go to sleep. The first thing the left must do is to analyze coolly in which kind of half-world it is going to move from now on. And, next, it must inquire whether a way can be found to put an end to this insane period of war without war.

The half of the world that now carries the label "Western bloc" is certainly not a region in which a genuine liberal or radical can—until the moment of shooting arrives—enjoy a pleasant holiday. That this is so is mainly the fault of the men in the State Department and the Foreign Office who shape the real policy of the Western bloc. With a little more imagination they could have made the political climate of the new Allied coalition more tolerable for those who, under the old one, fought for democracy. If they foresaw that one day the division now taking place was going to be unavoidable, they had no excuse, for example, for not finding a democratic solution for Greece and Spain.

All the stories about "international brigades" and a "red invasion" will not succeed in overshadowing the situation in Greece, which has become, not only for leftists but for ordinary decent persons, unbearable. In a cable from Athens the other day, Richard Mowrer summed it up in a few lines:

With the arrival in Athens of Dwight P. Griswold, United States administrator of aid to Greece, Washington embarks on a policy aimed at containing Communist pressure. That policy is being sabotaged even before it starts. The excesses of the rightist Greek government in arresting and deporting, without warrants or trial, Socialists, Liberals, and Democrats (as well as Communists) is making new converts for the Communist-dominated rebels now fighting in the mountains. For many Greeks, it is not a question of political preference but of choosing between the risk of arrest and deportation by a regime many of whose top officials collaborated with the Germans or of escaping to the insurgent-held mountains.

On Spain the Western bloc is going to find itself in September, at the General Assembly of the United Nations, in a nasty fix. The Spanish issue is going to come up and under greatly aggravated conditions. To begin with, the third great partner, France, will be found wholly out of agreement with the Anglo-American policy toward Franco. There is no possibility of normalizing relations between France and Spain while Franco is in power; this, even if no fighting breaks out in Spain. If an uprising should occur, as Lord Templewood has been steadily predicting, the tension within the Western bloc will become acute.

Greece and Spain may be the most sensitive and exposed nerves in the Western coalition, but they are not the only ones. Germany is a more serious element of disunity. Regarding Germany, there is the old division between the British, who underline the economic aspect of the problem, and the French, for whom security is the first consideration. There is the difference between the British Laborites, who remain faithful to the theory that only Socialist planning can resolve the problem of Germany, and the Americans, who favor free enterprise tempered with a minimum of security control. As the London Economist said in its issue of July 12, "an American plan to base European revival upon a German heavy industry built up as a cartel by private capital might well bring the Communist Party to power in France and in the Ruhr." The demand of the German parties for a full share in the Paris conference fortified the impression that in the new division of Europe Germany was going to be the chief beneficiary. However, if traditional American policy prevails, the actual German beneficiaries will not be the Ruhr miners but the industrial barons and the new—or old—Nazis.

And this leads to the essential point for the left: The leadership of the Western bloc is bound to tend more and more to the right, and current uncomfortable situations, as in the cases of Greece, Spain, and Germany, will multiply. On the other side, the Russians are not going to remain idle. They will exploit to the full all the political differences and contradictions of the Western bloc, at the same time building up in the East agrarian reform, nationalization, Socialist planning, and a broad program of trade and customs cooperation. The position of the Western left will become more and more difficult.

But there is a way out: an end to the situation that ought to have been the beginning. That way is through the United Nations. It has been the fault of all—East as well as West, left as well as right—to have reduced the United Nations in two years to a sort of wrangling Forum of the Air, instead of an instrument of peace. But it is the only place, outside the field of battle, where East and West can still meet.

[In a second article Mr. del Vayo will discuss the relationship of the U. N. to the Marshall plan.]

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

World Bank on Wall Street

THE first bond offering of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development proved a smash hit in Wall Street. Although the issue was a large one—$250,000,000—the demand was still larger, and investment houses were allotted only a fraction of the amounts called for by customers' orders. When dealings started on the Stock Exchange, bidding was lively for both the ten-year and twenty-five-year bonds, which opened at premiums of two and over three points respectively.

In setting up the issue, the bank's management took great pains to enlist the interest of security houses throughout the country. They put on a big publicity and educational campaign and, what is more important, offered commissions of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent—\$5 per \$1,000 bond—on the twenty-five-year issue and $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent on the ten-year issue. In recent corporate bond underwritings, commissions of $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent have been normal. In addition, the securities themselves were priced very attractively. The twenty-five-year bonds, which make up \$150,000,000 of the total, carry a 3 per cent coupon, and the \$100,000,000 of the shorter-term issue pay $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Both issues were offered at par. Such yields are well above the returns currently obtainable from first-class industrial bonds. So it is not surprising that insurance companies, savings banks, and other institutional investors, which do not always find it easy to secure suitable homes for their vast funds, were among the eager buyers of the new securities.

Since such investors must give safety precedence over yield, their willingness to buy World Bank bonds shows that they regard these issues as well protected. And so, indeed, they are, provided we can keep the world from an economic tailspin. In the first place, the total lending power of the bank is limited to the total of its subscribed capital and accumulated surplus. Subscribed capital currently amounts to just over $8,000,000,000, of which one-fifth has been paid up, 2 per cent in gold or United States dollars and the balance in the currencies of the forty-four member nations. All or part of the remainder of the capital may be called up if required to meet the bank's liabilities. Of course, the obligation of members to meet such capital calls or to repay loans made to them depends on the "faith and credit" of sovereign states and is therefore not legally enforceable. On the other hand, as the bond prospectus points out, each member government has "a direct interest in the performance by every other member government of its obligations to the bank." In addition, while the credit rating of some of the members is none too good, that of the nations subscribing more than two-thirds of the capital has never been questioned. The United States share alone is 34.23 per cent.

The reception given to the bond issue might seem to suggest that in fixing its terms the bank's managers were over-generous. But I do not think they can be criticized on this account. They were, it must be remembered, putting on the market a new and strange security and appealing for support to a notoriously conservative body of investors. In a deal of this sort, the margin between success and failure is often a narrow one, and they could not afford failure. On the contrary, they needed a resounding success to put the World Bank on the Wall Street map and smooth the way for future issues.

We may therefore congratulate the president of the bank, J. J. McCloy, and the group of banking executives he has recruited on a striking achievement. But we must ask them not to rest on their laurels. Now that they have proved their ability to augment their limited supply of dollars by raising capital in the American market, it is to be hoped they will put their dollars to work rather more rapidly than hitherto. In the year since the bank opened its doors, it has made only one loan, $250,000,000 to France, which had asked for, and needed, twice that amount. Many other member nations have put in requests for various amounts totaling more than $2,000,000,000. Some of these may be granted in the near future, but the bank is proceeding with the utmost caution.

In deciding which member countries are credit-worthy and which projects they put forward have a reasonable chance of being self-liquidating, the bank's managers face a difficult dilemma. They are only permitted to lend money when adequate private finance is not available: that rules out the best risks. On the other hand, they must operate in accordance with sound financial practice and thus deny assistance to many of the countries most in need of it. Moreover, the more the bank looks to American investors for lendable funds the more conservative it is likely to be. As Sylvia Porter, financial editor of the New York Post, said a few weeks ago, when predicting a good reception for the bond issue, "It's just because the World Bank isn't what it was supposed to be, that the issue will be such a success. It's just because its loan policy is now on the 'sound-business,' 'calculated-risks' basis that our giant investors are warming up."

However, "safety first" can prove a dangerous maxim in today's weakened economic world. It is no use deciding to sit only on the most solid chairs when the foundations of the house are cracking. With all Europe threatened with economic collapse, the distinction between countries which are good risks and those which are bad becomes academic. Unless steps are soon taken to underpin the whole structure, bankruptcy and revolution may be the Continent's common lot. As receiver, Mr. J. Stalin probably would not give much consideration to the World Bank's claims.

I am not suggesting that the World Bank could or should serve as Europe's deus ex machina. It has neither the resources nor the authority to undertake the kind of job envisaged by Secretary Marshall's proposals. But speedy action on some of the applications for reconstruction loans it has long been pondering would help to keep Europe breathing while broader plans are being ground through the slow mills of American democracy.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Man of Feeling

THE INNOCENT EYE. By Herbert Read. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

HERBERT READ has written poetry and critical prose. Following the advice of Coleridge, he tells us, he took "regular employment" in order to be a writer in his leisure hours. He is that phenomenon, more familiar in England than in this country, of the state functionary and man of letters in one. For many years he was an official in the British Treasury and for many years a curator of ceramics in the Victoria and Albert Museum. But he remained always, it is clear, primarily a man of letters, with a voracious interest in all the world's literature in all its genres. He remained throughout the littérateur who, partly as a result of his work in the museum, came to be a writer and to be known most widely as an effective critic of art and the arts. But it is clear from these pages that he had ambitions to be a novelist, though his novels have remained projects, and that his heart is with poetry, though his published poems have not been the chief source of his influence or reputation.

What we have here, then, is the intellectual autobiography, almost too intellectual for one who proclaims himself a romantic and a man of feeling. It is the story of the sources of his being of one for whom art is the center and actuality of life, and poetry the center and actuality of art. His book is largely the account of the steps in the development of a man who has such feelings and has come to such conclusions. It is the narrative of the innocent eye, innocent in the childhood before experience, simple again in the ardent discipline of achieved aesthetic insight.

There are several grounds on which this book, of uneven distinction, has claims to critical attention. Mr. Read is in the first place in some way an index to a period. In the twenties he was a close literary associate of a group which included the Sitwells, Siegfried Sassoon, T. S. Eliot, Ford Madox Ford, Richard Aldington. While he was still at the front in France during World War I, he was one of the anonymous editors of Arts and Letters, which might be described as a sort of predecessor of Horizon. It conveys vividly the climate of literary feeling in the England of twenty-five to thirty years ago.

Secondly, Mr. Read's autobiography has a special sociological claim to interest. Mr. Read's background, for all his fastidious cultivation, is not the familiar one of the typical English aesthete. He did not come from a well-to-do family or go to Eton and Oxford. He has not the public-school manner, which even the rebellious aesthetes have so often had as their stamp. He was born and spent the first nine years of his life on a farm, in a remote corner of Yorkshire. The most evocative and most convincing part of his memoir is that dealing with the house and garden, the moors and woods, the cycle of the seasons, the growing of things, the killing of animals by men and by one another, the vividness of country scenes as these were touched and seen and felt by the uncorrupted awareness of a sensitive child. Mr. Read, indeed, attributes to this early vividness of his farm experience his later sophisticated sense of the importance of "immediacy and contact in art and life."

Herbert Read's father died when the boy was only nine years old, and from there on he had another kind of experience not familiar in the history of the modern literary intellectual in England. He spent two years at an orphanage school.

He worked for several years as clerk in a savings bank in Leeds. Himself so poor that he could not afford tram fare, he walked miles through the slums and came to know the life of the very poor. Against his family's cautious advice he managed somehow to get to the university, the University of Leeds, which with its random electives and its large courses seems more like an American provincial university than like the cliché conception of Oxford. He served in World War I as an officer, despite his pacifist sentiments, and his accounts of "The Raid," previously printed as a book in England, and of "Retreat" constitute minor classics of the felt truth about war experience.

Throughout, this is the case history of a non-snob English intellectual whose background is nearer that of Priestley or Arnold Bennett than of Cyril Connolly or Desmond MacCarthy, and it is marked by an earnest, almost plodding industriousness in reading. Mr. Read seems to have read everything of importance in modern literature in all languages, although, again atypical, he seems to be rather sketchy on the classics and to have little Latin and less Greek.

There is one other erraticism or rather scantiness of reading which accounts for some of the lack of clarity of the author's leading ideas, namely, in philosophy. He had an early infatuation with Nietzsche and seems to have had a late one with Kierkegaard. There is little evidence of Plato, none of Aristotle or of the good, solid British empiricists. Mr. Read obviously sets great store by a few of his chief intellectual themes, though he is not careful to define his terms. He declares he is a romantic and an idealist and depends on the vague aura of those words to tell us what he means. But if he is not quite rigorous, he is, as perhaps a "romantic" should be, suggestive. I use the term in both a praising and depreciative sense. Mr. Read makes suggestions and yet they are mere adumbrations, not very clear and if intelligible not consistent with each other. His last chapter is called—how English men of letters love relatively obscure classical images!—The Adamantine Sickle. The sickle is reason. It is the same sickle "which Earth gave Cronos and with which he mutilated the Divine Father." "Such a weapon is reason, which alone can slay despair and lead us to an Ethiopian rock. But as we wield this weapon, we find that it deals not only death but life, and that new beings, the furies and the muses of our inspiration, gather round the carnage." But our experience, says Mr. Read, is full of contradictions. It is the function of art to reconcile these and it cannot do that until it passes beyond reason. "Only an art which rises above conscious reality, only a transcendent or super-real art is adequate."

I confess that at this point, which is at the close of the book, I am not sure I know what Mr. Read is talking about, or that he does. I am a little clearer when earlier he finds the creative act of art something that has some significance for the nature of ultimate reality itself, and I see some gleam of suggestion in his notion that there is perhaps more than analogy between the rhythms which make the patterns of art and the rhythms of life and of ultimate being. I can understand what Mr. Read means when he preaches as the goal of political life the life which is non-political, the nourishment of creative freedom. I can sympathize with him when he appeals to "living in accordance with nature," but not when he says, "The world I discover is contained within myself." I do not quite know, and have never known, what Mr. Read means by the "sense of glory," to which he appeals and which he somehow identifies with creation and freedom. Nor do I think he needs the term "anarchist" to describe the ideal of a society that would make freedom possible.

There is a curious admixture of references to Kierkegaard, surrealism, Bergson, Whitehead. Mr. Read promises in his closing paragraph to devote his "intellectual energy in the years that are left [to him]" to "elucidation" of what "super-real art" is. Meanwhile his book exhibits the virtues and limits of the not quite philosophical literary mind. Where he is most a man of letters, as when he is telling his own story, he is best. Mr. Read ought to be less—or considerably more—of a philosopher if he is going to plumb the great questions of the relations of art to morals and politics and metaphysics. As it is, he illustrates some of the more foggy qualities of what is generally suggested by the term "romantic," some of the baffling obscurities of the literary man out of his depth.

IRWIN EDMAN

The "Middle Ground"

THE BALKANS, FRONTIER OF TWO WORLDS. By William B. King and Frank O'Brien. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THIS book is the deposit of several years' reporting from various Balkan capitals by two correspondents for the Associated Press. The bulk of it summarizes the course of political events in Yugoslavia, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Turkey, and Greece during the past five or six years. The authors add occasional snippets of background information—larded with some misinformation—sketch leading political personalities, and make various observations on the world significance of recent Balkan developments.

The theme of the book is the disappearance of the "middle ground" between Russia and the United States in the Balkans. Both Russia and the United States, according to the authors, uphold a philosophy of society and government which is thought to be "good for everybody, everywhere." In this they see the seeds for a sort of religious struggle, which might even lead to eventual war. Trying to assess responsibility, King and O'Brien hold Russia's insistence that only Communist governments can be friendly governments to be the principal factor in smashing the Socialist parties of the Balkans and thus destroying the "middle ground."

The book is markedly uneven in workmanship and detail. The chapters on Rumania are the most enlightening and coherent, and Yugoslavia is well treated. At the other extreme, three paragraphs suffice for Albania, and the chapter devoted to that country is padded out with only vaguely relevant material. Greece, too, is described without understanding, very largely in terms of the personal ups and downs of the royal family.

The style is sometimes vivid and natural; but in other passages it becomes irritating or even ludicrous with inept metaphors or flippant generalizations.

The nature of their work for a wire service required the authors to live almost exclusively in the various Balkan capitals within a few minutes' reach of the telegraph. In consequence provincial life largely escapes their attention. Consideration of economic conditions is also practically absent from the book, save for an account of Russian financial manipulations of Rumanian oil and other resources. This omission inevitably prevents the reader from obtaining a sound understanding of the political events described.

Such criticism is perhaps unfair, for the authors hardly pretend to present a complete and balanced picture of Balkan society and government. The book does provide a summary of recent events, neither more nor less reliable than the reports which appear daily in our newspapers. As such it serves as a useful recapitulation and can well be used to refresh memories jaded by the complexities of Balkan events.

WILLIAM H. MCNEILL

The Christian Significance of KARL MARX

By ALEXANDER MILLER

Written primarily for Christians who want to understand Communism—whether they accept Marxist theory or not—this book insists that Communism is a momentous fact which Christians are bound to take into account. So the author does not set up a straw man in order to knock him down. He exposes the reader to the full impact of Marxism and contemporary criticism of Marxism, and lets him make up his own mind. This stimulating and disturbing book presents a challenge to all serious Christians.

$1.75 at all bookstores

MACMILLAN

The Films of a Nation

FROM CALIGARI TO HITLER. A

Psychological History of the German Film. By Siegfried Kracauer. Princeton University Press. $5.

THE thesis of this unusually interesting book is that the German films of the twenties were filled with premonitions of the German totalitarianism of the thirties: that Hitler arose as the resolution of psychological dilemmas which had been reflected in the German movies and which accounted for both their greatness and their decline. The films of the Weimar Republic, Dr. Kracauer argues, constitute a "unique monologue intérieur. They reveal developments in almost inaccessible layers of the German mind."

Dr. Kracauer illustrates his theme by a readable account of the evolution of the German film industry and of the creation of the masterpieces. He knows much of the story at first hand; and he has the advantage of direct testimony from other participants, particularly some fascinating material from Hans Janowitz on the background of "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari." "Caligari," of course, presented the terrible choice between tyranny and chaos in its most radical form; but this theme was almost obsessive with the film-makers of the classical period. Kracauer demonstrates convincingly its reappearance in "Dr. Mabuse," in "Waxworks," in "Nibelungen," in "The Last Laugh."

The period of slow decline after 1924 came about when inner conflict produced, not renewed questing, but stagnation and paralysis. Writers and directors sought to evade or to muffle the unanswerable questions. Gradually, in the last days of the republic, films displayed forebodings of totalitarianism, a subconscious dream becoming increasingly attractive as a substitute for the agonies of individual responsibility. Finally the fantasies which animated the films—and often contradicted their formal theses—came to full and bloody life, and Germany carried out what had been anticipated by its cinema from the beginning. "Self-appointed Caligaris hypnotized innumerable Caesars into murder. Raving Mabuses committed fantastic crimes with impunity, and mad Ivans devised unheard-of tortures."

The book's premise, of course, is that the films of a nation irresistibly disclose its dominant psychological dispositions. Films reflect the national mentality more directly, Dr. Kracauer would even argue, than any other form of artistic expression. They are collective products; hence the very process of creation tends to suppress individual peculiarities in favor of traits common to many people. Moreover, they must appeal to anonymous multitudes and so must conform to existing mass desires. Nor is the story content alone significant; the changes in technique, the nature of the imagery, the style of the editing are as revelatory as the metaphors and cadences of poetry.

This is an extraordinarily fruitful and stimulating approach. It is probably inevitable that a pioneering work like "From Caligari to Hitler" should have a number of overstatements and oversimplifications in applying the approach; but this should not deter anyone from reading the book. The main trouble, of course, is that Dr. Kracauer knows in advance which dreams panned out. Nazism provides him with convenient criteria for determining the "basic" film themes of the twenties; and one cannot avoid the impression that he is reading back from the actuality to the corresponding fantasy.

Thus, were the United States today under a fascist dictatorship, an acute Indonesian critic might point out how Hollywood's obsession with horror and violence revealed the inevitability of fascism: how the cult of the gangster foreshadowed the secret police, how the Boris Karloff films showed the frenzied flight from reason, how the psychiatric vogue disclosed the deep sickness in the American soul. Sunnier political developments, however, might reveal that Bing Crosby really embodied the "basic" American fantasy. Dr. Kracauer, in short, has oversystematized his interpretations and omitted the elements which should be fundamental in any psychological analysis—the element of ambiguity.

Still he has written a challenging book. And he has looked at the films themselves with a sensitive and discerning eye. Not the least part of the joy in reading "From Caligari to Hitler" lies in its evocation of vivid and happy memories long out of mind—the sardonic brilliance of "Die Dreigroschenoper," the tinkling charm of "Die Drei von der Tankstelle," the passionate good will of "Kameradschaft," the bitter sentimentality of "Der Blaue Engel," the neurotic intensities of "M." Sixty-four illustrations add substance to these memories.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

Streamlining Congress

A TWENTIETH-CENTURY CONGRESS. By Estes Kefauver and Jack Levin. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

THE long-delayed Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 was only a promising beginning in the streamlining of a horse-and-buggy Congress. Representative Kefauver and Dr. Levin now present in a simple, readable, and comprehensive fashion the necessary next steps.

Their catalogue of overdue reforms is a long one—the strengthening of party responsibility, the installation of electric voting, the elimination of the filibuster, better liaison with and supervision of executive agencies, scrapping of the seniority rule in committee assignments, a regular question-answer period for Cabinet members, reducing

"Undoubtedly the biggest bargain of an inflation year."

—N. Y. TIMES BOOK REVIEW

THE SHAPING OF THE AMERICAN TRADITION

By LOUIS M. HACKER

"If really we are to know the heritage which has been passed down to us—to know it intimately and dearly . . . it is imperative that such books be read from cover to cover. Not only will such reading prove singularly rewarding for its entertainment value, but it will also prove gratifyingly revealing." —Philadelphia Inquirer

1248 pages, 2 volumes, boxed, $7.50

At all bookstores

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

Publishers of THE COLUMBIA ENCYCLOPEDIA

the petty tasks of both Congress and its members; there are other concrete suggestions.

Congress and Congressmen suffer from too much work and too little time. And yet the solutions are relatively easy of accomplishment. At least 15 per cent of the meeting time of the House is consumed by roll calls which average about forty minutes each. Electrical voting, now practiced in eleven states, will eliminate this unnecessary drain of Congressional time and simultaneously end teller votes which allow Congressmen to vote in anonymity. Only stubborn inertia stands in the way.

Another 10 per cent of the five-hour daily sessions is used up in the relatively trivial bills for the District of Columbia. Home rule for the District will allow Congress to function as a national legislature. Representative Kefauver does not explain, however, that one reason for the refusal to allow District suffrage is fear of the Negro voters (28 per cent of the District population).

The average Congressman is similarly overburdened—but with non-legislative tasks. Eighty per cent of his time is spent in running errands for his constituents, interceding with executive agencies on their behalf. He has thus become a Washington representative rather than a member of Congress. Yet, these duties are important not only to insure his reelection but because without such help our immense and complex government will become a bureaucracy, inaccessible to the citizen.

An administrative assistant at $8,000 a year has recently been provided for each Senator, but the House has hesitated to authorize similar aides because of a fear of misunderstanding by voters back home. When the House, however, selects its employees by a merit system, no one will begrudge the added expense.

Congress suffers from an inferiority complex in dealing with the sprawling executive branch, a neurosis which engenders suspicion, fear, and often hatred. The authors' remedy, however, of a fortnightly two-hour question-and-answer period, each session being devoted to one agency, would allow each department head less than two hours a year. The English practice of a daily period for written questions addressed to any government official is more flexible and promises more informative and lively sessions. Thus interpellations could be held from 10 a.m. to noon, before the regular session began, with attendance voluntary. A veritable manual of procedure for determining what are fair questions already exists in the House of Commons practice.

Space does not permit further discussion of the book's many other suggestions, which deserve the widest circulation and study.

The authors' program for legislative reform should be pushed by all those concerned with strengthening democratic processes in America. Congress cannot hope to function in an atomic age unless its creaking machinery is modernized.

WILL MASLOW

"Into the Sun"

CONSIDER THE LILIES OF THE FIELD. By Erico Verissimo. Translated by Samuel Putnam. The Macmillan Company. $3.

WITHIN the last few years two Latin American novels which won fame in their own countries have appeared in translation in the United States. The first was "Bay of Silence," by Edward Mallea of Argentina. The second is "Consider the Lilies," by Erico Verissimo of Brazil. Both were written before the war by men of a similar age who had spent their youthful years in Europe. Both deal with characters and problems in their respective homelands and show traces of European influence in their techniques. For North American readers the books shed light not only on the pre-war state of major fiction in the Southern capitals but on the differences of attitude in Argentina and Brazil.

Verissimo's novel, which was issued first in Porto Alegre in 1938 and has just been published here in a vigorous if uneven translation by Samuel Putnam, went through eight Portuguese editions in the first two years, and is said to have reached the 100,000 mark—a record in Brazilian publishing. It was translated almost immediately into Spanish, and its appearance in English is late. It is a love story with sociological overtones. Its hero is a bright boy named Eugenio Fontes, son of a poor tailor and a patient mother, who grows up under the pressure and shame of poverty. He escapes from both by marrying one of those frigid heiresses with intellectual pretensions who seem to hold great fascination for Latin novelists.

Eugenio holds a degree in medicine, but his clinic is supported by his wealthy father-in-law, and his practice is a fashionable pretense. His marriage is outwardly brilliant, inwardly a sham. He makes a friend's wife his mistress as a means of consolation, and his own wife finds sadistic satisfaction in psychoanalytic dabbings. (The emphasis on intellectual pyrotechnics is marked in both books.) Suddenly a wise and saintly teacher to whom the young doctor had made love when they were both in school—and by whom he had had a child—sends for him on her death bed. The revulsion against false values which her death creates in him turns him back to his profession of medicine as a way of life. He breaks with wife, wealth, and mistress and sets about redeeming his soul by hard work among poor patients. The last sentence in the book, robbed of its classic implications in the English translation, bows to Ibsen and Echegaray with father and daughter going out "into the sun."

Eduardo Mallea's novel, reviewed in 1944 when the English version, much cut, appeared here, was also a love story, but of a different type, outwardly more sophisticated, inwardly more confused. The tale moved from Buenos Aires to Paris, Brussels, London, and by means of the misty stream-of-consciousness technique explored the hero's political attitudes as well as his spiritual longings. Very little happened outside the hero's mind, and what happened inside was more important in process than in result. Some saw in the author's passionate yearning for Argentinian self-assertion an incipient fascism, but that, too, was far from clear. From the artistic point of view the style pattern, lost in translation, was a more important achievement than the plot or the creation of character.

The Brazilian novel is hopeful, practical, constructive, sentimental. The Argentinian novel was confused, full of passion and frustration on a national as well as a personal plane. Indeed, the two attitudes and viewpoints seemed to merge, and therein lay the potential danger. It is, of course, not fair to compare the two books as typical of the prevailing states of mind in the two countries from which they come, and due allowance must be made for events since they were written. Nevertheless, it cannot be overlooked that Verissimo's underprivileged, stemming from mixed European stock, saw the then looming conflict clearly, whereas Mallea's jejune intellectuals had far more difficulty getting their proportions straight.

To North American eyes in 1947 both novels have, in spite of competence and technical tricks, a slightly old-fashioned air. Partly this is because they reflect attitudes popular before the war here as there, and now forgotten. Partly it is due to a time lag which shows itself in many fields. Verissimo's reformed climber who finds peace in ministering to the poor is blood brother to the heroes of sociological novels popular here before 1920. His builder who sacrifices all for a skyscraper might still exist in a burgeoning city which has not yet achieved one but is still hopeful. Sinclair Lewis would have understood him. In this novel Verissimo presents the lure and the danger of United States ways—a menacing pull which both Brazilians and Argentinians feel.

MILDRED ADAMS

Economic Warfare

THE HIDDEN WEAPON. By David L. Gordon and Royden Dangerfield. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

A VALUABLE and interesting account of the varied aspects of economic warfare in World War II written by two men who served successively as chief of the Blockade Division of the Foreign Economic Administration. It deals not only with methods of enforcing the long-distance blockade of the Axis powers, but also with such matters as preclusive buying of useful materials in neutral markets, the black lists, financial controls, and the "safe-haven program," the purpose of which was to thwart the Nazis' efforts to salt down their loot in neutral countries. The authors report with regret that this program met with a somewhat limited success.

Economic warfare had its exciting and glamorous moments, but for the most part it was a grinding job of research, statistics, and diplomacy. After Pearl Harbor the task of squeezing out the enemy's economic life became the joint responsibility of the United States and Britain. The authors give considerable space to the problems of collaboration between the two countries, most of which were successfully surmounted. The final chapters of the book provide a realistic evaluation of the effects of economic warfare and discuss briefly the possibility that the U. N. might use some of the same methods if it is ever called upon to enforce economic sanctions against an aggressor.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Life at the Metropole

OVER AT UNCLE JOE'S: MOSCOW AND ME. By Oriana Atkinson. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

AN ANGRY sea is tossing between Moscow and Washington these days, and is bringing many things to rest on the beaches of Park Avenue and the Kremlin Prospect.

You lean back and relax under a hot July sun and reach out your toes in the contentment of a good stretch only to touch something hard and flat. It may be the memoirs of Joseph Davies's chauffeur, who learned about Moscow from the NKVD lads whom he kept supplied with Amerikanski pappirosi. Or it may be a sharp new play by Konstantin Simonov, discovering in a rather naive way some of the things which the king of the muckrakers exposed in "The Brass Check" many years ago.

Frankly, in the state of the world today you can name your poison in Moscow or Washington and let your stomach be your guide—there is something on the shelf for all tastes.

With this warning let us have a quick look at a volume by the wife of the former New York Times correspondent in Moscow, Brooks Atkinson. It is seldom that a book can boast not only a title but a subtitle which is so rewarding.

When Oriana Atkinson titled her book "Over at Uncle Joe's" she was obviously thinking of a place where you could get a quick one. When she subtitled it "Moscow and me" she seems, despite the modest capitalization, to have been thinking primarily of "me."

There is a unique pleasure in this book for anyone who has ever had the horror of living in the Metropole Hotel. In Oriana Atkinson one feels certain that that strange nemesis of Russo-American good-will, Jack Margolis, finally met his master. Many correspondents have retired from the Moscow battleground muttering in their beards about the Metropole and Margolis, manager of the Metropole menagerie.

Not so Oriana. She retired from the Metropole with battle flags flying. No one who has fought the battle of the Metropole, which is always the first and frequently the last battle of the foreign correspondent in Moscow, can fail to pay tribute to the indomitable spirit of this correspondent's wife. She stayed in there pitching against the impossible plumbing, the ridiculous service, the incredible conveniences right up to the moment of leaving Moscow. There is no doubt that Oriana won the Moscow oak leaf—with clusters. And any fair-minded person would be quick to agree that Bella Markovna, the fourth-floor room manager, deserves an equally conspicuous honor. There may be those who would give the highest honor to Bella. But that—as relations go these days—is a matter of face between Russia and America. The fact—and it may be the most important fact exposed in this book—is that before the time came for Oriana to quit Moscow she and Bella had arrived at a decent understanding. Each knew the limitations of the other. What was more important, each had some kind of inkling as to the social mores which lay behind their disagreements.

Probably the most encouraging thing about "Over at Uncle Joe's" is not its breezy title or subtle but its basic evidence that an American woman and

"CENTURIES OF INTOLERANCE"

The documented record of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH & ANTI-SEMITISM. Should be read by everyone who wants to know the real sources of anti-Semitism, and the real reason for the continuance of this phenomenon despite the increase of education and enlightenment.

44 Pages of Documented Facts 25¢
— 5 copies for $1.00

Special quantity prices to organizations

AGORA PUBLISHING CO.

DEPT. 751NE

120 LIBERTY STREET NEW YORK 6, N. Y.

a Russian woman of completely disparate backgrounds can arrive at a working basis of understanding. There is a lesson here for hard-collared folks like George Marshall and Viacheslav Molotov.

HARRISON SALISBURY

Five Pieces by Rilke

FIVE PROSE PIECES. Translated by Carl Niemeyer from Volume Four of the "Gesammelte Werke" of Rainer Maria Rilke. The Cummington Press.

OF THESE prose pieces of Rainer Maria Rilke, the first is dated 1899, the last twenty years later; the other three are undated. No Rilke item is without interest, even those that derive from his silly side, which should be forgiven him, and forgotten, as soon as possible, but which instead endear him to the cults and lovers of the fancy-smancy. These five pieces testify, again, to a sensitivity which learned to outgrow the morbid, and a meditative insight which could make the pathetic fallacy look like the gospel truth. One of them is a sad little tale of a boy with a weak heart dying under the rigors of a gymnasium class in a military school; another a two- or three-page vignette about a man taking a walk with a dog;

the third, and the most interesting, an essay on dolls, of considerable symbolic power; the fourth, a description of the momentary intensification of a man's awareness of the world—"he had passed over to the other side of nature"; the fifth, an essay entitled Primal Sound, partly concerned with a physical experiment, partly with poetry in general, and how the poet should widen and fuse the various areas of sense perception.

The text is embellished, if that is the word, by several, too many, ugly and incongruous woodcuts by Wightman Williams. I do not think Rilke would have cared for these at all.

The Cummington Press has issued the collection. "Two hundred nineteen copies of this book," they say, "case-bound by the hand of Arno Werner, will be for sale 5 May, 1947, from the printers: 189 on Oxhead paper and in half-calf, at $8.15; and 27, hand-colored on Tunbridge paper in half-pigskin, at $16.20." Also, "From the woodblocks cut by Wightman Williams and types composed by Harry Duncan, 271 copies are by them printed and numbered as follows: 1 through 4, each with an original drawing tipped in, on Curfew paper, and vii through xxxvii on Tunbridge paper being colored by hand, 1 through 203 on Van Gelder Oxhead paper, and 204 through 234, in wrappers, on various papers."

Without wishing either to glut the market or to offend the readers of The Nation with vulgar compliments on their purchasing power, the reviewer hereby states that he will refuse no reasonable offer for copy number 228.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Food, Food, Everywhere

TOMORROW'S FOOD. By James Rorty and N. Philip Norman. Prentice-Hall. $3.50.

WHY in a land of plenty is there widespread malnutrition? Why in a world full of scientific knowledge regarding nutrition is there starvation? Why should millions of people be forced to subsist on the equivalent of 1,500 calories a day, or less, not to speak of inadequate variety and choice of food? These and other matters are discussed by Mr. Rorty and Dr. Norman in their book, which, though it is somewhat repetitious, is full of interesting material; and they come to the sensible conclusion that a good deal of poverty and malnutrition would disappear with more—much more—and wiser govern-

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
21st ST.
6th ST.
86th ST.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
23rd ST.

RKO NOW
"TERRIFIC MELODRAMA."—N. Y. Her. Trib.
Humphrey BOGART • Alexis SMITH
Barbara STANWYCK
'THE TWO MRS. CARROLLS'
From the Stage Play by MARTIN VALE
— and —
'HIGH CONQUEST'
Ann LEE • Warren DOUGLAS

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROC.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

"BRIGHT YARN . . . A DARDY."—N. Y. Times
Maureen O'HARA • John PAYNE
'Miracle on 34th Street'
with EDMUND GWENN
— and —
'BRASHER DOUBLOON'
George MONTGOMERY • Nancy GOULD
Based on Raymond CHANDLER'S 'High Window'

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLUMBIAN
B'way & 42 St.

MOTION PICTURES

DORE SCHARY presents
Robert YOUNG • Robert MITCHUM
Robert RYAN in

"Crossfire"

A RKO RADIO Picture
Produced by Adrian Scott • Directed by Edward Dmytryk

Screen Play by John Paxton

Scientifically Air-Conditioned

POPULAR PRICES RIVOLI Broadway at 49th Street

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."
—Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way. CH 4-4250
Even. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

BETTY HUTTON • JOHN LUND "THE PERILS OF PAULINE"

IN TECHNICOLOR
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE
IN PERSON

THE HOUR OF CHARM

ALL GIRL ORCHESTRA UNDER THE DIRECTION OF
PHIL SPITALNY

Featuring EVELYN and Her Magic Voice

The distinctive voice of JOANNE VIOLA & her 17 drums

55¢
TO 1 P.M.
(Tax. Incl.)
Mon. to Fri.
Inclusive

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

Say You Saw It Advertised in THE NATION!

ment control. They point to the TVA, the beacon directing all other efforts. They emphasize the remarkable fact that in England during the terrible war years the children were better fed, and therefore healthier, than during the years preceding World War II, because of control forced upon the government, which in turn sought the advice of nutritional experts—experts, not fakers.

But why must the authors in their eagerness to expose weaknesses also indulge in—as they appear to me—unwarranted attacks? What justification is there for criticizing the Food and Nutrition Board of the National Research Council, a body which within the limits of its authority did a magnificent job?

The authors condemn—and correctly, in my opinion—many of the claims made by the various food advertising fraternities, but to some extent they themselves are also at fault when they indorse views which are open to doubt. For example, the relation of cholesterol to hardening of the arteries and the connection between the amount of sugar consumed and the development of a diabetic condition are not the proved "facts" which they are made to appear in this book.

But there remains much to praise in "Tomorrow's Food," particularly those portions of it which emphasize such matters as unnecessary waste and misleading advertisements.

BENJAMIN HARROW

Briefer Comment

GUAM AND ITS PEOPLE. By Laura Thompson. Princeton University Press. $5.

THIS new and up-to-date edition of Miss Thompson's standard work on Guam, its history, culture, institutions, and current problems, is most timely. As readers of John Collier's recent article in The Nation will remember, the future of Guam now lies on the knees of Congress, which is called upon to decide whether its inhabitants are to be allowed self-government or are to remain under naval dictatorship. Let us hope that some members, at least, will read Miss Thompson's sober, detailed analysis of the fruits of naval rule. If they do they should have little difficulty in making up their minds on how to vote.

HENRY THE NAVIGATOR. By Elaine Sanceau. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

THE Infante D. Henrique of Portugal, who owes his well-known nickname to a nineteenth-century British biographer, straddled the gulf between the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. In the spirit of the first he crusaded against the Moors and wore a hair shirt; as a forerunner of the second he was the patron of astronomers and geographers, the promoter of explorations of the Atlantic islands and West Africa which paved the way for the discoveries of Vasco de Gama and Columbus. In this new account of his life and times, Miss Sanceau has mixed popularization and scholarship in acceptable proportions. But she should beware of a tendency to archness.

K. H.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

IT IS exceptional for Horowitz to play anything as simply—and I would say as well—as he does the Song Without Words Opus 62 No. 1, entitled "Sea Breezes," in his RCA Victor album of Mendelssohn's piano music (Set 1121; $3.85). Normally it is impossible for him to start a phrase without beginning to fuss with it, to twist it, to do everything with it but let it take its natural course and shape. He could say I am judging by what are only my personal ideas of how a musical phrase should be played; and he would be right, except that those ideas are not something I dreamed up by myself: I got them from hearing phrases played by a long succession of musicians; and today they are largely what I have learned from my more recent and, I think, more perceptive listening to the greatest musician of all. Again Horowitz could question the adequacy of my ears when I listened; but it is easy enough for him to ask Toscanini how he would have his violins play the theme of Mendelssohn's Variations Serieuses, or Variation 14: I am sure it would not be in the mannered, torturing style of Horowitz's playing of them, but with subtle inflection and easy, continuous flow.

Entirely apart from this is the extraordinary mastery of the piano which many people are excited by and confused into thinking mastery of the music. For them the set includes a performance of Horowitz's further pyrotechnical elaboration of a Liszt monstrosity—some variations on the Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. The piano is excellently reproduced; but some of the surfaces in my set are noisy, and the side with the march wavers badly in pitch.

RCA Victor also offers some of Virgil Thomson's music for the film "The Plough That Broke the Plains"—all of it impressive in the way it is made and sounds, and two sections, "Cattle" and "Speculation," fine pieces of music by themselves, but the rest, I think, without sufficient interest in its own operations to be heard without the sequences in the films. Stokowski's performance with the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra seems good and is beautifully reproduced (Set 1116; $2.85).

One accepts the orchestrations of Chopin's piano pieces with the ballet "Les Sylphides," but without it they seem to me pointless; and in the RCA Victor set (1119; $3.85) Fiedler's performances with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra are insensitively fast and not well reproduced—to say nothing of the insertion, between one statement of the A major Prelude at the end of side 3 and another at the beginning of side 5, of a piece that I have never heard and seen danced to in "Les Sylphides."

The remaining RCA Victor June release, Blitzstein's "The Airborne," I will discuss at a later time. Right now I prefer to report on the two recordings of Shostakovich's Ninth—one made for Victor by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony (Set 1134; $3.85), the other for Columbia by Kurtz with the New York Philharmonic (Set 688; $5). This is the work in which Shostakovich, with the war's end as his justification,

• NEW PARIS IMPORTS •

Color
Reproductions
SUMMER SPECIAL

20% reduction on all catalogue
prices

Limited time only.

UTRILLO
PICASSO
VLAMINC
VAN GOGH
GAUGUIN
DAUMIER
DEGAS, ETC.

$1.45 and up

Large selection of Art Books, Domestic and French

Tribune SUBWAY Gallery

100 W. 42 St., N. Y. C. (Sub. Arcade Downstairs)

ASK FOR CATALOGUE N

232 pp. 59 color and 653 other reproductions

permitted himself to be gay, and elicited semi-official frowns for music without the affirmative, constructive attitudes the Russians consider proper in an artist working in a socialist society, the seriousness they consider proper in war-ravaged Russia today. Thus was the work found wanting from the Russian point of view about art; and I would say it is worthless from our own point of view. Its gaiety—expressed in an idiom whose melodic and harmonic distortion is heavily sardonic and parodistic in effect—is the ostentatiously exaggerated smart-Alec grimacing and buffoonery characteristic of Shostakovich; and what, on the records, is a slow movement with a straining distorted lyricism is not a slow movement at all. A musician who has seen the score tells me that the direction Moderato for the second movement is implemented by the metronome-marking 208 for the quarter-note, which establishes a moderato waltz tempo; but Koussevitzky exercises the privilege he claims of disregarding the composer's wishes and takes the movement slowly at 138, and Kurtz takes it even more slowly at 88, requiring an additional side (the second additional side, with only an inch or so of recording, is made necessary by the superfluous repetition of the exposition of the first movement). The New York orchestra plays well, the Boston with its greater beauty and refinement of sonority which is recorded with more richness and luster.

On a Victor set a few months ago I misread the opus number of a Brahms sonata for viola or clarinet and piano as 120 No. 2 instead of 120 No. 1; and in my review, therefore, I correlated my evaluation of the Victor performance and recording that I heard now with my evaluation of the performance and recording in the Columbia set of Opus 120 No. 2 that I had heard a year or so before (and that I no longer had in my possession to rehear). My failure to realize that I was listening to a different work this time—which a reader rightly has called me to account for—was due to the fact that, disliking the two works whenever I hear them, I have heard them only a very few times at intervals of many years and haven't retained them in my mind; and also to the fact that with all their differences in themes and structure they are similar in their Brahmsian thought, style, and mannerisms, so that listening to one I would hear things that I might think I had heard in the other a year before.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Protest for Isabelita

Dear Sirs: The following letter taken from the May 31 edition of the New Statesman and Nation may be of interest to your readers, on the heels of my piece, Isabelita Has Lost Her Reason, in your May 24 issue. Of the children about whom I wrote, these are the three who had been condemned to death,

Sir:—I am sure your readers will be interested to know that on May 6 last a telegram of protest against the proposed judicial murder of José Luis Cano, Juan Arranz Lafont, and Germán Sanz Esteban, was sent to the Spanish ambassador in London. The protest was signed by twenty-six members of Parliament.

(Signed) John Platts Mills,
House of Commons

Paris, June 14

KAY BOYLE

Illustrating Abrams

Dear Sirs: When a man pleads that he is the victim of injustice and proceeds to inflict injustice on his neighbor, his complaint is apt to be disregarded. The real-estate groups have spent many thousands of dollars in the past few years to persuade Congress and the American people that they are the victims of wrongful rent-control laws and, in this locality, that they are staggering under tax burdens which are a grossly inequitable distribution of liability. There is some truth in their claims, however much the language of martyrdom lessens the credibility of their case. Yet when a man like Harry Carskadon, head of one of the largest real-estate firms on the Monterey Peninsula, voices flagrantly undemocratic notions in the sacred interests of real estate, we begin to wonder how sinister a pressure group can be.

"Any attempt to move Negroes or Chinese into areas occupied by the white race will result in a serious depreciation of property values," according to Oberleutnant Carskadon. "Such social equalization is undesirable." This from an American, and a prominent one, is astounding. The depreciation he refers to will occur in the property we all own—democracy. And when, we may ask, are Negroes or Chinese not our equals in a democratic nation? Mr. Carskadon does not evidently mean the community when he refers to society—he means the fashionable world of his own choosing, where a black tie and a bridge score are the criteria of social worth. "The only solution to the housing problem," he went on to say, "is segregation." Ghettos, perhaps, Mr. Carskadon? Or concentration camps? Or would Negroes in the vicinity constitute un-American activity?

Obviously, the organized real-estate groups as a whole cannot take the blame for Carskadon's utterances, however heartily many property-owners may secretly agree with him. Land does depreciate in value when colored people own it, for some strange reason. Perhaps as neighbors they constitute too much of a challenge to our beliefs in the Constitution we honor—and have fought for, on occasion—for us to remain in any comfort. So we move out, and democracy with us. But then real-estate men are not preachers and could hardly be expected to plead for the tolerance which might keep up the values of property in a democratic way. Buchenwald and Belsen are not so far from San Mateo.

MICHAEL DEMAREST

San Francisco, July 15

Preserving the Bloodstream

Dear Sirs: Relative to your editorial Pass the Stratton Bill (issue of June 7), the movement against it all over the country is just as definite as the propaganda in its favor to which you refer. [Extract from the editorial in question: "There is not a single argument that can decently be brought to bear against the bill—and the chairman of the House judiciary subcommittee has already discovered, to his annoyance, 'a very definite propaganda movement from all over the country' in its favor."—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Our immigration laws were passed to preserve the then present bloodstream of the country and that is the balance we insist be kept—we need the skills of all peoples. Therefore the German quota must be filled by German people—not merely people born in Germany or there as D. P.'s.

America has always taken care of the needy and suffering throughout the world, and heaven knows we are doing it now in a wholesale manner; but we do not want, nor will we have, our country swamped with—for want of a better name—refugees.

ANNETTE V. MARSHALL

Otsego, Michigan, July 13

Saying It Better

Dear Sirs: J. M. Martinez of Miami reads an article in The Nation by Jacques Maritain and concludes that you are exhibiting "signs of decadence and senility." (Worse yet, he writes you to tell you so.) As I make him out, Mr. Martinez is unnerved by (a) the appearance of a Roman Catholic spokesman in your columns, and (b) the point of view that gives man's faith in God a very general precedence over man's faith in himself.

As to the first, it should be noted that M. Maritain is not only a Roman Catholic but also a theologian: the combination is as formidable, in a way, as that of the Marxist who has actually read Marx. Further, there are even more doctrinal extensions of Roman Catholicism than there are of Marxism—a fact somewhat obscured because Roman Catholics sustain only one Pope whereas Marxists sustain several, all infallible, all mutually exclusive, and all wielding truncheons of one sort or another. Aside from Spain and perhaps Argentina, Roman churchmen carry no truncheons so far as I know (I am not a Roman Catholic), figurative truncheons or any other kind. Yet it is quite as awkward an impropriety to lump them all together as it is to do likewise with Marxists. The comments one might apply to a Stalinist are not applicable to a Trotskyist; similarly, the comments one might apply to a Thomist are not applicable to an Augustinian.

And even as a Thomistic theologian M. Maritain is a very special case. He is admired by numerous Protestant theologians who admire no other Roman Catholic, he is admired by numerous Roman Catholics who admire no other rationalist, and he is admired by numerous rationalists who admire no other theologian. I daresay he is the best possible choice The Nation's editors could have made from the Roman Catholic phalanx. To align M. Maritain with the reactionary elements of Mother Church, as Mr. Martinez does, is to betray a somewhat primitive understanding of modern Christianity. For additional information Mr. Martinez is respectfully referred, among M. Maritain's published works, to "True Humanism" and "Religion in the Modern World."

It is easy enough to sympathize with

Crossword Puzzle No. 221

By MR. X.

ACROSS

- 1 Dimnet (the good abbé) can bow gracefully out of predicaments
- 4 It's detrimental to have led off with a stern pedant
- 10 Tea for two makes rhyme with reason
- 11 Cede tax was involved when forced to pay
- 12 GI is quick to get in a drink
- 13 French riposte
- 14 All the rail is on the track
- 15 Happening to die out at eventide
- 17 Conducted a systematic search for Dr. X. at the Pole
- 21 The el came in to vie for business when it was finished
- 23 'E returned to the fink, offering a cut
- 26 Trocadero performer rode out for an agent
- 28 I slip in short weight with acumen
- 29 Horse play on the beach
- 30 There's method in the madness of attics, see?
- 31 Lad rang with a rosy wreath
- 32 Seer returns about a veil and redresses
- 33 Make an entry in a paper

DOWN

- 1 A philosopher reacts so to questions.
- 2 I turn in in a regular route
- 3 Spills the beans and pules
- 5 Wake up! It is later than you think

- 6 Good for bread and wine
- 7 Explosive message by night rate
- 8 There's something odd in a baby's walk
- 9 Team sped in a panic
- 16 Money is given at the end
- 18 Ascendancy can be achieved, e.g., with a stripe
- 19 Heart of the British Navy
- 20 Washington: The ----- of his country—the founder of liberty, the friend of man . . .
- 22 Anything of vision in the Capitol?
- 24 Make it a sole affair
- 25 Sailing ship in the stream
- 27 The good part of salaries after you earn your salt
- 28 Sweat to change your waist
- 29 Red hot poker

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 220

ACROSS:—1 STRAW HAT; 6 RASH; 10 DONGA; 11 LAC; 12 GLOVE; 13 CATLAP; 16 CUCKOO; 17 TRUMPET; 18 MOLE; 20 ABBE; 22 ISOLATE; 23 NAME; 24 ENVY; 25 DISTURB; 27 FLAVIA; 29 YONDER; 31 LIKER; 33 EVA; 36 NUTTY; 37 SWIM; 38 FLATTERY.

DOWN:—2 TENET; 3 ARARAT; 4 HULK; 5 TICK; 8 RAGOUT; 7 SHOCK; 8 ODIC; 9 RECOVERY; 14 PRUSSIA; 15 EMULATE; 16 CENTURY; 18 MANIFOLD; 19 LAM; 21 BUN; 25 DIGRAM; 26 BONNET; 28 ASKEW; 30 DETER; 31 RAYS; 32 BEEF; 33 LAVA.

the second of Mr. Martinez's strictures, if not with the conclusion drawn from it. He writes: "Murder, hatred, poverty, exploitation, hunger, and injustice—that is what millions and millions of people who had plenty of faith in God have obtained for thousands of years." This has been said better, curiously enough, by professing Christians. Some months ago, for instance, the Reverend J. D. Townsend of the Providence (Rhode Island, that is) Methodist Tabernacle developed the same theme with a scourging bitterness in Zion's Herald, a Methodist weekly printed in Boston. Here is a memorable line from that clergyman's testimony: "The story of Christianity is an almost unbroken chronicle of warfare." And just recently the executive committee of the General Conference of the Seventh Day Adventist Church (take a breath, more coming) addressed a remarkable document to the Commission on Human Rights of the U. N. Economic and Social Council. It is an eloquent plea for an internationally mandated religious freedom, for the principle of religion unharnessed to the state or to the civil code—in short, for the "free church" institutions (I am not of that persuasion either, by the way). Elaborating on Dr. Townsend's theme, this document itemizes precisely ten great wars in which an "established" or state religion played either a direct or a tributary role. Last item: the Russian Revolution (Greek Orthodox Church).

There are any number of ways to assess this melancholy material, and all of them take more elbow-room than The Nation can make available to its kibitzers. But I might mention one way that may interest Mr. Martinez, soliciting merely his attention, not his concurrence, The Nation's contributing editor, Reinhold Niebuhr of Union Theological Seminary, is one of a group of contemporary theologians preoccupied with a channel of thought sometimes called "neo-orthodoxy," which lays much stress on man's depravity. ("We are dead in trespasses and sin," said St. Paul.) The doctrine of total depravity is considerably at variance with Mr. Martinez's "faith in himself and faith in man," but it is perhaps somewhat more useful in explaining man's history. As a matter of fact, it brings us right up to the atom bomb, bacteriological warfare, and that other weapon so horrendous that it remains the War Department's peace-time secret.

MAYNARD KNISKERN

Springfield, Ohio, July 11

BUY CIGARS WITHOUT MONEY

Box of 50 "Impressive" cigars, clear havanna, blunts, long filler best smoke yet, pay $8.00 after you smoke the cigars and are satisfied. If not satisfied after smoking a few, send back remainder and pay nothing.

Order today from
ACE MAIL ORDER CO.
East Orange 1, N. J.

HOME BUILDING INFORMATION

On your specific problems by qualified designer, builder and engineer, regarding PLAN, DESIGN, STRUCTURE, MATERIALS, COSTS, HEATING, AIR CONDITIONING, Etc. Individual, detailed and unbiased answer to any single question. $2. Check, send us money order to:

TECTON, P.O. Box 116
Station F, Milwaukee 9, Wis.

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. H-2
598 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

MILLIONS OF USED, RARE and out-of-print books stocked in 15 cities. Mention interests if catalogues are wanted. TAAB, 529 S. Melville St., Phila. 43.

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Available under GI Bill of Rights. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20, N. Y.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order, ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

CURRIES

HOW TO MAKE GOOD CURRIES: Your request with a 3¢ stamp will bring you our Recipe Booklet of precise Indian recipes for making curries of chicken, lamb, shrimp and vegetables. Learn the simple principles of using this condiment; it changes ordinary foods into new and delightful dishes.

JAVA-INDIA CONDIMENT CO.

IMPORTERS

442 Hudson Street New York 14, N. Y.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocation, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

SITUATION WANTED (MALE)

Voluntary Nicaraguan exile, 38, unmarried, former Professor of Law and Spanish, desires position. Export paper experience; typist; Spanish translator. Excellent references. Box 1724, c/o The Nation.

• Say you saw it advertised
in The NATION!
• To place an ad call BA 7-1066 •

RESORTS

1½ Hours to Country Charm and Seclusion

White Gates

WAPPINGERS FALLS, NEW YORK

Sports, Recordings, Library

Our Cuisine—Our Special Pride

Summer Rates: $45.00 to $55.00 weekly
2-day weekend $18.00

Stag Cottage $35.00 weekly

Telephone Wappingers Falls 469

PLUM POINT
Vacation Fun a year round
on the majestic Hudson

- seasonal sports
- golf and tennis
- gay informality

65 MILES FROM NYC • NEW WINDSOR, NY • NEWBURGH 4270

Yours for Vacation Enjoyment

HILLTOP LODGE

On beautiful Sylvan Lake

HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

Ac miles from N. Y. C. • N. B. Station, Pawling, N. Y.

Every conceivable Sport and Recreation

• with intimate, congenial people
Many improved features for the new season!

Open from May thru October

Under direction of:
PAUL WOLFSON &
SOL ROTHAUER

New York Office:
105 NASSAU ST.
Cortlandt 7-3958

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge

Ridgefield, Conn. • Phone 820
A MODERN RESORT
OF DISTINCTION
Magnificent lake. All water sports and outdoor activities. Interesting and excellent cuisine.
New Low Rates

CAMP AMNASQUAM
Gloucester, Mass.
Abram Resnick
Director

This Adult Camp...

Sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports.

Write for booklet and rates

CHILDREN'S CAMP

WALTELL HOUSE ON FRANKEL FARM

MT. BETHEL, PA.

Bangor 6273

VACATION FOR ALL THE FAMILY

Modern farm hotel combined with progressive children's camp, 7½ miles from New York. All rooms with private bath. Meat, poultry, dairy products and vegetables from the farm.
Rates: — Adults $11 Week — Children $50 Week
N. Y.: Ella Frankel, 241 East 18th St. LE 2-5864

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, New York. Farms in the Mass.-New York Berkshires. Also consulting broker for organizations.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515 M.

FOR SALE

SUMMER BUNGALOW in cooperative colony near Peekskill. 2 large rooms, bath, porch; electric refrigerator, stove, water heater. Reasonably priced. Immediate possession. Call evenings, BEekman 3-3692.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 2, 1947

NUMBER 5

The Shape of Things

WORKING OUR PASSAGE TO THE NEW WORLD roughly charted by the Paris Economic Conference is likely to prove more complicated than some of America's foreign-policy experts anticipated. The members of the Cooperation Committee had scarcely taken their seats, when the British and French opened fire on the American proposals for Germany. The Labor government fears that Washington's intention is to convert the Western zone into a kind of gigantic American trust. French Ambassador Bonnet spent all of last week trying to convince the State Department that nothing "should be done in Germany at the expense of the security of France and its other neighbors." In the face of this preliminary skirmish within the Western bloc, Washington has yielded ground slightly and proposed two new conferences, one between the United States and Britain on coal and the Ruhr, the other between these two countries and France at which the whole problem of German industry will be reviewed. Unfortunately, Britain, too, has retreated. By yielding to Washington's insistence upon a separate conference on coal, London will find itself under intense pressure to abandon the Socialist program in the British zone; and if a breach is opened in Labor's nationalization plan, the British government is likely to see its work of the past two years wiped out. It is even more difficult for the French to accept the American plan for German recovery. Should M. Bidault yield on the crucial issue of the Ruhr, the French Communists will have a powerful weapon in the October municipal elections. Belated realization of this fact in Washington has held up the plan, but Secretary Marshall should be wary of attributing French opposition to Communist pressure. That pressure is dangerous precisely because the fear of revived German industrial power is universal in France.

✱

THE TRAGIC FATE OF EXODUS 1947 IS WORTH studying for the light it throws on the story of Jewish Palestine itself in this year of wrath. The old ship, crowded with 4,500 refugees, was rammed by British destroyers and boarded by fifty sailors who were fiercely resisted by passengers and crew. The attack was made outside territorial waters. Three Jews were killed, including an American, William Bernstein of Los Angeles. The Exodus 1947 arrived in Haifa under its own power, and its exhausted and battered company were quickly shunted onto vessels usually used to ferry immigrants to Cyprus. This time, the vessels headed not for Cyprus but for France, the country from which the Exodus 1947 had set sail. Immediately this became known in Palestine, acts of terror multiplied and tension became explosive. The Jewish Agency attacked the government angrily for the brutality of its action. The government blamed those who advised the immigrants to resist and imposed a dusk-to-dawn house arrest of 90,000 Jerusalem Jews. Several Zionist groups in the United States denounced the British and demanded that the State Department act. The statement of the Zionist Emergency Council made a special point of Britain's violation of freedom of the seas. The State Department took no measures. Here in one episode we find compressed the chief ingredients of Palestine's tragedy: the fierce determination of Europe's Jews to fight their way, if necessary, to the promised homeland; British determination to turn back the stream of immigration even by violence and illegality when other means fail and to force the European nations to check the stream at its various sources; the growing reluctance of our own government to bring pressure on Britain, in spite of strong public feeling. By good luck, two members of the United Nations Committee on Palestine were on hand in Haifa to witness the incident. It is to be hoped that they carried its grim lesson with them to Geneva as evidence of the bitter dialectics of repression and terror that now rule Palestine. They should have the story of Exodus 1947 in mind as they compile their report.

✱

IF REASON RULED INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS, the United Nations Balkan dispute would have been settled long ago. Since power has replaced reason, the row goes on, endlessly, with Russia joining its Balkan satellites in rejecting the whole plan of a border commission and the United States fiercely denouncing Greece's neighbors as a "menace to the peace." Several delegates from smaller or more disinterested states, notably Dr. Alfonso Lopez of Colombia, have been pleading for a decision aimed at promoting good relations rather than fixing blame for past offenses. Without challenging the findings of the U.N. commission

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	113
Freud Is Unfair . . .	115
Congress, Late and Lamentable	115
Hiroshima Deathday	116

ARTICLES

Warning All Scientists by Leonard Engel	117
Our Blunder in Korea by Roger N. Baldwin	119
Will Interracial Housing Work? by Charles Abrams	122
Hornets' Nest in Indonesia by Charles Wolf, Jr.	124
Cartoon: The Seventeenth Guest by Ezekiel Schloss	125
Everybody's Business: Congress Sugar Daddies by Keith Hutchison	126

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Realism Is Not Enough by John K. Fairbank	127
"Candomblé" by Virginia Mishnun	128
Visions, with Trimmings by Albert Guérard	128
The Romantic Poet by H. P. Lazarus	129
Films by James Agee	129
Records by B. H. Haggin	130

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 222 by Mr. X	132
--	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor: J. King Gordon
Literary Editor: Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch
Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside
Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting
Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

against the three border states, they have urged in the Security Council a solution which would remove the immediate causes of friction on both sides of the Greek frontier, and provide protection equally for all parties to the dispute. These efforts have foundered on the rock of Russian intransigence. Whether they might have succeeded if the American delegate had adopted a less violent and partisan attitude, no one will ever know. But his language certainly ended any chance of persuading the Slav states that a border commission might perform a job of unbiased observation or conciliation. Gromyko has attacked the American proposal on legal grounds as a violation of the Charter, and the debate has assumed the nature of a filibuster. We believe it will end in a Russian veto and a submission of the question to the Assembly. Meanwhile, the fighting in Greece goes on and assumes more and more the character of a general civil war with each side backed, physically and politically, by one of two hostile Great Powers.

✱

THE ASSASSINATION OF U AUNG SAN AND most of his colleagues in the Burmese interim government came as Burma was taking its last steps toward complete independence. On June 16, the Constituent Assembly had proclaimed a sovereign, independent republic; in October, the British government will introduce legislation in the House of Commons providing for the formal separation of Burma from the British Commonwealth. Thus Burma will be the first nation to follow the United States in winning complete independence from Britain. It is tragic that so historic a change should be marred by an outbreak of political murder. But the country is in an extremely disturbed condition and may well suffer from more violence before achieving stability. In the elections for the Constituent Assembly, Aung San's Anti-Fascist Peoples' Freedom League, which is nationalist and Socialist, captured almost all the seats. It was too overwhelming a victory to be healthy, for, while the league is undoubtedly supported by the majority of Burmese, there are other political groups which cannot be ignored. Outstanding among these are the Communist Party, which practically controls the province of Arakan, and the ultra-nationalist Myochit Party headed by U Saw, former premier. Immediately after the assassination, there were suggestions of Communist complicity, but no supporting evidence has appeared. On the other hand, U Saw and a number of his followers have been arrested and a large arms cache uncovered at his residence. Such a find, however, is no proof of guilt; unfortunately, all the Burmese parties maintain private armies. That is one of the enormous difficulties faced by the new government. Fortunately, the young leaders of the Peoples' League have brains, courage, and self-confidence. They will need all these qualities in establishing their newly won independence on a firm basis.

THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS—which might be more accurately described as the House Committee on False Economies—has been given an object lesson on the results of its policies. Last month, the Taber group eliminated all Interior Department funds for fire control in Alaska, "it being the opinion of this committee that such fire protection is not justified." The ink of this prophetic language was barely dry before one of the most devastating fires in the Territory's history began to gut 500,000 acres of valuable timber on the Kenai Peninsula. Without funds, the fire-control system could send no organized force to combat the blaze. The fire still burns, and millions of dollars of tree and forage have been reduced to embers on the altar of Congressional "economy."

Freud Is Unfair...

THE quarrel between Monsignor Sheen and the psychoanalysts reminds us of a jurisdictional dispute between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O., with Monsignor Sheen in the role, say, of William Hutcheson of the Carpenters Union. It all began when Monsignor Sheen delivered a sermon at St. Patrick's Cathedral in March on Psychoanalysis and Confession. According to the report of the sermon in the New York Times, Monsignor Sheen attacked psychoanalysis in general and what he called Freudian psychoanalysis in particular. He said it was a form of escapism that produced "morbidly and disintegration." In confession, on the contrary, "there is no morbidity. You don't look so much on your sins as you look upon your Savior." Whereas psychoanalysis gives no norms or standards, "confession gives you the standard of Christ, the perfect personality." It was a rather good sales talk, except that the Monsignor went on, in what seems to us a rather morbid vein, to call transference, one of the processes used in psychoanalysis, "the transfer of affection to the analyst," and said that it "is only used when a patient is a young and very beautiful woman"—which reminds us of nothing so much as the vulgar charge of anti-Catholic bigots that there is sometimes a "transfer of affection" in the confessional. Sheen added that Freudian psychoanalysis is based on "materialism, hedonism, infantilism, and eroticism."

A number of Catholic psychiatrists took exception to Monsignor Sheen's fundamentalist remarks. And one of them, Dr. Frank Curran, finally resigned as chief psychiatrist at St. Vincent's Hospital because the Archdiocese of New York had not disowned Sheen's attack on a science which is extensively used in Catholic institutions. (Since his resignation, the Archdiocese has explained archly that it has no jurisdiction over Monsignor Sheen, who hails from the Diocese of Peoria, Illinois.) Meanwhile, psychoanalysts, Catholic and non-Catholic, among them Dr. Lawrence S. Kubie, had offered a point-by-point rebuttal of Sheen's attack and asked for a clearer statement of his views—but in vain.

In the middle of June, Monsignor Sheen told Albert Deutsch of PM, in a remarkable interview, that the newspapers had misquoted him, but that he hadn't bothered to send in corrections because he never read the newspapers! Finally, however, he condescended to write a letter to the Times which was printed on July 21. In this letter, he said that the Times had misquoted his sermon and that he had not attacked psychiatry or psychoanalysis in general, but only "Freudian psychoanalysis." He even remembered, in July, that the first paragraph of his sermon in March, which he quoted, had made this specifically clear. This is noteworthy, because when Dr. Kubie had asked for a copy of the sermon two days after its delivery, he was told that "There are never any written copies made of any of my sermons." As Dr. Kubie remarked, it shows a miraculous memory. Having thus backed up and filled in, the prelate of Peoria tried to obscure the whole maneuver by a burst of irrelevant humor.

Obviously, Monsignor Hutcheson—we mean Sheen—is opposed to the psychoanalytical method because it competes, in his view, with the confessional, a tool which that venerable craft union, the Catholic Church, discovered and patented many years ago.

Congress, Late and Lamentable

IT IS difficult to find any field of legislative activity in which the record of the first session of the Eightieth Congress was not dreadful. It poisoned whatever it touched, and what it did not touch, it murdered by that very negligence.

Setting aside, for the moment, the question of what social aims and legislative goals are desirable, and considering only the efficiency of Congress in achieving the goals which it set for itself, the conclusion is the same. The G. O. P. leadership announced its three-point program for this session to be labor legislation, budget reduction, and tax cuts. On the first, it wrote a bill which is self-defeating, whatever the merits or demerits of its stated or hidden objectives. The Taft-Hartley act is administratively unworkable. As for budget reduction, the sky will be the limit on Republican claims, but only those legislators who are shamelessly mendacious will try to argue that they accomplished a curtailment of as much as $3 billion below Mr. Truman's request. Actually, when a whole host of phoney reductions are washed out, the true reduction will be between $1½ and $2 billions—a ludicrous figure compared to the House's noisy promise of a $6 billion cut and the Senate's self-righteous goal of $4½ billions. Such reductions as there were, it may be noted, were precisely in those federal activities where cuts were most damaging to useful government. On tax reduction, the claim will be made that Mr. Truman is the villain responsible for blighting the G. O. P. promise. The truth is that it would be hard to conceive of any plan for tax reduction as grossly inequitable, uneconomic, and downright deceitful as the twice-proposed monstrosity which the President vetoed. Much as he might have objected to tax reduction at this time, he probably would not have vetoed an honest bill.

The Eightieth Congress's sins of omission are entirely too many to be catalogued here. They reflect a hell-for-leather drive backwards, toward a normalcy which Warren G. Harding himself could scarcely have stomached. The minimum wage was left at 40 cents an hour; social-security coverage was not expanded; the housing bill was left rotting on the vine; so also was legislation for federal aid to education, a new department for health and welfare, river-valley development, health insurance, and F. E. P. C.

Whenever the Congress did put its finger into domestic-welfare subjects, it traced the curve of reaction. On the pretext of correcting portal-to-portal inequities, already a dead issue by court decision, the Congress ravished both the provisions and the enforcement of previous wage-hour and fair-labor-standards laws. In a distinguished burst of meretriciousness, it professed to extend rent control while cutting out its heart. It completely, almost boastfully (and in utter violation of its own laws), ignored the economic reports sent to it by Mr. Truman and his Council of Economic Advisors.

It purported to be liberal-minded in authorizing this nation's joining the International Refugee Organization, but it refused to pass legislation making that action effective by a temporary amendment of the quota laws to permit entry of displaced persons.

The House failed in its effort to enact a bill of at-tainder by denying funds to director Edgar G. Warren of the Conciliation Service, but only because the passage of the labor bill abolished that job and made the issue academic. The House had better luck, however, in its Un-American activities. Those of J. Parnell Thomas, Rankin, Rees, and others are making A. Mitchell Palmer look like a very restrained fellow.

In the matter of appointments, the Senate kept an even pace in viciousness with the House. The obscene fight against Lilienthal by McKellar, Bricker, and Taft needs no recalling. In addition, there was Vandenberg's refusal to let his Foreign Relations Committee consider the nomination of Francis Biddle as American delegate to the United Nations Economic and Social Council; the four-months' harassment of Gordon Clapp, nominated to be TVA head; Ferguson's six-month refusal to permit Philip Perlman to become Solicitor General. The only vestige of malfeasance of all of these nominees was previous association with the Democratic Party—an act which, as Leon Henderson points out, has created an entirely new category of Grade B citizens. Fortunately, in three out of these four cases, a majority vote for confirmation made some atonement for the disreputable performance of the Senate diehards. Possibly, when measured in absolute terms, and certainly, when compared to Congress, the Administration has appeared in a favorable light during the last seven months. Mr. Truman's appointments have recently been far superior to those he was making in the days of the Missouri gang. After scuttling Wyatt and the housing program last year, his economic and social thinking has taken a heartening turn for the better. In foreign affairs, he has been at least no more benighted than the Congress, and on the matter of labor proposals there is no comparison at all.

Optimists in Washington have hope that some of the improvement in the Administration will continue, and that the next legislative session will not be so gruesome—the theory being that the first session is the worst session. Pessimists, who are in larger number, see the second session as even more fearsome, on the somewhat more logical grounds that legislative reason diminishes as the election date draws nearer. They also prophesy that in the early 1950's we will look back with regret to the intelligent days of the Eightieth Congress.

Hiroshima Deathday

HIROSHIMA is much tidier today. Much of the rubble is cleared away. The dust is settled. There are even a number of children who can't remember that day two years ago when a passing American plane dropped a bomb that killed a hundred thousand people.

The pillar of fire and whirling vapor that rose above Hiroshima to forty thousand feet was to have led the human race out of the wilderness of war into the green pastures of peace. That is what we said, trying to rationalize the destruction we had let loose on earth. One world or none. Modern man is obsolete. "The good news of damnation," said Hutchins of Chicago, quoting the French philosopher Leon Bloy, "doubtless on the theory that none of us would be Christians if we were not afraid of perpetual hell-fire."

We've got over that first blinding revelation, that foretaste of world death. War books don't sell any more, the publishers say. "Atomic" will sell if it's a name on perfume or lipstick, but Selig Hecht has been off the best seller list for weeks. The United Nations is very poor copy, the newspapers say: even the Atomic Energy Commission. Atomic scientists, who, knowing the score, led the first crusade against world suicide, are no longer in the headlines unless, like Condon, they are maliciously libeled as "reds" by the Thomas committee. We've got used to the idea of two worlds. We're getting used to the idea that away off ahead—ten years ahead, perhaps,—there's a war with Russia. We don't quite say "atomic war" and tests of supersonic planes, radar controlled, make interesting reading—but not as interesting as the team standings in the National League with the Dodgers seven full games ahead of the Cards.

Of course, we've been busy in these two years since Hiroshima. And it has not all been wasted effort—not quite all. Some unaccountable horse sense led the Eightieth Congress to put to flight McKellar and his fellow Philistines and establish David Lilienthal as head of the Atomic Energy Commission. Some superhuman patience holds the United Nations atomic group to their labors, so that after fourteen months they can report reaching a qualified agreement that atomic energy must be internationally controlled. And the ticking seconds on the stop-watch have speeded the efforts of the World Federalists, the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists around Einstein, and the World Constitution group around Hutchins.

But for most men, Hiroshima was just a bright blinding light that went out. Probably most men are obsolete. World Government, United Nations, One World, Peace are unreal terms. National Sovereignty, National Honor, Russia, War, these spell reality. As the obsolete George Sokolsky—rebuking Einstein—puts it so well: "Most Americans are narrow nationalists and atom splitting has not changed them at all. We have the atom bomb. For better or for worse we mean to keep it."

The Emergency World's People's Congress suggests three minutes of silent thought or prayer on Hiroshima Day. They suggest, "There are many things we might think about during this fateful pause: The collective responsibility of mankind for the long history of war, of which Hiroshima was the logical climax. The duty of all the world's people to mobilize for peace before they are again called upon to mobilize for war. . . ." It took just about three minutes for the bomb to fall on Hiroshima.

Warning All Scientists

BY LEONARD ENGEL

TWO weeks ago, the Washington Times-Herald carried a front-page attack on Dr. Edward U. Condon, director of the Bureau of Standards, which, even by the Times-Herald's own low standards, was a cheap, mean, and dishonest piece of journalism. By unmistakable implication, Condon was accused of Communist sympathies.

My first inclination was to laugh. I know something about Condon, and he is rather less of a Communist than his boss, Secretary of Commerce Harriman. However, the Times-Herald attack is only the latest act in a well-planned campaign to tar Condon, a top-ranking scientist, and thus to discredit civilian scientists generally, so that scientific research (especially in the field of atomic energy) can be turned back to the army. The campaign will continue unless the ugly individuals and forces behind it are brought to light and given a thorough scrubbing with lye soap.

The story of the extraordinary campaign against Condon begins with a visit to him by two Un-American Activities Committee investigators last March. They were after—and obtained freely—a copy of a letter mentioning Condon's name in connection with the solicitation of members for the American-Soviet Science Society. The latter, of whose board of directors Condon is a member, is an agency set up chiefly to furnish American research workers with translations of Russian scientific papers, a service several industrial firms now go to great expense to provide for themselves.

Though the society now has no connection with any pro-Soviet organization whatever, though it is to operate on Rockefeller Foundation funds, Representative Thomas of the Un-American Activities Committee appears to have recoiled in fake horror when he saw the letter. Imagine, a government scientist connected with an agency that wants to make it easier for Americans to keep up with what Russian scientists are working on! At any rate, a grossly distorted account of the society and of Condon's link with it appeared in an article by Thomas in the American Magazine for June. Condon was also attacked, though not by name, in an article by Thomas in the June 21 issue of Liberty.

The caliber of the Thomas pieces and the Times-Herald article may be judged from the fact that, in one, Thomas or his ghost-writer identifies the Bureau of Standards as an agency for testing patents (this will be news to the Patent Office) and, in the Times-Herald, Condon's first name is given incorrectly as Albert. Besides membership in the American-Soviet Science Society, the three articles charge him with the following sinister delinquencies:

Association with that "red" organization, the Southern Conference for Human Welfare (Condon once served, along with several other "respectables," as sponsor of a local Southern Conference dinner);

Having a foreign-born wife who expressed a pro-Soviet opinion at a Washington dinner party (she was born in Chicago and didn't express such an opinion);

Reluctance to appear before the Thomas Committee (he has never been invited to testify);

Trying to sneak off to Moscow to spill atom bomb secrets (he was nominated by American scientific organizations as a delegate to the jubilee of the Academy of Sciences of the U. S. S. R., two years ago).

About the only word of truth in these allegations is that Condon is a leading atomic scientist. That he is. Although he is barely 45, he already has a distinguished career behind him.

A bulky individual with a quiet, low-pitched voice, a quick smile, curly black hair, and a pipe, Condon comes from the West—everywhere West. He was born at Alamogordo, New Mexico, scene of the first A-bomb test. His father was a railroad construction engineer, so young Condon had lived in fourteen different towns and gone to fourteen different schools by the time he entered the University of California in 1921.

When Condon entered California, his interest lay in astronomy. But he soon switched to physics and he is best known among scientists for his contributions in a peculiarly difficult branch of physics, quantum mechanics. Quantum theory, a cornerstone of the atomic age, is equal in importance to Einstein's theories of relativity. It holds that radiation is discontinuous in nature. Condon played a leading part in working out the mathematics of quantum theory and applying it to atomic systems. A large chunk of the theoretical knowledge that went into the atom bomb has Condon's name on it.

Condon did most of this work as a research fellow at Göttingen and Munich, a lecturer at Columbia, and a professor at Princeton and the University of Minnesota. In 1937, he went to the Westinghouse Research Laboratories where, as associate director, he pursued studies with Westinghouse's Van de Graaff generator, the first industry-operated atom smasher and a type of machine as important and costly as the more widely known cyclotron. Three years later, when the whole Allied world suddenly found itself demanding a thousand kinds of radar equipment at once, Condon was put in charge of Westinghouse radar research.

In 1941, Condon was called to serve on two of the most important policy-making organizations set up during the war. One was a committee to explore the feasibility of rocket warfare; it was this committee's recommendation that gave birth to the fabulous Caltech rocket center. The other was the National Defense Research Council's famous S-1 Committees, which had supervision of the early work on uranium fission and made the fateful determination that atomic explosives were a practical possibility. Later, Condon was released from radar work to participate actively in A-bomb research. At Los Alamos, he wrote the "Los Alamos Primer" for new A-bomb researchers; and at Berkeley, he was a leader of the Westinghouse-University of California team that developed the electromagnetic process for replacing uranium isotopes.

Condon returned to Westinghouse's Pittsburgh laboratories early in 1945, but he didn't remain there long. That fall, Senator McMahon, chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Atomic Energy, asked a score of the nation's leading scientists to nominate a man for the post of scientific adviser to his committee. Their unanimous choice was Condon, who had also just been elected president of the American Physical Society (one of the youngest in the society's history, by the way). At the same time, at the suggestion of Commerce Secretary Henry Wallace, President Truman appointed Condon director of the Bureau of Standards. Condon was, incidentally, one of the few important Truman appointees to be confirmed by the Senate unanimously.

That brings me to the question of the motives of Condon's detractors. Why are they so anxious to get rid of a man of such obvious attainments and distinction? One factor is the circumstance of his appointment having been suggested by Wallace. To some perverted individuals, a Wallace endorsement is proof that a man is a red of deepest dye. The odd part of it is that, in this instance, Wallace's recommendation involved no political considerations at all. Condon was chosen—this was at a time when Wallace was trying to bring about a rapprochement between industry and the Department of Commerce—because of his industrial laboratory experience. Wallace believed that the Bureau of Standards should be of direct service to industry and he picked the best industrial scientist he could find.

Red-baiting attacks on Wallace appointees are, of course, simply a device for driving New Dealers out of Washington. However, in the case of Condon, there is much more involved. In one respect, Condon is a New Dealer—he stands for public honesty on a vital question that has received all too little attention in the last two years. The bulk of the financing for scientific research now comes from government sources. So the question arises, who owns the resulting patents? Condon is on record as believing that the public should own them, a position directly opposite to that taken by most industrial corporations.

I don't believe that any industry representatives are taking a direct part in the campaign against Condon. But one does know this: industry considers people with views like Condon's highly undesirable and is happy to see them driven out of Washington. If industry really disapproved of the attacks on Condon, it would silence Thomas in a second.

A more important factor is the campaign to turn atomic energy back to the army, a campaign in which Thomas is playing a loud, if incoherent and raucous, part. The give-the-atom-back-to-the-army drive has a complex of origins. One is the widespread—and fallacious—belief that atomic energy is primarily a weapon and therefore belongs under military control. Another is the ceaseless effort of politically ambitious army officers, like General Groves, to extend their political influence; they understand atomic energy's future importance full well. Finally, a major segment of industry is hostile to peacetime application of atomic energy, for fear it will bring an industrial revolution that will shear monopoly of its power; these representatives of industry believe that army control will delay non-military atomic energy development and so safeguard their position.

If the attack on Condon succeeds, no civilian scientist will be safe. For a Thomas that lies and invents and distorts about a Condon will not hesitate to do the same to any other scientist. Nor are nuclear physicists the only scientists threatened. For, as the last war showed, every field of science has important military applications. If atomic energy returns to the army, with it will inevitably go chemistry, geology, biology, medicine.

As Dr. Frank B. Jewett, former president of the Bell Telephone Laboratories and of the National Academy of Sciences, wrote George W. Merck, the pharmaceutical manufacturer and treasurer of the New Jersey Republican party, "It's high time Thomas stopped his Un-American activities." Civilian control of atomic energy was voted by an overwhelming majority of Congress, after the most thorough discussion. Thomas would do well to observe the law for a change, both the law of Congress and, by halting his attacks on Condon, the law of common decency.

Our Blunder in Korea

BY ROGER N. BALDWIN

UNLESS American policy undergoes a change in southern Korea, we are probably going to deliver another country into the waiting arms of the Soviet Union. Thirty million Koreans have been liberated from the Japanese after forty years of subjection, only to suffer a ruinous division at the hands of their liberators. What Koreans passionately desire is unity. But the prospects are: further disunity or final subjection to the Soviets. The present Joint Commission appears stymied by Russia's determination to have a "friendly country" on its borders. A friendly country, on the basis of past experience, means one under Russian control. Hence, every possible effort has been made by the Russians and the Korean Communists to Sovietize their northern half of Korea, and to increase Soviet influence in the southern half.

This latter effort is gaining, not so much through Russian aid and Korean penetration, as through the blind and naive policies of the United States, and the extremism of the Korean anti-Communists. A few days' conversation with Americans and Koreans here makes that fact painfully clear.

It may be said that any observer who has spent only two weeks in Korea, as I did, is hardly competent to analyze the Korean drama, and it may further be contended that one who was denied permission, as I was, to visit northern Korea, cannot set forth the conditions necessary to unity. But the problems of democratic-Communist conflict have a universal character, modified only by local conditions. I met all the leaders in the Military Government, and in the parties of the left and right, as well as a host of Korean officials, intellectuals, students, and lawyers. The conclusions I express have currency in all these circles. No one likes our present policy, nor the prospects it engenders.

Our policy rests on the assumption that the southern Koreans should run their own affairs. But its first implementation, oddly enough, was our establishment of an interim puppet government—legislature, courts, administrators, and police. We appointed all its officials, excepting half of the legislature, which was chosen in what passed for an election, improvised by the military.

That legislature has just now set an election for around September 1, under United States supervision. The puppet government will go out and Koreans will, for the first time in all their centuries of history, have experienced real universal suffrage. The new officials will exercise regional authority until Korea is united. Their government will thus be another form of interim rule. It will doubtless be subject to some control by the United States, for it is hardly conceivable that we will withdraw our armed forces from southern Korea until the impasse with Russia is resolved. None but a pro-Soviet government would desire such a withdrawal on our part. And our commitment to the trusteeship principle indicates the likelihood of some limitation of the sovereignty of the temporary government, no matter how unpalatable that may be to the government itself.

Military rule in a liberated country is rather an anomaly at best, but beyond that, we have poorly prepared southern Korea for independence. We created a government by fiat and we gave it office without power. We reserved the right to remove any appointee and to annul any legislative or official act. We made law by issuing orders, without consulting the legislature. At the same time, we blandly held that we were engaged in a process of "Koreanization," and we urged the Koreans to go ahead and run things—while we held the strings. We thus created, naturally enough, an atmosphere of confusion and distrust, in which the puppet government suffered from schizophrenia, a high turn-over rate, and bitter public criticism of its members. In this atmosphere, no strong democratic system could possibly develop or offer an alternative to the Communist appeal.

ROGER N. BALDWIN, director of the American Civil Liberties Union, has just returned from a trip to American-occupied Japan and southern Korea.

Finally, as if to insure the success of the Soviet siren song, we have been party to a Korean police state, bitterly resented by all but extreme rightists. Suppression breeds Communists. That lesson is learned only at high cost, and we have not yet learned it. The national police administration which we foster is run by anti-Communists, terrorists of the right, and police officers trained largely in Japanese methods. The latter still operate under Japanese law. We hold in prison thousands of men convicted by our American provost courts—which are no courts at all, in a legal sense—for "offenses against the occupation." Some such offenses: "Attending, organizing, or acting as an officer at an unauthorized meeting; uttering speech, or words, or singing a song hostile to the United States, the armed forces, or the Military Government; sending a communication detrimental or disrespectful to the United States, or failing to report its receipt; sending an uncensored message, or a letter outside the mails."

These are provost-court offenses, taken from the manual—and in a liberated country. Penalty for committing them may be five years in jail. Most of the prisoners so held are, ostensibly, leftists. Are they "disrespectful to the United States" when they strike or hold unauthorized meetings? The Seoul press reports that 70 per cent of the provost-court prisoners are involved in strike cases. In May, I found a thousand of them isolated in one prison, and kept in total idleness on the excuse that "they did not want to work." Their friends told me it was an additional punishment for carrying on propaganda in prison.

Of course, leftists—like rightists—are guilty of terrorism. Of course, there has been violence in strikes. Of course, the police have been attacked. But such truths do not warrant this wholesale policy of suppression; a suppression which forces many non-Communists to flee to the north in desperation, which causes liberal political leaders to find new quarters every night for fear of the police or of gangs, and which caused the chairman of the legislature, an American appointee, to retire to the United States hospital, ten miles out in the country, because he was "politically ill." I found him there, having his temperature taken, and I would not be surprised if it were high, considering the risks he said he ran. And this man, damned by the right as a Communist, is a staunch middle-of-the-roader, a Princeton graduate, and chairman of the abortive Coalition Committee selected by the Military Government itself.

Only extremes are tolerated in Korea. You are either pro-Soviet or rightist. If you happen, actually, to be a liberal, if you feel that the pro-Japanese collaborators must be purged, that the police must be removed from politics, that unions should have freedom to strike, and that northern and southern Korea must be reconciled—then you are a Communist. You are safe in applauding a Korean who wins the Boston Marathon; and about there you stop. You can't even promote a program of "left" music at a Korean Symphony concert. The musicians have already been threatened by gangsters invading their concert hall.

The right is not without its fears. I found the homes of the two elder statesmen of Independence in Exile guarded day and night by Korean police. The police are fearful, too. Throughout the country, they cluster in their booths, always two or more together; the chiefs of police drive about in guarded cars. They have good reason. Some police have been killed by goaded leftists. Then rightist gangs help the police against the left, and the war is on.

I have no doubt that, under present conditions, civil war would break out in southern Korea if the occupying forces pulled out. That is the belief of high military officials. The civil war would, of course, expand throughout Korea if the Russians left, too. An embryonic civil war is taking place at this moment, in the south. And we Americans tolerate it, to a degree, as an affair between Koreans, a necessary family row, only incidental to our Koreanization program. We save our heavy hand for strikes and criticism of the occupation, and we apply it by universal censorship of meetings, the mails, and communications. To our credit be it noted that we have ended the practise of advance censorship of the press—but only after having suppressed three leftist newspapers.

OUT of the present chaos of southern Korea, three conclusions emerge: first, that we have offered no constructive demonstration of democracy for its own sake as a counter-lure to communism; second, that by nurturing the police state we drive moderates into the Communist camp; third, that our Koreanization policy has created such division and irresponsibility among Koreans and Americans as to be dangerous to our proposed objectives.

From the little I heard and read of northern Korea, the Soviet occupation seems to have won considerable popular support. It has distributed land, without compensation to landlords; it has nationalized industries, again without compensation; it has purged pro-Japanese elements (except for the repentant sinners who joined the party); it has installed a legislature with a semblance of popular backing. So much to the good. On the other hand, northern Korea is, of course, a police state. Some form of conscription has apparently been adopted; the Communists have captured all political leadership; the people are hungry. Two thousand refugees a day tramp over the mountains from northern Korea, looking either for food or greater freedom in the south. Only a trickle of refugees go from south to north, chiefly Communists and Communist sympathizers who do not enjoy being hunted.

If a united Korea is ultimately to be created, the basic economic systems of the two zones must be tied into some reasonable relationship. The south has yet to tackle the distribution of land—in a territory 80 per cent peasant—or the purge of pro-Japanese collaborators. Such action is precluded, it is said, because the interim legislature is too closely allied with landlords and former collaborators. Some of its leaders told me that there are not over a dozen real progressives among its ninety members. Others were hopeful of action after the September elections. Tentative drafts have been made of a constitution, a land law, and a purge act. It would take a year or two at best, say legislative leaders, to put any land law or purge into effect.

The new government may be able to establish a basis for ultimate reconciliation of the political forms and economic institutions of north and south. Its character will depend on the issues of the campaign. If national independence and anti-trusteeship are the issues, as seems likely, the nationalists will win. If they do, there will be an indefinite and tragic deepening of the split along Korea's north-south border.

Possible, but unlikely, in the September elections, is a victory of the left. It favors independence, to win votes, and trusteeship, to win Soviet aid. The issues they would raise, leftists told me, would be land distribution for the peasants, nationalization of industry, opposition to reactionary nationalists, and acceptance of trusteeship as a political necessity. Trusteeship would be expected to enlist Russian influence in offsetting presumed American "imperialism," but it would seem unlikely that a leftist campaign which accepted it would win friends and influence people.

AMERICA has obligations to the Koreans which should be discharged now. The State Department is discharging one of them by replacing military with civil government. Its first task will be to abandon military habits of control in a liberated land. That means putting an end to censorship, control of meetings, licensing of organizations, penalties on criticisms of the occupation, curtailment of strikes, and the imprisonment of the hundreds who are guilty only of spoken or written violation of occupation orders. It also means stopping political terrorism. If this requires joint action by military police and Korean police, under army direction, it should be done that way. Law and order is an American responsibility until the Koreans possess a firmly established government which can maintain it.

The United States also has an obligation to clear up the trusteeship question, so far as definition will do it. It is the most debated issue in southern Korea. American military officials have stated that trusteeship means "aid and assistance," but how much more it means, they do not say. Until it is officially made clear which is the United States definition of trusteeship—a protectorate superimposed upon sovereignty, or aid and assistance to a sovereign people—the issue cannot be removed as a leading factor in any political campaign.

The Koreans, though so long under alien rule, have the capacity for self-government and a desire for democracy as we understand it. I was struck by the vigor and ability of Korean leaders. They need no guardians. Anyone familiar with the present leadership of the political movements of the southern zone, and with Korean intellectual life, will testify to that. But they will need extensive and expert help to construct a wholly new government and rebuild a shattered economy.

All observers say that a period of transition will be necessary, in which, by mutual agreement, authority would be shared. A longer period of transition would clearly be required if, by a miracle, agreement is reached with the Russians for the creation of a provisional government. Events since the Joint Commission met in May, while I was there, do not promise that; nor did I meet any observers, even then, who felt that the Russians would settle for anything less than the assurance of a Soviet Korea.

Our other obligations are economic. We will be represented in Korea, on whatever terms, for a long time to come. Food, credits, exchange, a self-supporting economy—vastly difficult until unity is achieved—all these demand continued American aid.

With a representative, elected government in southern Korea, we may be able to concentrate on the economic problem and settle down to constructive action. We cannot afford any further major blunders. Here, as elsewhere, our answer to the challenge of communism can only be a working democracy, capable of satisfying the needs and claims of a desperate, brave, and long-suffering people.

Will Interracial Housing Work?

SECOND IN A SERIES, "RACE BIAS IN HOUSING"

BY CHARLES ABRAMS

WITH the enactment of the United States Housing Act in 1937, responsibility for building and operating public housing projects devolved on the local housing authorities, though the federal government continued to advance the money. No policy as to race relations was pressed on local authorities except that projects were to follow "community patterns and trends." The federal housing administrators had always viewed the racial issue in housing as a hot potato and gladly passed on the responsibility to the localities.

The patterns of tenant distribution that developed locally were not the products of previous exploration of the problem and fanned out in many directions. By January 13, 1944, public housing projects tenanted partially or wholly by Negroes were divided as follows:

Total number of projects occupied by Negro tenants, 622.

Number of projects providing for total occupancy by Negroes, 297.

Number of projects providing for occupancy by Negro and white tenants, 325.

Of the projects occupied by Negro and white tenants, 124 were "controlled"—that is, buildings or sections were deliberately assigned to bring about racial separation. Forty-five were "uncontrolled," with management making no effort to bring about a separation between the races. Eighty-nine were "partially controlled." In this group, the buildings at one end were allotted to one race and those at the other end to the other race, with a flexible area in between.

The racial patterns that have developed in projects, however, are not all uniform. They may be classified as follows:

1. Insulated homogeneous—projects occupied by whites and Negroes separated in two different areas with a clear dividing line, such as a street or intervening neighborhood.

2. Insulated bi-racial—projects in which whites and Negroes occupy different sections of a single self-contained project.

3. Mixed token—occupied predominantly by whites with a few token Negro families to indicate absence of intentional discrimination.

4. Mixed equal—occupied by whites and Negroes in equal or nearly equal proportions.

5. Mixed minority—occupied predominantly by whites but with Negroes represented by a minority.

6. Insulated bi-racial-token—projects in which the Negroes occupy a separate section but one or a few token Negro families are mixed in with the whites.

The experience gained from these projects is not unseasoned, for public housing projects have been in operation for more than ten years. The tenants have not been exclusively lower-income groups, higher-income groups having lived in the war projects. The racial problems that have arisen have, with rare exception, been tackled successfully.

Considering the novelty of the approach and the perplexities inherent in any effort to reshape a living pattern founded upon an old prejudice, the experience is one of the most revealing in the history of the race-relations enigma. The deduction to be drawn may be summarized as follows: if Negroes are integrated with whites into self-contained communities without segregation, where they have daily contact with other tenants, are given the same privileges, and share the same responsibilities, initial tensions tend to subside, differences are reconciled, and cooperation develops—in short, an environment is created in which interracial harmony will be achieved.

This conclusion is supported by many reports of housing authorities which have ventured into mixed occupancy. The Philadelphia Housing Authority says that it has "been able to operate housing projects with mixed occupancy without difficulty or untoward incidents." Pittsburgh's eight projects are all successful mixed communities. The Los Angeles Housing Authority "points with pride to the harmony that has been achieved in its Aliso Village, an 802-unit slum-clearance development devoted temporarily to the housing of war workers, among whom are large representations of various races, colors, religions, and nationalities." The Chicago Housing Authority, in a project of 586 dwelling units of which 117 are occupied by Negroes, finds that an adjustment is made "within a surprisingly short time despite the fact that many of the tenants are living in Chicago for the first time and that many came from small communities where interracial living was unheard of."

New York City's experiment with mixed occupancy has been in progress since about 1935. The following table shows the proportion of Negroes to total occupancy in its federal projects in 1946:

	Total Occupancy	Negro
Williamsburgh	1622	34
Red Hook	2545	127
Queensbridge	3149	123
Vladeck	1531	14
So. Jamaica	448	341
East River	1170	124
Kingsboro	1166	550
Clason Point	400	7
Markham	360	36

In none of the projects are Negroes separated from the whites, and in none has there been friction. "The experiment," says the Authority, "if you wish to term it an experiment, has been a very successful one in every way."

In some cases, there have been problems and managerial headaches, and in some, disappointments, but these have only pointed up the need for a proper race-relations policy and the desirability of following the mixed-race practice which has so notably succeeded in other cities. For example, difficulties have arisen where Negroes were isolated in one part of the project, a pattern which tends to intensify class and race consciousness. The presence of "a majority of the minority" in a project has tended to discourage applications by white tenants. But if the Negro families have only a token representation, they are likely not to participate in its activities. Such management policies only discourage integration and accentuate race distinctions.

Still other problems were created by war migrations. The infiltration of Southern Negroes and Southern whites into war-production areas brought tension or conflict. But in the pre-war projects and in the large majority of war projects in which the minority was mingled with the white majority, the experiment proved a signal success. It would have been significant had it succeeded in only a single instance. That it succeeded in so many, where it was properly applied, is of epochal importance to America, pointing up the false mythology that still underlies much of our thinking on the race question in housing. The success of the bi-racial war projects which were occupied by the higher-paid skilled workers suggests that a properly tackled program of bi-racial housing for higher-income families would again succeed.

HOW is the public-housing experience to be reconciled with that of private real estate, which so often sees a mass exodus of white tenants the moment an unwanted minority moves into the neighborhood? Why do values collapse, when Negroes come in; why are homes so often sold at a sacrifice? Why has the use of the restrictive covenant increased? How explain the aversion to a Negro neighbor when a Negro is freely accepted into the household as a servant? The answer may explain the pattern of enforced segregation that has become intensified in the last few decades.

The indicated causes are mainly three varieties of fear: fear of losing social status, fear of losing established neighborhood associations, and fear of losing an investment. Some idealists are quick to condemn fellow-citizens who oppose infiltration by a minority and either sell their property or join a local association formed to keep the minority out. It should, however, be understood that the fears mentioned are as common to the American proletariat as they are to the so-called gentry. Dismissing them with an airy shrug will get us nowhere.

The social status of a neighborhood is an item to be reckoned with by any home owner, tenant or investor. Where one lives is usually indicative of one's station in life and has an effect on friends, potential friends, and business associates. The character of the neighborhood may be especially important to one's daughter during her marriageable years. Unhappily, social status depends partly on race and color. Sometimes a single Grundy in a neighborhood may inspire organized opposition; sometimes the intrusion of a single family of "unwelcome ancestry" may precipitate an exodus—first by those best able to afford it, then by others. The section gets to be known as "the undesirable part of town," houses fall into disrepair, and the neighborhood turns into a hand-me-down.

With the movement of one's neighbors, established associations begin to suffer: the composition of the school changes, the bridge club goes uptown, the old movie house is no longer what it used to be, and the old parishioners are no longer seen in church. Social pressure to move into the "better" section of town sets in.

These changes usually precipitate a collapse in property values. Owners become anxious to sell, too many properties are put up for sale at one time, values suffer. Mortgagees will now insist upon payment of their mortgage principal or drastic reduction of their loans when they become due and will make no new loans in the neighborhood. The physical deterioration of many of the buildings pares values further.

In a few cases, infiltration by a minority may raise rentals and even boom prices. This happens when a shortage of dwelling space for the minority inspires its members to pay a ransom price for the privilege of getting a better home in a better section.

Change in the racial character of the neighborhood is accelerated when mass infiltration is feared, and when fear has become increasingly responsible for heightened racial tensions. Mass infiltration is bound to occur when there is a shortage of dwelling space for the minority. Races pressed for shelter will force their way into a neighborhood if the opportunity is given them. Few neighborhoods are lastingly safe. The more stringent and the more widespread are the methods taken to exclude the minority, the less living space will be available to it, and the stronger therefore will be its pressure. As soon as a few minority families move in, the influx acquires the force of a tidal wave. No restriction will be effective to keep the minority out so long as there is a shortage of housing for the minority.

Hornets' Nest in Indonesia

BY CHARLES WOLF, JR.

THE Dutch have embarked upon a program of "limited police measures," in Java and Sumatra, which are neither "limited" nor "policing" in the usual sense of those words. From recent reports, it appears, rather, that the measures taken constitute a full-scale military action limited only by the number of Dutch troops, arms, and planes available, and aiming ultimately at the unilateral enforcement of the Linggadjati agreement of March 25.

The Dutch action was taken, moreover, against the iterated and reiterated wishes and counsel of the United States and British governments, and from that action there can be no immediate turning back. The results of this precipitous move will, in all likelihood, be threefold: military, economic, and political.

In the first place, we have the beginning of what will be a long and bloody guerrilla warfare, after the initial momentum of the Dutch drive has been spent. After the arrival of the 2nd Division this month, Dutch troops in Indonesia will number about 109,000. They will compose a strong, disciplined, well-equipped, mobile and mechanized force, with adequate first-line air support, but with a relatively small ability to replace damaged or lost equipment. Their morale is generally good. I have talked with many of the officers and men, both in Batavia and at hill stations in Java, from the time they began to arrive in large shiploads a year ago. They seemed ready and anxious to fight, on the theory that the fighting had to come: the sooner it began, the sooner it would be over, and the sooner they could return home. Without exception, they felt that the military issue would be settled within a matter of weeks by the complete destruction of the Indonesian forces. I believe, however, that this appraisal will prove to be hasty and inaccurate. The republican army will not be destroyed, because it will not be caught in large-scale, direct action against the Dutch. Instead, it will take to the hills and to the natural fortifications in which Java and Sumatra abound, and will prosecute a long harassing campaign, even after the Dutch have attained their major objectives.

CHARLES WOLF, JR., returned in June from sixteen months' duty in an official post in Java, to accept a graduate fellowship in public administration at Harvard.

The Tentara Republik Indonesia (the republican army) is a trained, if untried, force. It contains both regular and irregular units. The irregular local forces—the Lasjkar Rayat or "People's Forces" and the Barisan Banteng or "Buffalo Militia"—were organized by the Japanese and have only recently come under the centralized command of the T. R. I.'s General Soedirman.

In total strength, the T. R. I. possesses or directs some 200,000 troops, of which 150,000 are in Java and 50,000 in Sumatra. This combined force, which still bears the markings of the Japanese model from which it was constructed, is armed with approximately 150,000 rifles, and something under 5,000 small arms, machine guns, and mortars. The republic has a token air force of Japanese Zero fighters and a few bombers. Not more than forty planes, in all, are in flying condition. And Air Commodore Soerriadarma commands only half as many pilots as he does planes.

It is worth remembering that the French, in Indo-China, have been stalemated by less than 160,000 Viet Nameese guerrillas with 50,000 rifles. And there are more French troops in Indo-China than there will be Dutch in Indonesia. In addition, the Dutch will be engaging a considerably stronger and more organized foe than have the French, and they will be operating over a considerably larger area with an exceedingly difficult terrain. Like the French, the Dutch may win their initial objectives; like the French, they will soon be bogged down.

Economic repercussions will swiftly follow the outbreak of military action in Indonesia. These repercussions are likely to be particularly unfortunate from America's point of view. It is the announced intention of the republican government to follow a scorched-earth policy in the course of its retreat, and plans for execution of this policy were drawn up long before the Dutch attack of July 21. Likely to be burned and permanently lost to the world's economy as a result, are accumulated stockpiles of from 200,000 to 600,000 tons of sugar, approximately 1,500 tons of cinchona bark, from which quinine is made, over 6,000 tons of hard-cordage fibers, and indefinite quantities of rubber, tobacco, and tea.*

*The Dutch claim that the burning of factories, plantations, and stockpiles by the republican forces had been going on for weeks before the outbreak of hostilities, and that the necessity of preventing the further destruction of vital resources was one of the important factors in the decision to take military action.—EDITH.

The political effects of the Dutch decision have already begun to be felt, and it is certain that they will increase in scope and intensity in the near future. India's Pandit Nehru is an Indonesian sympathizer and a personal friend of the republic's vice president, Mohammed Hatta, and its former prime minister, Soetan Sjahrir. Nehru has already expressed his government's displeasure over the outbreak of hostilities, and has requested both Britain and the United States to mediate the dispute before it goes any further. Hadji Agoes Salim, the republic's shrewd old foreign minister, is still in Cairo, continuing his mission to gain friends for his cause throughout the Middle East, and Sjahrir is embarking on a world tour to plead the Indonesian case. It is only a matter of time before the subject will be brought up in the United Nations. When it is, the Arab League, India, and Australia are likely to take a particularly active hand in the proceedings.

In the face of all this, what are the Dutch motives for embarking on their "limited policing" program? There can be no doubt that two factors have been decisive. Dutch patience has been exhausted by the dilatory tactics of the republic during the last phase of the two-year negotiations. And the Dutch exchequer has been exhausted by the drain of the 3,000,000 guilders (roughly $1,000,000) required each day to maintain armed forces in Indonesia—with no appreciable economic rehabilitation or resumption of trade yet evident.

Dr. H. J. Van Mook, the Dutch Lieutenant Governor-General, has played a peculiarly interesting role in the present events. A liberal statesman who has been widely criticized in Holland for his concessions to the Indonesians, Van Mook is now, incongruously enough, a sponsor of military action. The reason behind this apparent change of heart is somewhat obscure. As an idealist and something of a zealot, Van Mook has become discouraged by the course of events since the signing of the Linggadjati agreement, which recognized the de facto authority of the republic in Java and Sumatra, and provided for the formation, by January 1, 1949, of a federalized United States of Indonesia. Indonesia would then have been an equal and sovereign partner with the Kingdom of the Netherlands under the Dutch crown. Now, distraught and disappointed by delays and obstacles created by the republicans, Van Mook has evidently decided that he can implement the agreement more effectively on a unilateral basis. He is a man of principle, and there is no doubt that he sincerely believes he can bring about a conclusive and just resolution of the problem, on unilateral terms. Regardless of the integrity of his motives, however, his current policy appears misguided, and doomed to an unhappy ending.

THE SEVENTEENTH GUEST

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Congress Sugar Daddies

WHEN the Wall Street Journal snaps at both the G. O. P. and at business interests in one editorial, then man has really bitten dog. It did just that, on July 22, in commenting on the sugar bill which has passed the House and got the approval of the Senate in the closing hours of the session. As a result, explains the Wall Street Journal, "sugar is to be put under a completely 'planned economy,' which is another word for monopoly. . . . If we understood what the Republicans were saying in the last campaign, they were denouncing this sort of business. If we understood a great many associations of businessmen, they have been asking that the government leave them alone. But here is the Republican Congress about to approve as neat a little legal monopoly as one would care to see. We may have missed it, but we have not heard any of the business associations pointing out what their colleagues in the sugar industry are up to."

Needless to say, my views on economic planning do not coincide with those of the Wall Street Journal, but on this occasion I can add "amen" to their editorial. For the sugar bill is a scandalous example of "private socialism;" that is to say, of the employment of government planning, fiscal, and police powers, not for the general welfare, but for the profit of special interests. In order to protect domestic sugar growers and refiners, imports are to be rigidly restricted and prices held at a scarcity level. Moreover, the bill violates, in the most flagrant manner, the principles of freer trade and non-discrimination that American representatives are at this very moment advocating at Geneva.

In the main, the bill follows the same line as the sugar act of 1937 which was passed at a time when sugar prices were abnormally low. Like that act, it requires the Secretary of Agriculture to forecast, by October 31, the probable demand for sugar during the coming year, and on this basis to fix allotments for various consumers and producers. But whereas the old legislation instructed the Secretary to guard against scarcity, the new accents avoidance of surpluses and price maintenance. According to the bakers, who use a lot of sugar, the price is likely to be three cents a pound higher than it would be in a free market, adding $30,000,000 a year to the consumers' bill for baked goods alone.

The bill sets the following quotas for American producers:

Short tons, raw value

Domestic beet sugar growers.....	1,800,000
Mainland cane sugar growers.....	500,000
Hawaiian growers.....	1,052,000
Puerto Rican growers.....	910,000
Virgin Island growers.....	6,000

4,268,000

To the Philippines, a quota of 952,000 tons is assigned in accordance with the Philippines Trade Act. Cuba's share of the market will be 98.64 per cent of whatever tonnage is required to meet domestic demand, after allowing for the above quotas, leaving all other sugar-producing countries to scramble for the remaining 1.36 per cent. However, since it is expected that the Philippines will be unable to provide the whole of its assigned tonnage during the next few years, Cuba will be permitted to make up whatever deficit arises and will also be allowed to ship additional amounts of sugar if mainland producers prove unable to deliver their full quotas in any year. Finally, the Cubans are guaranteed that their share of the American market will not be smaller than it was under the old law.

If per capita consumption of sugar returns to the prewar level, total American demand will be about 7,500,000 tons. Thus when Philippine production is restored, Cuba's quota will amount to less than one-third of this total, or 2,250,000 tons. Yet it was Cuba that came to the rescue during the wartime scarcity. While production of domestic producers declined, the Cuban plantations expanded acreage and output, and in the current year are delivering to the American market nearly 4,000,000 tons of raw sugar, making possible the end of domestic rationing. Now Congress says, in effect: "Thanks for the effort, amigos, but you had better abandon a lot of that new acreage, for our own boys are afraid of competition and they have votes."

The quotas given by the bill to the domestic producers, in fact, add up to about 20 per cent more than their average output in the ten years, 1936-45. In addition, they will continue to benefit from the tariff of 75 cents a 100 pounds imposed on Cuban sugar, from incentive payments and subsidies, and from the price maintenance activities of the Department of Agriculture. The domestic refiners are also being well looked after. Imports of refined sugar are limited to 586,000 tons a year, a quota divided between Cuba, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. This provision not only discriminates against foreign countries but imposes an internal embargo operating against such integral parts of the United States as Hawaii. Is it constitutional?

The sugar bill, it is not surprising to learn, was drafted by the domestic growing and refining interests. The Cuban sugar companies, mostly American-owned, were not consulted. They appear, however, to regard the bill as a slight improvement on the 1937 act. Nevertheless, they are faced with very difficult problems of adjustment for, when the world sugar situation returns to normal, they will have a huge surplus capacity. American businessmen and farmers, other than sugar-growers, will also be adversely affected. Cuba is one of the largest foreign customers for American goods, including foodstuffs, textiles and machinery.

As for the ordinary American citizen, the bill hits him twice in the pocketbook nerve; his sugar will cost him more and he will be contributing as taxpayer to subsidization of the industry. He may, therefore, be inclined to ask, as the Wall Street Journal does: "Is there any reason why the producers all along the line should not have their profits limited; is there any reason why they should have the consumer pay for their protection?" Very pertinent questions and ones that apply to other commodities as well as sugar.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Realism Is Not Enough

NO PEACE FOR ASIA. By Harold R. Isaacs. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THE FUTURE OF FREEDOM IN THE ORIENT. By Ralph Coniston. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

VICTORY has been followed by reaction in Asia too. But the reaction, American-supported, is no solution to human problems in Asia any more than elsewhere; it is a phase in the great revolutionary travail of Asiatic society and will be succeeded by other phases even less advantageous to the United States. As we approach the disaster which Asia seems to have in store for us, thoughtful Americans can enjoy the bitter satisfaction of foresight.

Victory in Asia brought reaction because the victors had been too long absent and had fallen behind the march of history. Japan knocked out the sovereign authority of the Dutch, the French, and the Kuomintang over large areas of dense population and at the same time roused popular movements of resistance. What had been "resistance" in war time, however, became "revolution" after Japan surrendered. The sovereign victors could return only by suppressing the popular movements. Britain succeeded in forcing the Dutch and French regimes precariously back into Java and Indo-China. The United States succeeded in bringing the Kuomintang precariously back into Eastern China. These regimes were, after all, allies and sovereign powers.

The return of the victors had a curious pattern. In areas liberated from Japan the liberators found it necessary at first to use the local Japanese troops against the native peoples which were being liberated and whose resistance movements threatened the status quo ante. Later, however, it was possible for the victors to return in force in American ships and planes, using American arms and equipment, with American training, wearing American uniforms, and accompanied by American observers with the American flag.

One result of our being the arsenal of democracy was that the legally recognized governments of the Far East were able to reassert their sovereignty only by using obvious American support to attack the popular revolutions in Java, Annam, Central Luzon, and North China. And so, to most thoughtful Asiatics, the United States no longer means democracy.

This tragedy would have occurred even if Marx had never lived and communism never been invented. It results from the fact that during the war the established pre-war political institutions of colonial and semi-colonial Asia were outdated by the growth of political consciousness and popular organization. While we fought a war, Asia began a revolution. Unfortunately we allowed the tail end of our great military effort to become a counter-revolution.

This tragedy for the American people is heightened by the fact that communism does exist, that it competes for the allegiance of popular movements in Asia, and that the American mood is one of emotional reliance upon our wealth and power rather than an intelligent realization that we are turning the Asiatic half of mankind against us.

Naturally this picture is not all black or white, and many of our best friends, as well as the best people, are fighting the Asian revolutions and clamoring for more aid. It is unhappily reassuring, therefore, to find essentially the same picture presented by two such diverse reporters as Harold Isaacs ("No Peace for Asia") and Ralph Coniston ("The Future of Freedom in the Orient"). Coniston's is a lighter book, more episodic and casual, based similarly on first-hand observation. It reinforces Isaacs's conclusions and finds the seeds of war in every corner of the Orient.

"No Peace for Asia" is a vigorous dissection of the nationalist rivalries which now lead us toward destruction, and the most vivid, and biting, survey which has yet appeared of power politics in the post-war Asiatic spheres of Britain—India, Indonesia, and Indo-

China—and of the United States—China, Japan, lower Korea. Isaacs sees contradictions everywhere. He castigates the British despoiling of India through the decades, which has left the country under-industrialized, poverty-stricken, 88 per cent illiterate, and politically divided. Yet he sees that one factor holding India back has been the conservative weakness of Indian nationalism, "diluted and confused by Gandhi's pacifism and his mystic ruralism." On Indo-China he gives a vivid first-hand account of the cynical Anglo-French attack on the Viet Minh, noting that the latter got its earliest inspiration from the French libertarian tradition.

As for the United States, where we formally "represented a distant dream that would one day spring alive and bring with it felicity for all," we now appear to Asiatics as the foes of social change and the defenders of archaic conservatism. In the Chinese civil war "the United States stands as the committed supporter of one side, the decadent, brutal, incompetent, tyrannical side, whose only visible virtue from the official American point of view is its opposition to the Communists . . . the civil war in China is already in essence a masked border war between Russia and the United States." Chiang Kai-shek has used for his own ends at different periods communism—he was once the "Red General"—Anglo-Saxon democracy, Christianity, European fascism. The New Confucianism which he now espouses was the main enemy of the great nationalist movement through which he came to power twenty years ago.

As for Russia, the internationalism of the Bolshevik revolution under Lenin and Trotsky shifted, under Stalin, "from the radical world view to the conservative national view." Under the tyranny of its new bureaucratic super-class, nationalist Russia has used the potentialities of international revolution to strengthen itself in a thoroughly cynical and self-centered program of self-preservation. That the Soviet fatherland has thus picked up the thread of classic Russian imperialism was demonstrated in the Yalta agreement and the Sino-Soviet treaty, which restored to Stalin the long-lost acquisitions of the czars in Manchuria.

Isaacs uses these contradictions between myth and reality, past and present, to highlight the illness of our society. Years ago he wrote a valuable research monograph, "The Tragedy of the Chinese Revolution," analyzing the Stalinist failure in China in the revolution of 1925-27 from a Trotskyist point of view. Yet he is by no means doctrinaire. Rather, he is too keen a reporter and too sympathetic to the human struggle not to be a disillusioned idealist. His view of the evil forces at work in Asia is a projection of the kind of liberalism which casts a plague on everyone's house, and he documents it till it sticks. He believes we face nationalist war and self-destruction unless there is quickly a "radical change of the whole structure of society," "a new world order" based on internationalism, new world agencies, a new world economy.

I was going to suggest, like the devotees of practical politics, that this disillusioned idealism is not practical, that we must acknowledge harsh realities, understand and discriminate, face our choice of evils and choose the lesser ones. But I am afraid Isaacs is right: there isn't time to go on choosing lesser evils. It only makes them bigger. Realism and arms will not save us without a new attitude and spirit.

JOHN K. FAIRBANK

"Candomblé"

THE CITY OF WOMEN. By Ruth Landes. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THIS tourist account by an anthropologist of a field trip to Brazil is devoted in the main to "candomblé," one of a number of fascinating African survivals in the Western Hemisphere. West Africans brought this religious cult from their homeland when they were shipped as slaves to Brazil, and their descendants are keeping it alive today in a modified form. In the old seaport town of Bahia Miss Landes observed candomblé rituals and came to know a number of the devotees and priestesses who belongs both to the Catholic church and to the Yoruba temples. In the Afro-Brazilian cult Olurun, the Yoruba equivalent of the supreme deity, is worshiped through a series of lesser divinities, or orisbas, who have their counterparts in the hierarchy of Catholic saints, beginning with Oxalá, who has become identified with Jesus. Human communication with cult deities is established through the temple "mother" and through priestesses dedicated to specific orisbas. "The City of Women" describes devotional dances in which temple priestesses achieve a trance-like state during which the gods "enter their heads" and "ride them."

In the orthodox Yoruba temples, according to Miss Landes's descriptions and reported conversations, the hierarchy is matriarchal. Men serve only as ogans, protectors of the temple: those few who become priests and dance are scorned as effeminate types. This emphasis on matriarchy as fundamental to the cult is questionable, however. Other investigators have ascribed the dominance of women in the older temples to their stronger adherence to the "old" or African ways and to their greater willingness to undergo the years of preparatory training.

Some discussion of the "gêge-nago" cults of Africa, from which the candomblé derives, might have been enlightening in this and in other connections, but they are not even mentioned in "The City of Women." They might, moreover, have served as a useful point of departure for investigating the candomblés as part of an acculturation process of West African to Catholic rites and mythology. But throughout the book Miss Landes's interests tend to center rather on the more sensational aspects of candomblé. It is this unfortunate susceptibility to striking surface expressions and imperviousness to sub-surface forces that is the basic shortcoming of "The City of Women." And as an almost inevitable corollary of this tourist approach, the book contains no references to the highly developed West African culture that so deeply conditions current Afro-Brazilian attitudes and beliefs. Yet that heritage of ancient community organization, of profound human and religious values, and of generous acceptance of alien but compatible gods, partially explains the African temples of Brazil. It also provides a possible clue to why the worshippers of Olurun have fully embraced Jesus and his saints with no diminution of dedication to the old gods of Africa.

The Negroes of Bahia and the candomblés have been fairly thoroughly investigated by native Brazilians. In English there is an excellent study by Donald Pierson, "Negroes of Brazil." No new light is shed on the subject by "The City of Women." Its chief value is that it is the first popularly written account of candomblé; but that is no excuse for careless writing and for even more careless thinking.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

Visions, with Trimmings

KINDERGARTEN CHATS AND OTHER WRITINGS. By Louis H. Sullivan. Edited by Isabella Athey. Wittenborn and Company. $4.50.

IN 1946 the Gold Medal of the American Institute of Architects was "presented" to Louis Sullivan, who had been dead twenty-two years. "He attacked entrenched beliefs. He repudiated false standards. He scorned the stylistic gods of the market place." Such prophets we need in every field; in religion first of all, but also in politics, economics, and education. Like Sullivan, they are likely to "fight almost alone in their generation, live unhappily and die in poverty." It is an appropriate tribute to Sullivan's memory that his "Kindergarten Chats" should at last be made available to the general public. These essays are of concern to architects in the noblest sense: master-builders, planners, men who turn needs into visions, visions into blueprints, blueprints into stone and steel. For Sullivan professed that "the study of architecture is a branch of social science—the study of a newly shaping type of civilization."

This tribute is ungrudging. Men of the Sullivan type are the salt of the earth. But our admiration should not be uncritical and translate itself into rhapsodies of the "Fountainhead" type. Nothing is so contrary to the artistic spirit—which I equate with the prophetic—as the slavish worship of the unconventional. As soon as man or formula become the object of a cult, it falls under Sullivan's condemnation.

A free spirit, not shackled by cliques or fashions, must recognize that Sullivan was not a pure victim, crucified by a coarse and stupid generation. He had his chance. If he failed at the end, it was through some inner flaw which was not excess of wisdom or power. Perhaps he needed the cleverer Adler. The Chats are insufferably overwritten. It is curious that functionalist architects should almost invariably, when they write, cultivate the most extreme Baroque. His professional achievements are by no means sensational. There is still a great deal of the Richardsonsque in the Auditorium, and Richardson's style reminds me of a Wagnerian opera: it would have appealed to Hitler. The Wainwright, in St. Louis, is better, although vaguely Egyptian. The excellence of the Carson Pirie and Scott store is purely negative.

Architectural doctrinairism is as bad as all the other forms of that disease, and possibly a little worse. Sullivan, no doubt, has fine things to say about human and dollar values, and about function and form. But there is also on every page an excess of pyrotechnic patter. In so far as architecture is engineering, functionalism in the plainest sense rules supreme; beauty is not an inevitable result but a happy accident. But in art, form and function do not coincide. What on earth is the "function" of a Van Gogh?

Sullivan spurns "logic, scholarship, and taste," and demands "common sense, a thoroughly disciplined mind, a perfected technique, and an abundant and gracious gift of expression"—exactly the same things not so tersely expressed. To be sure, he places first "a poetic imagination," as did Boileau. But an office building requires well-organized floor space, nothing else. His condemnation of the historical styles for modern use involves a fallacy. No doubt a Richardsonsque railway station, like the Union Depot at St. Louis, is an anachronism, a boner on a colossal scale. But it would have been foolish for La-farge and Cram to house a traditional faith in a revolutionary building.

In so far as architecture is art, it has overtones which are not functional but symbolic. And symbol is a language which cannot be created anew by every man. Mallarmé's mysterious Angel could only "impart a purer meaning to the words of the tribe." Sullivan says, and I agree with him, that a Roman temple has no business on Monroe Street, Chicago. But he adds, "Such a structure must of necessity be a simulacrum." All the significant words are Latin. Why does he not talk plain Chicagoese of the twentieth century?

ALBERT GUÉRARD

The Romantic Poet

A CHOICE OF ENGLISH ROMANTIC POETRY. Edited with an introduction by Stephen Spender. The Dial Press. $4.

THIS selection from Blake to Emily Brontë, but mainly the romantic poets of the early nineteenth century—is meant for the general reader (bless him) who finds poetry necessary to his well-being. But even for the person who has read widely in romantic poetry, it is a pleasant book to have around. It contains a sufficiency of the better known poems in addition to some that are not as well known, and selections from longer romantic poems which the general reader has probably not read and which the exceptional reader is not likely to care to read again in full. Shelley and Keats are best represented; Wordsworth and Byron, as Spender says, cannot be anthologized.

Spender's introduction is intelligent and acute, but for all that, not very good. He writes of romanticism too much in the old academic and literary way. That is, his criticism is descriptive rather than historical. The "why?" still remains unanswered. Why nature, why solitude, why fantasy? Why couldn't romantic poets like Shelley give poetic expression to their "prose ideas"? Spender says, "The romantic poet is divorced from history, which he ends by despising." Is he? Why? It seems to me that by locating and defining, no matter how unsurely, a reason why the romantics felt themselves divorced from history, he would have done more to help the reader understand the poems than he has by describing what took place inside the poets and the poems. Significantly enough, he is best on Keats, of all the English romantics the one who sticks closest to poetry and strays least. I was delighted, by the way, to find quoted in full in the introduction (for purposes of contrast) George Herbert's poem Prayer, which ends with the magnificent lines:

Church-bells beyond the stars heard, the soul's blood,
The land of spices, something understood.

H. P. LAZARUS

Films

JAMES
AGEE

CROSSFIRE" is a gruesomely exciting story about some soldiers, one of whom murders a Jew. It is extremely well played by Roberts Young, Mitchum and Ryan, very notably Ryan; by Sam Levene and Paul Kelly; and by practically everyone else in the cast. It is excellently written and directed by John Paxton and Edward Dmytryk, respectively. In part, I don't doubt, because the picture is about something, which everyone making it can take seriously, it is, even as melodramatic entertainment, the best Hollywood movie in a long time. (Chaplin doesn't make Hollywood movies; he makes Chaplin movies.) Much of its more serious stuff, about Anti-Semitism, is very good and very heartening too, but I think the following qualifiers must be recognized: 1) In a way it is as embarrassing to see a movie Come Right Out Against Anti-Semitism as it would be to see a movie Come Right Out Against torturing children. 2) Few things pay off better in prestige and hard cash—granted you present it in an entertaining way—than safe fearlessness. 3) This film is not entirely fearless, even within its relatively safe terms. They have the sardonic courage to preach the main persuaders to a Southern boy, taking painfully embarrassing care never to mention Negroes; but they lack the courage to make that omission inescapably clear to the audience.

Largely because of this film and his recent statement that he believes in making other movies that take chances, RKO-Radio's vice-president in charge of production, Dore Schary, is likely to be regarded by many people as a white hope and a hero. I do not question the

USED, RARE & OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

Over 100 Cooperating Booksellers Thruout the World with Several Million Books Invite Your Inquiries. Mention Interests & Catalogues Are Desired.

THE AMERICAN ANTIQUARIAN BOOKSELLERS
(INTERNATIONAL)
527 S. Melville St. Phila. 43, Pa.

goodness of his deepest motives, and I certainly wish him well; but it may as well be remembered that, at best, Hollywood's heroism is calculated to land buttered side up. Movies about Anti-Semitism aren't so desperately chancy, after all. Millions of people will look forward to them if only for the questionable excitement of hearing actors throw the word "Jew" around; Fox and Goldwyn are coming out, respectively, with "Gentleman's Agreement" and "Earth and High Heaven," and Goldwyn has astutely postponed production, not to be snowed under by his competitors. The murdered Jew in "Crossfire" was a murdered homosexual in the original novel, Richard Brooks's "The Brick Foxhole," and I learn from a reliable source that this quick shift was made, and "Crossfire" was rushed through, in order to jump the gun on the two more pretentious films. I am sorry to spend so much time on such matters, but I suspect they will be generally neglected in the pleasure of awarding Hollywood a sprinting-prize for taking Baby's First Step; and they shouldn't be neglected. All that aside, however, "Crossfire" is an unusually good and honest movie and may—I hope, well—prove a very useful one.

"The Hucksters" comes right out against radio advertising, and in the Hollywood scheme of things this is doubtless much more heroic than attacking Jew-baiters, who are not so well organized as advertising men to fight back. Some of the singing commercials are very funny, and some of the minor characters are drawn with medium shrewdness. Clark Gable seems well at ease, most of the time, but something soft and unfortunate has happened to his mouth; Deborah Kerr struggles prettily but, I'm afraid, rather complacently, against a thorough job of packaging. I dislike the movie as I disliked what little I could read of the book: for I find uniquely nauseating the spectacle of incurable corruption laboring under delusions of honesty.

I agree with Shirley O'Hara of the New Republic that the period of the original "Perils of Pauline" is good for a lot more than patronizing laughter. I am also astonished that so many people find the new "Perils" so howlingly funny. People who can accept such stuff as solid gold have either forgotten a lot, or never knew first-rate slapstick when they saw it, twenty to thirty years ago, when it was one of the wonders of the world.

I am with Miss O'Hara again, and everyone else who knows what a beautiful film could be made about jazz. For years, I wished I might make a movie about New Orleans, centered on Louis Armstrong and his colleagues. I like "New Orleans" because, barring Djon Mil's rather too alligatorish short, it is the only movie ever to show any real feeling for jazz; and because the Negro musicians are much more nearly at ease than is usual in movies; and because of Armstrong, who seems to me one of the most likable people in the world, and certainly as fine a musical talent as this country has ever had. (Some unknown Negroes and whites have developed music even finer.) All the same, the movie is a crime. Not only is it horribly inept and unimaginative in everything that does not center on jazz; the jazz itself is too often cut short, or smothered as background for pictures which fail to carry it out; and as the ultimate triumph, jazz wins over a full-dress audience—which is a little as if St. Francis and his Fifty Thousand Feathered Friends became headliners at the Bronx Zoo.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

RCA Victor has issued Bach's Suites Nos. 2 and 3 played by Koussevitzky with a small group from the Boston Symphony (Set 1123; $5.85). Comparison with the Busch Chamber Players' performances in the old Victor sets is again inevitable. I have only one record of the Busch version of No. 3, containing the Bourré and Gigue played with grace and sensitive contours that are in extraordinary contrast with Koussevitzky's headlong pounding. If I remember correctly, Busch's solo performance of the famous Air is pallid and

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
51st ST.
56th ST.
58th ST.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
23rd ST.

RKO NOW

"RIP-SNORTING WESTERN."—N. Y. W. Tels.
Dennis MORGAN Jane WYMAN

'CHEYENNE'

JANIS PAIGE • BRUCE BENNETT

'HIT PARADE OF 1947'

Eddie ALBERT • Constance MOORE

BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
W. H. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

"TERRIFIC MELODRAMA."—N. Y. Her. Trib.
Humphrey BOGART • Alexis SMITH

Barbara STANWYCK

'THE TWO MRS. CARROLLS'

From the Stage Play by MARTIN VALE

'HIGH CONQUEST'

Ann LEE • Warren DOUGLAS

QUEENS
ALDEN, Jamaica
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kith's
FLUSHING
Kith's
RICH, HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

—Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4256
Eves. 8:40. Mts. Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

Planning to advertise in The NATION?

HERE ARE SOME VITAL STATISTICS!

General Advertising - - $300 per page

Publishers & Local - - 200 per page

(EVEN FRACTIONS THEREOF ON A PRO RATA BASIS)

Classified Display - - $7.39 per inch

Classified - - 74c a line (six words)

MINIMUM THREE LINES

Call or write today for additional data on deadlines and discounts!

THE NATION ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT

Twenty Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

BArdway 7-1066

dull; but Koussevitzky's performance—silken in tone, leaden in pace—is inferior to Toscanini's (in the set of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony), with the continuity of impetus in its quiet flow, the life in its inflection. On the other hand, the Boston performance of No. 2 has clarity, grace, and good tempos (except for a stodgy Polonaise) which enable it to stand comparison with the Busch version—though the Busch remains superior (with things like Moyse's phrasing of the Bourré II, and the subtle accentuation of the accompaniment in the Badinerie and the middle section of the Polonaise). Some of the surfaces in my copy of the new set are noisy.

From London Decca comes a well-recorded performance of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 by the Boyd Neel Orchestra (Set ED-27; $5). It is a good performance, certainly a better one than the Boston Symphony's, but without the qualities—the wonderful relaxation, lightness, and grace, clarity of texture, sensitiveness of rhythm and phrasing—that put the Busch version in a class by itself.

But then I should hate to be Adolf Busch and have the painful experience of listening to those Bach performances of his Chamber Players of a dozen years ago and then listening to the playing of his present-day Chamber Players, and in particular to the performances of Handel's twelve Concerti Grossi Opus 6 now issued by Columbia (Set 685; $28.50). They are stiff and angular in rhythm and phrasing, coarse in sound (partly because of the recording), and rob the music of the attractiveness it has as performed with relaxed plasticity, sensitive inflection, and beauty of sound by Weingartner in the older Columbia sets, which I hope will continue to be available.

Other sets issued by RCA Victor for July: Schumann's Symphony No. 4, the most engaging of the group, played only moderately well by Goossens with the Cincinnati Symphony, and the performance recorded with lack of clarity in detail and poor balance (my copy has some poor surfaces) (Set 1124; $3.85). And two symphonic poems of Franck—the lovely but repetitious "Psyché," and the uninteresting "Le Chasseur maudit"—well-performed by Defauw with the Chicago Symphony, and the performance recorded with enormous sonority and brilliance (Set 1122; $4.85).

Balanchine, we were told, had turned away from Europe; his interest now was entirely in America. And after unsatisfactory experiences with the ballet companies he wanted only what Ballet Society offered (what, indeed, one suspected it had been organized to provide): the opportunity to create and produce ballets with the young dancers he had developed in the School of American Ballet. And yet in mid-season he went off to work with the ballet of the Paris Opera—with disastrous consequences to the remaining programs of Ballet Society.

Its subscribers had been promised a new work of Balanchine, "The Minotaur," which would have carried Bolender's "Zodiac" and Dollar's "Highland Fling" on the third program. But what they got was a "Minotaur" that was the result of getting Taras in to do the job left undone by Balanchine—hardly an example of the "planned collaboration of independent easel-painters, progressive choreographers, and musicians" promised by Ballet Society's extravagantly generous prospectus—any more than "Zodiac" and "Highland Fling" were products of such planned collaboration by their choreographers with their composers and designers—nor were all three works even products of the thorough and complete preparation one expected from Ballet Society. As it happened, Taras's "Minotaur" was the one piece with some originality and interest in its choreographic invention, in which he had help from the strikingly original scenery and costumes of Joan Junyer but not, it seemed to me, from a score by Elliott Carter that was, I thought, completely irrelevant. But Taras's piece was not enough to carry the others, or to rate repetition on the last program, when a repetition instead of Balanchine's "Four Temperaments" would have compensated subscribers for Christensen's "Blackface" and Merce Cunningham's "The Seasons." In the end it was astonishing to see how much like other ballet companies this one had operated, even to the non-fulfillment of promises.

Mr. Hurok contributed the most outrageous instance of that. Having sold out the opening of his spring season at gala prices with the promise of Markova in "Giselle," he waited until the house lights were lowered to have Dolin announce she was ill and would not appear, when he must have known what I had learned accidentally the day before—that Markova had been in bed ill all that day.

But it was only a little less outrageous for the Monte Carlo management to wait until the same time with its announcements of Danilova's illness. Two friends of mine who came to see her in "Coppelia" and were informed they were going to see Krassovska in "The Nutcracker" had paid not $6 but only $2.40 for their seats; but they had got up from bed after gripe and bronchitis to come.

It seems to me that ballet companies, no less than opera companies, owe the public complete and dependable information about casts.

CIGARS

ACCENT ON YOU

with personalized cigars. Rare smoked. Cellophane printed with your name, product, etc.

Does wonders for you socially and in business. For executives, salesmen, clubs, parties, etc.

Three sample cigars and details FREE if requested on business stationery or sent to anyone for 10¢

ACE MAIL ORDER CO.

East Orange 1, N. J.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

SPECULATOR wanted to finance publication of an important new book, by an established publishing company. About $5000 required. Proposition of particular interest to person in higher income brackets. Box 1726, c/o The Nation.

POSITION OPEN

BUSINESS MANAGER wanted for monthly PARTISAN REVIEW, experienced in handling circulation promotion and general business. Apply by mail only, giving background and qualifications. PARTISAN REVIEW, 45 Astor Place, New York 3.

TYPING SERVICE

MANUSCRIPTS EXPERTLY TYPED. Plays, stories, novels, criticisms, rewrite instructions; low rates, prompt delivery. "MANUSERVICE," 109 East 153rd St. ME1956-54993.

SITUATION WANTED

COUPLE (Impecunious writers) want caretaker's position. Time for own work, small subsistence wage, year-round. Box 1725, c/o The Nation.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 1 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order, ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, New York. Farms in the Mass.-New York Berkshires. Also consulting broker for organizations.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515 M.

RESORTS

SILVER CREEK LODGE

Chichester, N. Y. (Phoenicia)

An Adult Resort of delightful hospitality. Excellent American food, immaculately clean. Bathing in idyllic creek directly on property. Baths, hot and cold water.

OPEN ALL YEAR AROUND

Ping-Pong • Horseshoe • Croquet
Relaxing Atmosphere among Congenial People

B. LEIFFELD • G. APPELL Tel.
Owner-Manager Phoenicia 163 F 5

CONGENIAL GUESTS $5.00 DAILY

Ripe autumn colors, soon, will glorify our
"FOREST-FARM-LAKE-MOUNTAIN PARADISE"
Where World-wide Fellowship, with Peace and Plenty, Insures the Goodness of the World-to-Be.

For free picture folder write:
WORLD FELLOWSHIP, INC.
CONWAY, N. H.
(Advance Reservations necessary)

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty and total relaxation. One hour from
New York

ALL SPORTS IN SEASON

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7065

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT

Beautiful Highland Lake, 13 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes; interesting hiking objectives through woodland trails; fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riders, croquet, ping pong, square dancing.

JULY & AUGUST Rate: $55, $60, ■
OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE

STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK

90 miles from N. Y. via N. Y. Central

Charming lake and countryside, rustic surroundings.
Bathing, boating, fishing, other sports. Beautiful walks. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for vacations and weekends.

Adults • Rate: $50

RESERVE EARLY

GRETE POPPER Tel. Stanfordville 2931

CHILDREN'S CAMP

WALTTEL HOUSE

ON FRANKEL

MT. BETHEL, PA.

FARM

Bangor 6273

VACATION FOR ALL THE FAMILY

Modern farm hotel combined with progressive children's camp. 75 miles from New York.
All rooms with private bath. Meat, poultry, dairy products and vegetables from the farm.

Rates: — Adults $40 Week — Children $50 Week
N. Y.: Ella Frankel, 241 East 10th St. LE 2-5864

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it.
Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books.
Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-2

598 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

BUY CIGARS WITHOUT MONEY

Box of 50 "top-of-the-line" cigars, clear Havana blunts, long filler, best smoke yet, pay $6.00 after you smoke the cigars and are satisfied, if not satisfied after smoking a few, send back remainder and pay nothing.

Order today from

ACE MAIL ORDER CO.

East Orange 1, N. J.

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 222 By MR. X.

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the second of six puzzles constructed by Mr. X. The Nation will also print six puzzles constructed by ■ Mr. Y. in competition with Mr. X. At the end of six weeks, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

ACROSS

- 1 Stag dies. Inter or he decomposes
- 10 Cut and run
- 11 Nature is late about the act of producing milk
- 12 Pal for Pauline
- 13 Big corporations reach out in this position
- 14 Shears five beardless boys
- 15 Transmitter about fifty finds slim pickin's
- 16 Just investigate death. O, it's out of the question whodunit!
- 20 Bombs one thousand in rule by hoi polloi
- 23 O, mi nose tells me it's offensive
- 24 Alexander's ragtime band started in the old country
- 25 Can one beast be routed by Krazy Kats?
- 26 The vain ran to oblivion
- 27 Nonunion men

- 6 Create a hundred and accumulate more
- 7 Empowered to be fit into the finale
- 8 Were you so merciful you could compose a saint
- 9 Lament a temper? You must be sensitive
- 17 Bible question in exegesis, to be brief
- 18 Five at the soirée found it rather wearing
- 19 When the SS hide in the trees it gets in your hair
- 20 To me, men are a souvenir
- 21 Carib ad makes a run go
- 22 Influx of soldiers caught in Selective Service act

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 221

ACROSS:—1 SCRAPE; ■ MARTINET; 10 COUPLET; 11 EXACTED; 12 AGILE; 13 MOT; 14 TRAIL; 15 EVENT; 17 EXPLORED; 21 COMPLETE; 23 KNIFE; 26 ACTOR; ■ WIT; 29 SHORE; ■ TACTICS; 31 GARLAND; 32 RELIEVES; 33 APPEAR.

DOWN:—1 SOCRATES; ■ ROUTINE; 3 PULSE; ■ ALERT; ■ TOAST; 7 NITRATE; ■ TODDLE; 9 STAMPEDE; 16 TIP; 18 PRESTIGE; 19 OAK; 20 DEFENDER; ■ OPTICAL; 24 ISOLATE; 25 MASTER; ■ RAISE; ■ WASTE; ■ STRIP.

DOWN

- 2 Inability to get going; i.e. in an uncoupled train
- 3 I suppose I am in an enigma
- 4 Golf ball wobbles on a tee rest
- 5 Kind of bird (probably one dead pigeon)

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 9, 1947

NUMBER 6

The Shape of Things

THE SAGGING PRESTIGE OF THE UNITED Nations has been substantially bolstered by the quick action taken on the Indonesian war. For once, legalisms were swept aside and the Security Council asserted its right to intervene in order to end a breach of the peace. It is significant that the three other colonial powers—Britain, France, and Belgium—backed the delegate from the Netherlands when he questioned the jurisdiction of the Council in a matter which, in the opinion of the Dutch, is purely one of domestic interest. It is also significant that two former colonies, Australia and India, which have gained the status of nationhood, initiated the move to end a "senseless war" and effect a just settlement. We know that in the diplomatic circles of some of the greater powers there is deep concern lest the U. N.'s "precipitous action" has set "dangerous precedents." But in our opinion, what the United Nations needs more than anything else these days is a supranational audacity rather than polite deference to the sacred cows of national sovereignty, particularly colonial sovereignty. The U. N. action does not settle the Indonesian affair. But an important beginning has been made, and it is not a bad sign that the representatives of four old empires are viewing it with alarm.

★

GROMYKO'S VETO, KILLING THE AMERICAN proposal of a "semi-permanent" commission to watch the Greek frontier and try to prevent border incidents, was inevitable after his earlier criticism of the plan as a violation of the United Nations Charter. We take little stock in legalistic objections; constitutional interpretation, even in this well rooted democracy, too frequently follows the dominant political philosophy to allow us any illusions on that score. What is obvious as daylight is Russia's conviction that a U. N. border commission would serve as an adjunct to the American commission in Greece: both being predicated on the assumption that Russia is threatening Greek independence. This premise may or may not be correct, but in either case one could hardly expect Russia to endorse it by approving the commission. Far simpler to veto the plan, and to do so on fairly plausible legal grounds, since the question of Russia's threat to Greece had not, of course, been injected into the discussion.

★

BUT ON THIS ISSUE, AS ON OTHERS, WE think Russia made its fight at the wrong time and with the wrong arguments. A commission keeping its eye on both sides of the Greek border could perform an excellent service for all concerned, even though it came into being as a result of alleged violations by the Balkan states alone. Everybody knows that the frontier has been threatened periodically by nationalistic Greeks as well as by Albanians and perennially disaffected Macedonians. Russia and its Balkan allies should, we believe, have ignored the fact that they stood accused—openly or tacitly—and demanded an international commission instructed to watch for, and act upon, violations from any source. And they should have made their fight on the first indication that the commission was taking orders from London or Washington rather than from Lake Success. Because they failed to do so, and because Russia resorted to the veto instead, their stand has been taken as a repudiation of the authority of the United Nations. As we go to press, the debate is again opening on Gromyko's counter-proposal, certain to be summarily rejected, and the Greek demand for action under Chapter VII of the Charter—the chapter invoked in the Indonesian case. If the United States backs this extreme position, it will do so knowing in advance that another Russian veto is sure. But other states too may hesitate to declare the existence of an outright breach of the peace on the Greek border, since obviously no overt aggression has taken place. The chances are that the question will be submitted in something like its original form to the General Assembly meeting in September.

★

WHILE THE UNITED NATIONS COMMISSION on Palestine, now in Geneva, works on its report for the September meeting of the Assembly, a mounting wave of violence threatens to wash out its best recommendations.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	133
Atomic Progress Report	135
What Britain Faces	136

ARTICLES

Poland Today: I. Reconstruction and Progress by Alexander Werth	137
Hell, High Water, and the MVA by Ernest Kirschien	139
The Audacity of Aneurin Bevan by Robert T. McKenzie	140
Who's a Nazi in Bavaria? by Melton S. Davis	142
Everybody's Business: Latin American Trade Troubles by Keith Hutchison	144
Why Molotov Went Home by Del Vayo	145

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Sartre's Research by Diana Trilling	146
Men Overboard by James A. Wechsler	147
Security and Stimulation by Agnes E. Benedict	148
"Factism" by David T. Bazelon	148
Nazi Economics by R. Richard Wohl	149
American Pattern by Keith Hutchison	149
Records by B. H. Haggin	150

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS	151
------------------------	-----

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 223 by Mr. Y	151
--	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon Literary Editor Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1870, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

In Palestine, terror feeds on terror and grows monstrous. The deportation to France of 4,500 Jewish refugees brought new attacks and new sweeping repressions. The hanging of three Irgunists involved in the jail delivery at Acre, delayed until the U. N. Commission had left the country, sent an impulse of horror through the whole Jewish population—horror accentuated by the boys' youth and the fact that no British lives were lost in the Acre coup. The brutal reprisal-murder of two young British sergeants by the Irgun touched off riots and counter-attacks on the part of the angry British troops. With each new outrage, a settlement based on conciliation becomes less possible. The United Nations, we believe, without waiting for the commission's report, should promptly undertake interim steps to end the rule of violence in Palestine, pending a final solution. International action is needed there, quite as urgently as in Indonesia. At the very least, Secretary-General Lie should again remind the "governments, peoples, and . . . inhabitants" of Palestine of the General Assembly's resolution calling upon them to refrain "from the threat or use of force or any other action" which might help prevent a settlement. The fate of the Holy Land can no longer be safely left in the hands of angry terrorists, in or out of uniform.

★

THE STEEL INDUSTRY'S MANY EXCUSES FOR boosting prices do not stand up too well under examination. It is true that labor, material, and service costs, such as freight charges, have increased considerably since the beginning of this year. But these increases have been offset, to a large extent, by the economies of capacity production. I. F. Stone has pointed out in PM that, in the first six months of 1947, United States Steel's labor and material costs per ton were far less than in the corresponding period of 1946. This comparison may be deemed invalid, owing to the effects of strikes last year. It seems fair enough to point out, however, that the corporation's ratio of labor costs to total sales was 3.6 per cent less in the first half of this year than in the first half of 1945. Big Steel has little to grumble at. For the industry as a whole, profits for the first six months of 1947 compare very favorably with those of any recent half-year, despite the alleged back-breaking burden of costs. In the case of the American Rolling Mill Company, which led the price-hoisting procession, half-year earnings of $3.64 per share look pretty healthy when set against an annual average of $3.23 in the six years, 1941-46. However, the steel companies complain that profits for the second quarter of this year were about 25 per cent lower than those for the first quarter. In view of the fact that the earlier period was one of the most lucrative in the history of the industry, this plaint amounts to an assertion that a wartime profit peak ought to become a plateau.

A NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENT ISSUED BY the American Iron and Steel Institute seeks to make light of the price increases. They will make little difference to the costs of most steel users, it declares: they will add only $11 to the cost of an automobile, 65 cents to that of a refrigerator, $5 to that of a farm tractor, $25 to that of a five- or six-room house. The suggestion seems to be that makers of most products containing steel might very well absorb the increased costs and so prevent any addition to the cost of living. Certainly, most consumer-goods manufacturers are making profits on a scale that would enable them to do this, but that isn't going to prevent a number of them from passing on the higher price of steel on a cost-plus basis. General Motors has already done so, with additions of $58 to $168 on various models. Obviously, such increases cannot be justified solely by reference to higher steel prices, and C. E. Wilson, president of General Motors, cited rises in other materials and in wages when announcing his price boost. We note, however, that General Motors sales in the second quarter of this year were up 17 per cent compared with the first quarter, while profits rose 24 per cent. That means profit margins have expanded despite the April increase in wages. It appears that General Motors, like many another industrial concern, is basing its prices, not so much on costs, as on the good old principle of charging what the traffic will bear.

★

BEFORE CONGRESS ADJOURNED, SENATOR Glen Taylor treated his colleagues to a Will Rogers version of the Cataline oration. In a good-humored, joshing tone that dragged smiles even from the Republicans, he revealed that his junior colleague from Idaho, Henry Dworshak (a close friend of Hamilton Fish), had engaged in a cynical game to corrupt the state's press and flout the rules of Congress. Last year's La Follette-Monroney act gave every Senator an additional $10,000 a year for staff assistance. Senator Dworshak decided that he could get along without the extra help and that the money could be better employed to subsidize junkets to Washington by friendly Idaho newspapermen. Naturally, their readers were not informed of this arrangement. They were told only that their editor "was spending a few weeks in Washington writing of national affairs," and that the man who bestrode the Capitol like the Washington Monument was none other than their own Henry Dworshak. Dworshak, the visiting editors discovered, was the Senate's most industrious budget-cutter; its most intelligent statesman, its hardest worker, its most fearless leader. The refrain never varied, although the writers changed every month. Finally, an invitation came to the editor of the Statewide of Boise. He did not answer by mail. He answered in his editorial column, and he denounced the scheme as "venal" and "corrupt." Taylor read the editorial on the Senate floor, with interpolations of his own. It remains to be seen what an economy-minded Senate will do about Dworshak's ingenious misuse of public funds.

Atomic Progress Report

NOW, for the first time since the Lilienthal-Acheson report, we have before us a document—or, rather, a series of documents—on atomic control that gives us some reason to hope that a chance of international agreement remains open. The groups that have been quietly working away in Committee 2 of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission released last week a number of papers describing the progress made since the commission issued its first large report at the end of last year. The papers represent the work of individuals, rather than national representatives. But we have reason to believe that there is substantial agreement on the conclusions that have been reached. Unfortunately, the representatives of Russia and Poland took little, if any, part in the preparation of these reports. However, certain legitimate objections of Mr. Gromyko appear to have been met and some of his positive suggestions embodied.

What the collection of material gives us is a much clearer picture of what an operating international atomic-control agency would look like. The basic outlines of the Atomic Development Authority—as proposed in the original American plan—are not essentially changed, but a detailed discussion of its powers and functions goes a long way to dispel various misgivings held not only by Russia but by a number of other nations.

It is recognized that the international agency must possess wide rights of ownership, operation, and inspection in the field of nuclear energy. But it is also recognized that "the nations could not be expected to agree to give unlimited discretionary powers to the international agency." The agency would own the source of materials of atomic energy "after separation from its place of deposit in nature," but it would not own the mines. Nor would the agency determine the amounts of nuclear fuel to be developed in each country. Provisions to govern "the location, mining, production, distribution, and use of source material and nuclear fuel, as well as dangerous facilities," would be written into the treaty or convention. "It would then be the duty and responsibility of the international agency to implement these provisions in accordance with the terms of the treaty or convention." In regard to the assignment of quotas for the mining of uranium and thorium, it is recommended that the "treaty or convention should embody the principle that comparable national deposits throughout the world should be depleted proportionately."

Even in the matter of inspection, the international agency is not given a completely free hand. "It is obvious that no feeling of security could be established in the world if nations could reserve the right to prohibit access to certain parts of their territory. But exercise of the right to make full investigation would be subject to various procedures, according to the nature of the territory or the building inspected." The possible delay occasioned by the requirement of a warrant must be balanced against "the need for protecting the personal right of freedom from unreasonable search." The whole investigatory function—from the original and occasional surveys to locate deposits of uranium and thorium, through the inspection of mining, processing, and developing operations, to the inspections and surveys to detect clandestine activities—is gone into with great thoroughness. The nation and the individual are guaranteed against abuse of the power of the international agency, just as the private citizen of a democratic state is guaranteed against the abuse of police power.

One of the most interesting and imaginative papers deals with the question of research. It is a paper which will bring little comfort to those brass hats in Washington who want to give back to the army full control over atomic energy. After indicating the necessity of research being carried on by the international agency, as well as by national bodies, the report says:

The final test of the value of the international agency is that it should prevent national rivalries in atomic energy which would lead to war. National rivalries breed in secrecy. The success of the international agency will depend to a very large extent on its ability to open scientific knowledge in the field of atomic energy to the world, with a full, free, and constant exchange of scientific knowledge. . . . There are no limitations on human thought, hence there can be no secrets as far as ideas are concerned. It is by control of the actual materials, not by the prohibition of research, that their misuse can be prevented; the strict control of all potentially dangerous materials must be the central objective of the agency. Once this is fully achieved, the futility of secrecy would be evident, and there could be full publication of research and full international collaboration among the scientists.

We have become used to thinking of the atomic world as a prison. The best we hoped for was to have friendly and reliable wardens who would keep us safe if any of the other prisoners ran amuck. These Atomic Energy Commission reports suggest that our world may turn out to be not too dreary a place after all—with a ban on secrecy, a respect for individual rights, and the first prize given for the freest discussion of the brightest ideas. They even suggest values higher than security and that's more than most of us have dared to grasp at during the last two years, dating back from this August 6.

What Britain Faces

ABOUT the time this issue of The Nation appears, Prime Minister Attlee will be presenting to the House of Commons the British government's plans for meeting the rapidly developing financial crisis. Signs and portents of that crisis have been multiplying in recent weeks. Record drafts, totaling $700,000,000, were made in July on the American loan, leaving a balance of only $1,000,000,000. British exports are still expanding, but are hardly in sight of the point at which the deficit on international payments would be wiped out. Moreover, as Keith Hutchison points out on page 144, the growing scarcity of dollars is encouraging the widespread restriction of imports and hitting British as well as American goods. Coal production in Britain continues to lag, and it is increasingly unlikely that this year's target of 200,000,000 tons—the bare minimum for essential needs—will be met. On the London Stock Exchange, prices of industrial stocks and government bonds alike have slumped heavily.

Another factor in the situation is the dispersal of Congress without any plans for a special session in the fall. This has made it clear to Britain that, whatever the ultimate fate of the Marshall proposals, no new American contributions to European recovery can be counted upon before 1948. And by that time, barring drastic measures, the American and Canadian loans would be fully spent and a start made on the dissipation of Britain's last-ditch gold reserve.

It is interesting to note that some influential British commentators believe that postponement of hopes of further American assistance has a positive value. While such hopes lingered, they feel, neither the nation nor the government was ready to face squarely the grim facts of Britain's situation. Now there can be no further evasion; the tight belt must be pulled in several more notches. The government has been getting plenty of advice about how to achieve this end, both from its back-bench supporters and from the opposition. Particular stress is laid by the former on shrinkage of the armed forces, cutting down luxury imports, and deflationary fiscal measures such as taxation of capital gains. The Tories, who have been blowing hot and cold on austerity, agree that imports must be cut but are apt to object strongly to any particular cut. They are almost certain to oppose both worthwhile reductions in the armed forces and new taxes.

Facing the task of slicing overseas expenditure by 25 per cent, the government is likely to take leaves from both books. Mr. Attlee outlined his plans this week to a private meeting of the Parliamentary Labor Party and, it is reported, fully satisfied his back-bench critics. That must mean that he has agreed, in part at least, to their proposals for speeding up demobilization and sharply reducing garrisons abroad. As a result, some economies in the use of foreign exchange for the maintenance of foreign service troops will be possible and, what is more important, many men can be returned to production.

Action of this kind will have, of course, political as well as economic implications. What will be the effects of halving the British garrison in Germany, of withdrawing all British troops from Greece and Italy? What will happen if Britain fixes a date for pulling out of Palestine altogether? What will be the result if Britain declares its inability to contribute to the German food program which is eating heavily into its dollar resources? These are all questions that both the American government and the American people need to ponder deeply. Our policies have been based on the assumption that Britain could maintain itself as one of the Big Three. Now it has reached a position where commitments of that status are beyond its means.

Britain's sacrifice of international prestige and authority will certainly be accompanied by more immediately painful sacrifices at home. Present imports must be slashed even though almost any cut will come near to the bone, for food and raw materials form the vast bulk of Britain's foreign purchases. Some luxury food-stuffs can be omitted, but they are a minor item. Film imports are likely to be drastically reduced. Foreign travel allotments are due for sharp trimming. But when these more obvious economies have been made, imports will still be too heavy for Britain's purse, and it is difficult to see how basic food supplies can be maintained at their present level. One way or another, the British seem destined to pass from a lean to a tender diet.

Will they take it, these people who have been patiently taking it in one form or another for so long? We believe that they will, subject to two provisos. The government must lay all its cards on the table, making it crystal clear just what the crisis means and how it can be overcome. The government must stick firmly to the principle of equality of sacrifice; it must not ask for abstinence from the British workers and allow the fruits of that abstinence to be reaped by private enterprise.

Poland Today

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

I. Reconstruction and Progress

Warsaw, August 1

OF ALL the war-scarred countries of Europe, Poland has made the most remarkable recovery.

It is the more impressive because the destruction in Poland was greater than in any of the other occupied countries, with the exception of the occupied parts of the Soviet Union. Moreover, Poland has been "shifted" several hundred miles to the west, and has had to assimilate large new territories. The loss of the non-Polish territories in the east is not greatly regretted—except for Vilno and, especially, Lwow. Few Poles really felt that the Ukrainian and Byelorussian lands—the areas of the great estates—were an inalienable part of Poland. But Poles today are unanimous in agreeing on the excellence of the Oder-Neisse line. Poland "looks good on the map"; it forms almost a regular circle; it is compact and, with the loss of the eastern lands and the expulsion of the Germans from the west, it has no longer any of those minority problems which weakened Poland between the two wars. The westward shift has changed the whole basis of Poland's economy; it will no longer be a great grain-growing country. Instead, it will become one of the major dairy-farming, stock-breeding, industrial countries of the Continent; and it is felt that, in the balance, Poland will have gained.

The people have a sharp urge to make a success of their coherent and economically harmonious country. Six years of the most humiliating and brutal occupation have demoralized Poland less than almost any other nation in Europe, Russia not excepted. In France, the occupation, though shorter and less horrible, had a deeper and more pernicious effect. This Polish vitality and a sort of innate optimism are among the factors that explain Poland's recovery. Another is the indisputable efficiency of the government. Thirdly, UNRRA's $500,000,000, and Swedish and other relief activities, have been important aids.

Not that the Poles were not demoralized, at first. When I was in Lublin in 1944, nearly everybody was leading as degrading a black-market, hand-to-mouth existence as during the occupation. I saw Poland again in the summer of 1945. The country was still in a state of deep political ferment and near economic chaos, though order was gradually beginning to take shape. But Warsaw was a heap of rubble; so also were Gdansk (Danzig), Poznan, and the newly acquired Wroclaw (Breslau); the railroads were almost entirely out of commission, due to the wrecking of bridges and the lines themselves, and the lack of rolling stock. Even the miners of Silesia were very poorly fed, not to mention the urban population generally. There was still a powerful underground, and little internal security. There was some banditry then, even in the streets of Warsaw and Cracow, and the country was just beginning to face the baffling problem of what to do with the large western territories from which most of the Germans had been expelled. At that time, I saw the first Polish settlers on the Neisse; they had come from around Lwow, and with little or no cattle or inventory, they looked wretched and bewildered. All around them, for miles, there was nothing but abandoned German farms. Today, four million Poles have been settled there, and the area has become perhaps the greatest showpiece of post-war Europe. The ports of Gdynia and Gdansk, then completely wrecked, are now almost restored.

ALTOGETHER, the change in two years has been striking. Traffic of goods on the railways is greater than in pre-war Poland; though passenger carriages are still short, freight cars are more numerous than before 1939. Many of these are German, but many others—along with the locomotives—have been built by the great rolling-stock works at Wroclaw, the restoration of which was, somewhat in the Russian style, proclaimed to be the proudest achievement of Polish industry in 1946.

You see feverish reconstruction activity everywhere: the miners and railwaymen and textile workers have labored with immense devotion; land reform has passed off quite smoothly. There are still food shortages and, worse still, the after effects of past food shortages of the 1939-46 period. Seven per cent of Warsaw's population is tubercular. But though many people are living most miserably, especially in some of the large towns, Poland does not rank as one of the very hungry countries of Europe. (Even so, the State Department's decision to stop post-UNRRA relief is a severe blow.) And perhaps most important of all, there is today almost complete internal peace in Poland.

I traveled in a car all over Polish East Prussia and large parts of Byalystok province—areas which a year ago were considered highly dangerous. Now, seldom anything unpleasant happens there. The amnesty in February virtually ended the activity of the rightist bands—that underground which for a long time was being encouraged so foolishly by certain Allied diplomats in the name of "democracy." Nearly 60,000 men laid down their arms and went back to civilian life. The government believes that most of them have given up the struggle for good—though the police no doubt continue to keep an eye on some. The amnesty was decisive in putting a formal end to the bands, but their disintegration was already foreshadowed by the rapidly diminishing support they were receiving from the peasants, who had grown more and more tired of the civil-war atmosphere the bands were creating in many parts of Poland. There was also a growing consciousness among the peasantry, as among all other Poles, that the government was "getting things done." Though the government may not be loved—indeed it is disliked by the greater part of the peasantry, the small shopkeepers, and, of course, the "disinherited" classes—it commands very great respect.

Some will say that Poland has recovered "in spite" of the people in power, but everyone knows that the organizing ability of the government and its clearness of vision have been just as important as the hard work done by the workers and peasants. A striking feature is also the relatively high efficiency of the bureaucracy. Poland's new planned economy has created many difficult problems, but the officials I interviewed never showed any signs of vague fumbling. They were precise, to the point, and produced facts and figures at a moment's notice. I was struck by this even in small-town cooperatives and among minor officials working under the wojewoda (provincial governor). Many of these were young men who had more or less wasted their time during the occupation. The Poles have a natural quickness, and intelligence well above the average. The Communists are particularly hard-working and efficient—on the whole, a good deal more so than their Russian opposite numbers.

And it must be said that Polish Communists give the impression of being Poles first and foremost, Communists only next, and pro-Russians last and sometimes not at all. Many say that they want Poland to acquire certain but by no means all of the features of Soviet economy. A large number of Poles are attracted to the P. P. R. (Communist Party) because it has the best organizing brains at its head. It is significant that many of the P. P. R. ministers were at first as eager as the others to respond favorably to the Bevin-Bidault invitation to come to the Paris conference on the Marshall plan. But that is another story.

Of course, the Polish Government is not strictly democratic, according to Western standards. Although no government spokesman will admit it, many a government supporter will confess that the election was not "quite straight." But he will use this argument: "It was a question of whether Poland was to rise from its ruins or not. Were we to leave the decision to a few million ignorant, priest-ridden peasants? Were we to have a Mikolajczyk government, followed before long by a completely reactionary government, which would have inevitably bred internal strife? There would have been no planning; there would have been chaos similar to what you have in Greece; and, in the end, the Russians, for their own protection, might have brought irresistible pressure to bear on Poland, if not actually occupied it. We had to seize the chance to show what we could do with Poland, and before very long we are going to be gratefully accepted by the majority of the people."

[Mr. Werth's next article will describe Poland's planned economy and the achievements of its Communist Minister of Industry, Hilary Minc.]

Hell, High Water, and the MVA

BY ERNEST KIRSCHTEN

St. Louis, July 28

THE big street-cleaning trucks, moving along hub to hub, have washed the last reminders of the worst Missouri River flood since 1844 from the cobble-stoned levee at St. Louis. But above and below the city, for hundreds of miles, the corn fields are still covered by alluvial mud. Farmers are shoveling silt out of their homes and spraying houses and outbuildings with disinfectants. The ruined crops of their bottom lands are typical of the losses which, according to the United States Soil Conservation Service, ran to more than $900,000,000 in the three states of Missouri, Iowa, and Illinois alone. This includes $491,000,000 worth of topsoil washed out of America's bread-basket and sluiced into the Gulf of Mexico.

Exclusive of topsoil, floods have cost the Missouri Valley more than one billion dollars in the last forty-five years, according to the Weather Bureau and the Army Engineers. But excepting the 800 lives lost, it is the stripping away of the crop-producing soil that is the great tragedy. Nor is this of concern merely to remote posterity. A rich farming section can be destroyed in twenty-five years. Of this, there is evidence enough in the Missouri valley. The region long has been declining in productivity and population. With major floods now virtually an annual occurrence, it is time for a new approach to the harnessing of the Big Muddy, one that will stop this heavy drain on the resources of the nation.

That approach has been demonstrated in the valley of the Tennessee. Experienced engineers are sure that the TVA idea can be applied to the much larger Missouri basin. The valley's decline can be checked only by a regional authority, with full control over irrigation, flood prevention, power development, and the intelligent exploitation of natural resources. The late President Roosevelt was an ardent supporter of the MVA idea, but his successor has given it only lip-service. Even the latest floods were not enough to move him beyond that.

Mr. Truman spoke highly of the MVA idea at a recent press conference, but a few days later, when he asked Congress for increased appropriations for immediate work on the Missouri, he fell back upon the old pattern of divided authority which has been more successful in setting one federal agency against another than in solving the problems of the valley. He proposed a ten-year program with an expenditure of $250,000,000 in the next twelve months, urging that this be authorized without taking time to decide whether or not a valley authority should be created. That he dismissed as an administrative detail. It would be enough, he said, to allow the work to be taken over by such an authority some time in the future.

What the President urged on Congress is a stepping-up of the so-called Pick-Sloan plan. This sprang from a marriage of convenience, hastily contracted between the Army Engineers and the Interior Department's Bureau of Reclamation in 1944, whose purpose was to head off the first drive in Congress, by Senator Murray of Montana and the late Representative Cochran of Missouri, for the incorporation of a Missouri Valley Authority. Few have questioned the personal competence of the authors of this "plan," but any success they may have in coping with the Missouri will come in spite of the administrative hodge-podge in which they must work. Since the turn of the century, more than $500,000,000 has been spent on the river, with little now to show for the money except the determination of the various agencies to maintain their interests in the stream and its valley. The Pick-Sloan plan has not put a stop to bickering between the navigation-minded Engineers and the irrigation-minded Bureau of Reclamation. The argument as to whether the Garrison Dam in North Dakota should be high or low is one example of the disagreements that crop up.

There are also other federal agencies, including the Department of Agriculture, the Federal Power Commission, and the Department of Commerce, which exercise some measure of authority in connection with the river. Differences are supposed to be worked out through the Missouri Basin Interagency Committee, made up of representatives of the various agencies and the governors of the valley states. The rather infrequent meetings of the committee, however, are little more than debates. It has not the power to push a unified plan. There may even be differences within its constituent agencies, since these are not organized on a valley-wide basis. And, of course, all of these agencies are headed up, in Washington, by men with many other concerns beside those of the Missouri valley. Simply to contrast this divided, inefficient set-up with that of the Tennessee Valley Authority in Knoxville, is to emphasize TVA's superiority. The Missouri Valley needs a similar agency, located in the valley, working with the people of the valley for a common solution of the problems of the valley.

ERNEST KIRSCHTEN is editor of the editorial page of the St. Louis Star-Times.

The chief opponents of the MVA idea are the private power interests, the railroads, cattlemen with their eyes on public lands, and such old-line pressure groups as the Mississippi Valley Association, the National Reclamation Association, and the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. These are always ready to defend their favorites among the established agencies. In doing so, they defend their own pork-barrel interests up and down the river. Their chief stocks in trade are (a) the silly argument that MVA is "communitistic"—though even the New York Daily News favors it; (b) that methods successful in the Tennessee Valley cannot be used in that of the Missouri; and (c) that there is no MVA plan, so that the choice between this idea and the Pick-Sloan plan is a choice between a pipe dream and a blueprint. The knowledge is spreading through the valley, however, that these propagandists are less devoted to the Pick-Sloan plan than they are opposed to MVA. There have been hints that they are ready to drop the one as soon as they can be sure that the threat of the other has been eliminated.

These facts—plus the mounting toll of an uncontrolled river—is gradually building up substantial support for MVA in the valley. The idea is also gaining distinguished editorial support throughout the United States. The Washington Post recently pointed out that the bill for the Midwest's rampaging rivers in a single season is almost as great as the total cost of the TVA; the paper emphasized that, through the sale of power, TVA pays an annual dividend of about $10,000,000 into the Treasury, in addition to its other benefits. So the Post concluded that the time has come to apply the same principles to the Missouri, instead of leaving it to the haphazard patchwork of the past which often has controlled the river at one point only to make it more dangerous at another.

This argument, pointing as it does to better crops and more factories for the valley, seems so logical that it is a little difficult to understand how even the current Republican Congress can resist it. But the resistance is as real as the flood damage, real enough apparently to convince the President that this is not the year to put up a fight for MVA. Still, as one watches a third Murray bill gathering dust, one recalls that it took the late Senator Norris fifteen years—from 1918 to 1933—to win his campaign for a TVA. Each time the flood waters rise in the valley of the Missouri they teach their lesson more explicitly and more expensively. It is inconceivable that it should be indefinitely ignored. With ever wider understanding of the promise of a Missouri Valley Authority, surely the American people will not let their bread-basket be turned into a desert.

The Audacity of Aneurin Bevan

BY ROBERT T. MCKENZIE

NO FIGURE better represents the vigorous sincerity of British socialism than Aneurin (pronounced "A-nye-rin") Bevan, Minister of Health, who is also responsible for the government's housing program. Till 1945, his seemed to be the stormy career of the permanent dissenter. A pure proletarian type, he emerged from the pits of Wales to become a hero of the intellectual left. Expelled from the Labor Party in 1939 for his advocacy, in defiance of the party executive, of a popular front against Chamberlain, he spent most of his energies during the war years assailing the Churchill coalition for its refusal to overthrow vested interests in the prosecution of the war and for its willingness to override British liberties in the name of national unity. Churchill, in turn, coined some of his most searing phrases in his repeated denunciations of the irreconcilable Bevan, referring to him as "this squalid nuisance" and "the chief architect of disloyalty in war time."

As a member of the Labor government, Bevan has developed into a brilliant Socialist administrator and parliamentarian. Commenting on the speech in which he presented his National Health bill to the Commons, the Manchester Guardian conceded that he was the ablest orator in the House, Mr. Churchill not excluded. The authoritative and well-informed Economist, in reviewing the first year of the government's work, acknowledged that Bevan's reputation had risen more rapidly than that of any other Cabinet minister except perhaps Hugh Dalton, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

These tributes are the more surprising when one recalls that Bevan, the son of a coal miner, was a shy, bookish boy troubled by a severe stammer. He is the youngest member of the government, having been born in 1897. At thirteen, he left school to work in the pits, but he always read voraciously, particularly in the field of philosophy. He might almost have been the prototype of the young hero in Emlyn Williams's "The Corn Is Green," for his earliest opportunity for self-education came through the interest taken in his intellectual development by the librarian of the Tredegar public library. He gradually overcame his stammer by throwing himself with Welsh enthusiasm into street-corner debates.

ROBERT T. MCKENZIE has recently returned to Canada after two years in England, during which time he acquired first-hand information about the British Labor movement and its leaders. He is now assistant director of the Canadian Association for Adult Education.

While he was still in his 'teens, Bevan left the pits to study at the Central Labor College. When only nineteen, he was elected chairman of one of the largest miners' lodges in South Wales. After some years as a union agent, he was elected, at thirty-two, to the House of Commons. With this working-class background, he might have been expected to become a leader among the trade-union members, who form the conservative wing of the party. Instead, they soon came to look on him as a rather dangerous firebrand, never restrained by party or union loyalties from attacking ineptitude or fatuity wherever he found it. For some years, he edited the Tribune, a London weekly which under his direction became the most forthright Socialist critic of the Churchill coalition.

After the Communist Party had pursued its revolutionary defeatist line through the winter of the blitz in 1940-41, and the popular front had become a dead issue, Bevan reapplied for readmission to the Labor Party. He had the wit to realize that however irksome the requirements of party loyalty, a British Socialist had no future outside the party. When the cautious Attlee, long the butt of Bevan's assaults, came to form his government, everyone was eager to see how he would handle the party's brilliant Welsh problem child. Would Clem leave "Nye" Bevan outside the Cabinet and run the risk of his becoming a dangerously effective critic, or would he take him into the government and risk his becoming a belligerent and perhaps irreconcilable member of the team? Attlee, with more audacity than most people expected, not only put Bevan in the important post of Minister of Health but gave him in addition the vital and enormously difficult job of heading the housing drive.

As Minister of Health, Bevan had the delicate task of reconciling the widespread popular demand for a full program of state medicine with the deep suspicion and hostility of the British Medical Association to such a proposal. His success to date has startled his most devoted admirers. He has piloted through the Commons with consummate skill a bill to promote what is probably the most comprehensive system of virtually free public medicine that has ever been established in a democratic society.

The National Health Service Act, which goes into effect in July of 1948, establishes a universal health service—under the National Insurance plan but subject to no limitations in benefits. This service includes general practitioner and specialist treatment, hospitalization, drugs and medicine, eye examinations and spectacles, dental treatment and dentures, hearing aids, and ambulance service. All the present voluntary and public hospitals will be reorganized into a publicly owned hospital system to be administered by regional hospital boards. The doctors are to be permitted to decide whether or not they wish to practice under the act, and patients may choose their own "family doctor." Doctors entering this scheme will be remunerated by a combination of flat basic salary and "capitation fees" based on the number of patients who voluntarily register with the doctor.

The British Medical Association, representing by far the largest body of organized medical practitioners, long claimed that the scheme would do irreparable damage to the existing doctor-patient relationship and that arbitrary powers would be left in the hands of the Minister of Health. During December, 1946, the association took a poll of its members on the question whether it should enter into negotiations with the Minister regarding the implementation of the act. Forty-four per cent voted in favor of negotiations and 56 per cent against. But in January, the B. M. A. resoundingly reversed itself, by a vote of 252 to 17, and agreed to negotiate with the Minister "on condition that the possibility of fresh legislation was not excluded."

As head of the housing drive, Bevan must deal with the toughest domestic problem the government faces. Of the 13,000,000 dwellings in Britain at the outbreak of war, 210,000 were totally destroyed, 250,000 rendered uninhabitable, and almost 4,500,000 damaged. In addition, of course, repair and replacement, and the long overdue slum clearance which might have been carried out in the past seven years, were left undone. And the housing drive must be undertaken in the face of acute shortages of man-power and housing materials. All parties have agreed on an immediate target of 750,000 houses which must be built quickly.

The most recent figures—to May 30, 1947—show that 210,874 new houses have been provided, of which 89,131 are permanent and 110,029 are temporary—that is, aluminum or other structures intended to last for not more than ten years. About 10,000 war-damaged dwellings have been completely rebuilt and some emergency huts provided for government workers and others. No one, not even Bevan himself, is completely satisfied with these figures. The Conservatives assert that Bevan, out of doctrinal prejudice, has hamstrung the work of private builders. Bevan replies that his first concern is for the less well-to-do sections of the population, in whom the private builder is not particularly interested; consequently, he has given every encouragement to the local authorities to plan permanent houses to rent to the working classes. So far, the only claim Bevan makes is that he "will wager any amount" housing will not be a major issue when the government comes up for reelection in 1950. No one in the Labor Party has suggested that anyone else would have tackled the problem with more vigor and imagination or less respect for vested interests.

Aneurin Bevan

In temperament, Bevan is robust, full of good humor and the most spontaneous friendliness. Few public men are so little awed by rank or pretensions or so genuinely interested in the activities of the most humble. As for his home life, he has literally found that in politics, for he has married one of Britain's most brilliant women M. P.'s, Miss Jennie Lee—no one dares call her Mrs. Bevan. Miss Lee had a political career well under way when she married "Nye," and on her return to the Commons in 1945, she regained, on a completely independent basis, her role as one of the most vigorous and forthright Socialists on the back benches. It may not be altogether an accident that "Nye" is widely considered to be the voice of the back benches within the government.

Like many another Welshman, Bevan has been a frequent victim of his own sharp tongue and his ability to coin a bitter phrase. In a warm personal discussion, he frequently talks himself into the most impossible positions or delivers himself of quite unforgivable denunciations of those with whom he disagrees. In the House, he has of late largely overcome this habit. As a minister, he increasingly relies on a closely reasoned argument or trenchant refutation of his political enemy's case.

If the government runs into really deep water with any of its nationalization proposals, and appears to falter in its intentions, then watch "Nye" Bevan. He is the natural popular leader of the party in a crisis. Should "MacDonaldisim" ever show its head in the Cabinet, Bevan, yesterday's firebrand, might be tomorrow's Prime Minister. After all, he still has twenty or twenty-five years of political life ahead.

Who's a Nazi in Bavaria?

BY MELTON S. DAVIS

HERBERT GESSNER was a commentator on Radio Munich, which is operated by the U. S. Office of Military Government for Bavaria. Being young, ardently anti-Nazi, and an excellent legman, he dug up all sorts of facts and figures which, to put it mildly, did not always reflect well on the C. S. U. (the Christian Social Union).

One of his targets was Dr. Anton Pfeiffer, chief of the Special Ministry (for denazification) of Bavaria. The former chief, a Communist, had been eased out of the job for several reasons. No one denied his zeal or his honesty, but his ineptitude in administration, his inability to persuade Bavarians to convict their own people, and the increasing strength of the C. S. U. vote forced the issue. Pfeiffer, a strong C. S. U. man, took over the job. He was an able administrator, but according to Gessner—and others—his zeal was a little open to question. Gessner charged that the Pfeiffer family had been quite comfortable under the Nazis; in fact, one of the boys had belonged to the S. A.

Denazification Minister Pfeiffer, said the commentator, had dismissed anti-Nazis from government positions but had kept party members on the pay roll. One of his key prosecutors used to do the same kind of work for the Nazis in Berlin.

In one internment camp run by Pfeiffer, members of the denazification court and the inmates they were trying lived together. Nazis and men who might be called neutral Germans, neither pro- nor anti-Nazi, sat on most of the denazification boards, though the Law for Liberation from National Socialism specified that cases were to be heard by anti-fascist Germans.

Finally, Gessner, in a burst of indignation, threatened to resign if Pfeiffer did not. Thereupon the entire German Cabinet of Bavaria, sensitive souls all, sent in their resignations. But in a supposed attempt to bolster self-government in Bavaria, Military Government accepted Gessner's resignation and refused the others. Brigadier General Walter J. Muller, head of M. G. in Bavaria, told the Cabinet that they would have to get used to press and radio criticism.

It was about this time that General Clay made his statement about the disgraceful handling of denazification after it had been turned over to the Germans. Württemberg-Baden was satisfactory; Greater Hesse was not too bad; this obviously left Bavaria and Pfeiffer. Pfeiffer admitted that from 60 to 80 per cent of the sentences were far too light. As a matter of fact, the MELTON S. DAVIS, a free-lance writer, was formerly in the Military Government in Germany.

American Military Government's quite lenient policy on denazification was 76 per cent too harsh for the Bavarians. They completely exonerated more than three out of every four public officials cited by the United States as having been such thorough Nazis that they must immediately be removed from office.

The International Committee for the Study of European Questions reported in February of this year that in Bavaria, "out of nearly a million dossiers drawn up against the Nazis, nearly 950,000 had not been examined at the beginning of the autumn of 1946." The subjects of most of the others had either been acquitted or had served their light prison sentences by that time.

A flurry of activity followed the issuance of the report. Men who had been staunch Nazi Party members, even S. S. members, were put in the mild "follower" classification and fined 500 or 600 marks ($50 or $60).

FOLLOWING its victory at the polls, the Christian Social Union held a party conference. Dr. Josef Müller, who had been ordered before a denazification board, was reelected head of the party. Pfeiffer was chosen as C. S. U. candidate for the office of Minister President, but refused to run. Müller was then nominated but failed to get a majority. Finally, the fifty-nine-year-old Hans Ehard, a moderate C. S. U. member, was elected.

Dr. Ehard has an interesting background. During most of the Hitler regime, he was president of the Erbohofgericht, a court which handles entailed estates, and senate president of the Oberlandgericht of Munich, all under Nazi supervision. He was elected with the help of the Economic Reconstruction Party (Wirtschaftliche Aufbau Vereinung) of Dr. Alfred Loritz.

This group, which is rapidly taking on a bully-boy coloring, was characterized by Delbert Clark in the New York Times for June 1 as a "fascist-spirited collection of malcontents surprisingly reminiscent of Hitler's original crew . . . whose announced program includes most of the fundamental principles on which fascist governments are based." At one of their meetings, a press-association photographer was barred and members attempted forcibly to take his camera away. Loritz said, "The almighty power of the press must be broken."

Yet Loritz was appointed Denazification Minister by Ehard; Loritz, whom a Reuter dispatch last year (November 12) called "Bavaria's new Führer." Almost immediately, he filed a number of indictments against widows. Among them were Frau Siegfried Wagner, whose husband was director of the Bayreuth opera, Frau Erich von Ludendorff, Frau Himmler, Frau Göring, Frau Fritz Sauckel, Frau Wilhelm Frick, and Frau Hans Frank. Two wives of imprisoned Nazis were also on this list, Frau Baldur von Schirach and Frau Funk, wife of the former Economics Minister, Walther Funk. Emmy Göring is too ill to walk, let alone appear. Frau Himmler is in an insane asylum. However, Frau Sauckel was tried. She was fined 1,000 marks, the black-market price of a carton of Lucky Strikes.

The four civilian internment camps, which were turned over to the Germans in March, have been under Loritz's supervision. As soon as Bavarians were in charge, the number of escapes shot up. At Regensburg, there were twenty-six escapes in thirty-seven days. Under the United States army, there had been not a single one. The Regensburg camp has been called a "Nazi paradise." An investigation by the Bavarian government revealed that the adviser to the camp denazification board was a former major general in the S. S. The people interned there—former Nazi big shots and members of the nobility—were running the camp, and ordering around the Germans who were supposed to be supervising them. The latter were paid in American cigarettes. Large-scale smuggling, bribery, and counterfeiting of American occupation scrip, ration cards, and passports went gaily on. The Berlin Telegraph, a Socialist paper, sarcastically noted, "You have to admit that the Nazis have good connections."

One of Loritz's assistants, since resigned, recently admitted that hundreds of thousands of amnesty certificates had been issued to persons not entitled to them.

On June 1, the International Committee for the Study of European Questions issued another report on the Nazis in Germany. Again, Bavaria was singled out for censure. Though the situation had not stirred Military Government to action, it proved too much for Loritz's own followers to swallow. On June 21, they moved to oust him from the chairmanship of his Economic Reconstruction Party. Three days later, Minister President Ehard finally fired him.

The International Committee's report charged that the Bavarian Ministry of Agriculture alone had five former members of the Nazi Party in key posts. The Minister of Economics, Dr. Zorn, courageously defended his people by putting the blame on the D. P.'s, whom he called "the most vicious of the insects that infest the German body." Another member of the democratic Bavarian Cabinet is Dr. Alois Hundhammer, leader of the monarchist and separatist groups in the C. S. U. As Minister of Education, he has just reintroduced the caning of school children.

Munich's cafes are full of unemployed. In the Cafe Rheinland, an active black market is carried on at about half the tables. Young men in their twenties frequent the cafe, and if you listened you might hear them talking about Hugo Männer, whose body, wrapped in a gunny sack, was recently found in the Isar Canal. He had had the temerity to testify against some of Bavaria's Nazis.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Latin American Trade Troubles

IT IS not only United States trade with Europe that is threatened by scarcity of dollars. Our Latin American neighbors, who have enormously increased their purchases from this country since the war ended, are beginning to eye their diminishing reserves of gold and foreign exchange with some alarm, and are taking steps to reduce the demands on them. Thus, within the past three months, Argentina, Brazil, Columbia, Peru, Ecuador, Chile, Uruguay and Mexico have all moved to cut down imports of foreign goods.

Yet in contrast to Europe, Latin America as a whole was able greatly to improve its financial position during the war. Its minerals and other raw materials were in almost unlimited demand at high prices and, in some countries, the United States spent large sums directly on the construction and maintenance of airfields. At the same time, imports were held down since, with American and British factories concentrated on war production, the manufactured goods which Latin America normally imports were simply not available. Consequently, most nations south of the border enjoyed "favorable" trade balances and were able to build up their reserves of gold and foreign currencies, including dollars.

The wartime boom in Latin American exports, however, had its unhealthy aspects. It led to a great expansion of incomes and currency circulation at a time when supplies of goods, and particularly imported articles, were very short. The natural result was an inflationary rise in prices.

By V-J Day, Latin Americans were relatively well supplied with cash and eager to spend it. The new rich, who had profited from the war boom, were eager customers for American automobiles and refrigerators; workers wanted textiles, foodstuffs, and pots and pans; industrialists were in urgent need of tools, steel, chemicals, and so forth. During the war years, factory and transportation equipment had been worn out or become obsolete. Moreover, the economic difficulties arising from the conflict had stimulated the desire for greater industrialization, and nearly all Latin American countries had plans for the fuller development of their resources.

When civilian goods began once again to roll off our production lines, Latin American buyers crowded the sales office. In a very short time, a complete shift in the wartime pattern of trade had occurred. In 1945, our purchases from Latin America still overbalanced shipments by $360,000,000; in 1946, we had an export surplus of $340,000,000. But this was only a beginning, for, in the first three months of this year, our exports to Latin America exceeded imports from there by no less than $402,000,000. Should this deficit continue at the same rate throughout the year, it would mean a draft on Latin American reserves of $1,608,000,000. Since, at the beginning of 1947, these reserves amounted only to some $5,000,000,000, it is clear that the current rate of exhaustion cannot safely be maintained.

The situation is all the more serious, from the point of view of most Latin American governments, because they have been exchanging their assets for consumer goods, rather than for the capital items they require to strengthen their national economies. Of course, all the world is clamoring for goods of the same kind—steel, freight cars and locomotives, power-house equipment, pipe, machinery of every sort. Domestic needs are far from being filled and only a trickle has been available for Europe. According to Washington officials, Latin America has, in fact, been given preferential treatment in export allotments. Be that as it may, the supply of capital goods has fallen far short of demand, while United States exporters have been able to offer increasing quantities of automobiles, electrical appliances, textiles, cosmetics, drugs, and other consumer goods.

Latin American planners have thus some reason to fear that, by the time it becomes possible to procure machinery without difficulty, their resources may be dissipated. That is why a number of countries have recently placed embargoes on some non-essential imports, or limited the amount of foreign exchange made available for their purchase. Brazil, which is following the second of these techniques, gives priority exchange-licenses to machinery, raw materials, and other industrial goods, and forces importers of less urgent items to wait their turn. Argentina has banned automobile imports until the end of the year. Mexico has embargoed foreign automobiles, radios, refrigerators, fine fabrics, jewelry, cosmetics, and furs, and raised tariffs on canned fish, rayon, flashlights, buttons, and a number of other articles.

While some of these measures may have been inspired by the desire of local manufacturers for increased protection, they are, in the main, justified by the yawning gap between exports to and imports from the United States—a gap which must be reduced if a real financial crisis is to be avoided. The most satisfactory way of achieving this end would be an expansion of Latin American exports. But while sales to this country have improved somewhat in the first five months of 1947, there seems little hope of an increase comparable to the increase in imports. Moreover, two measures just passed by Congress tend to discourage Latin American exports. The sugar bill, which I discussed last week, is certainly going to reduce Cuban purchasing power, while continuation of subsidies to low-grade mines is likely to diminish somewhat the demand for Latin American metals.

What about increases in exports to other parts of the world? Is it possible for Latin America to earn additional dollars by greater sales to Europe? Unfortunately, most European countries are being forced to cut imports to the bone and many of them, in any case, can only pay in currencies which cannot be converted into dollars. Besides, the steps taken to block off North American imports serve equally to restrict imports from Europe. For instance, if Chile bans our automobiles, it must also—in order to avoid discrimination—refuse to buy British and French models. This, in turn, reduces British and French ability to purchase Chilean copper and nitrates. In the present lop-sided state of the world economy, the principle of equal commercial treatment for all nations, desirable as it is in normal times, may tend to reduce the total volume of international trade rather than to increase it.

Del Vayo—Why Molotov Went Home

IN MY last article, I said that the only alternative to the present disastrous two-worlds policy was to refer to the United Nations the problem of reviewing Europe's economy, which should never have been removed from its jurisdiction. This proposal makes sense only if we assume that Russia is prepared to cooperate in the reconstruction of Europe. If, on the contrary, we believe Moscow has no intention of cooperating under any circumstances, United Nations action is meaningless—but in that case, Bidault might have spared himself the trouble of inviting Molotov to Paris.

Contrary to the theory that Molotov came to the conference determined in advance to say no, I suggest he was inclined rather to say yes, and that an agreement "in principle" to a joint effort for Europe's rehabilitation had been approved in Moscow. I cannot identify the source of my information, but I think I can reconstruct what happened in Paris on July 1 and explain why Molotov packed his bags, after a telephone conversation with Moscow, and quit Paris, along with his eighty-odd experts.

So far, the public has been offered two reasons why Molotov went home. The first blames Bevin for having failed to include the Russians in his exploratory discussions with France. The British Foreign Minister changed his tactics only after Bidault informed him France would not join in calling the Economic Conference unless the Soviet Union were invited to participate from the start. The British attitude was hardly calculated to win initial Russian good-will. The second reason has to do with the question of inventories: an important aim of the Paris conference was to obtain from all the member countries a list of the resources at their disposal for fulfilment of the Marshall plan. The Soviet Union was reluctant, it is said, to make public its whole economic situation at the possible cost of its bargaining position.

But there is still a third explanation, the most important one—Germany. If my information is correct, what happened was this: the Soviet Foreign Minister discovered that Washington had already, in advance of the meeting, drawn its plans for the "leveling-up" of German production. He learned that Marshall was resolved to make Germany the keystone of his whole program. All this without consulting any of his allies except the British.

Of course, Molotov had known all along that an influential sector of official Washington saw eye to eye with General Clay, who favored putting the Western zone on its feet again regardless of previous agreements among the occupation powers. As far back as last summer in Moscow, I heard Russian officials discussing Clay's intention. The Americans, I was told, apparently looked upon Germans as potential allies and were ready to use all sorts—the list of persona grata ranged from wily old crooks like Schacht to exalted Socialist patriots like Schumacher. Molotov didn't need to travel to Paris to learn that the ace card of the stop-Russia strategists was a strong Germany.

However, it was possible for him to hope that, since the German settlement was scheduled for discussion at the Foreign Ministers' conference in London next November, it would not be incorporated into the Marshall plan without discussion. Nor did he expect that the rebuilding of Germany would take precedence over that of the nations Germany had destroyed. His discovery that the plan of European economic cooperation was predicated upon the Clay directive made Molotov decide to pull out, even at the risk of having to accept responsibility for "splitting Europe." In the light of Russian tactics ever since San Francisco, his abrupt departure was for most observers an inexplicable volte-face. The solemn Paris Monde noted with surprise that "for the first time, Soviet diplomacy has been lacking in suppleness." Molotov chose to be inflexible rather than to proceed on the basis of an accomplished fact which carried with it the danger of assisting in the revival of a Junker-fascist Germany.

That Molotov was not merely seeing ghosts in Paris is confirmed by the words of former Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles, in the Herald Tribune of July 29:

A few days ago, the State, War, and Navy Departments issued a directive to our military commander in Germany to carry out a new plan that would raise industrial capacity in the American and British occupation zones far above the limits set by the Potsdam agreement. It was only after the French government had protested vehemently, and after the British had indicated their reluctance, that the State Department instructed General Clay to postpone enforcement of the industrial plan until the Paris conference had rendered its final report.

In this atmosphere of multilateral distrust, only the United Nations could prevent an early rupture over the question of aid to Europe. Yet the world organization was ignored, first in the Truman Doctrine, second in the Marshall plan, and third in the directive to General Clay. Clark M. Eichelberger, speaking for the American Association of the United Nations, proposes that the Marshall plan be administered by the U. N. Economic Commission for Europe. That is where it properly belongs.

Some have argued that it would take months for the Economic Commission to set up adequate aid machinery; that not a single day can be lost when, to quote Mr. Bevin, Europe lies "bleeding to death." But the most optimistic forecasts do not set the date for Congressional action on the Marshall plan much before February of next year.

Some have argued that the United Nations is too weak, that the job requires determination and aggressiveness. To them, I repeat what I used to tell critics of the League of Nations: a world organization can only be as strong as its parts. Weakened by the crisis of 1938, the League could still have rallied and stopped Hitler had England and France chosen to make use of its machinery. Instead, they went to Munich. By-passed until now, the United Nations can serve to restore Europe without dividing it. If the primary aim of the Marshall plan is to defeat Russia without going to war, the United Nations is of no use. If its aim is to rebuild Europe, the United Nations is the proper instrument.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Sartre's Research

THE AGE OF REASON. By Jean-Paul Sartre. Translated by Eric Sutton. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE AGE OF REASON is the first novel in a projected trilogy, "Roads to Freedom," by the leader of the French Existentialists; the second, already published in France, is promised in English translation later this year. What Sartre gives us, so far, is a canvas of the forlornness—to use a term we frequently encounter in the writing of the Existentialists—of modern man. Huddled together in the Paris of 1938, on the eve of the war, is a group of middle-class bohemians committed to nothing and connected with nothing in life—Mathieu, a professor of philosophy; Marcelle, his self-invalidated mistress; Daniel, a tortured homosexual; Boris and Ivitch, brother and sister, devotees of infantilism; Lola, an aging café singer and drug addict. This central circle of "The Age of Reason" is touched by another series of modern types—Jacques, Mathieu's fascist-minded bourgeois brother; Brunet, a Communist; Sarah, a maternal Jewess who takes too much pleasure in helping her troubled friends.

None of these people is heroic; each is the victim rather than the master of his fate. Only Brunet is firmly organized around a purpose, and only Mathieu suggests the possibility of a significant moral change in the future. In this first volume of his trilogy, that is, Sartre has done no more than lead his patients into the theater and describe their symptoms. He has convinced us that his world is very sick, but he has not yet prescribed a cure. For this, we must either await the succeeding volumes or refer to his other work.

We have been told that Sartre's fictional method has been influenced by Dos Passos. But even a summary listing of the characters in "The Age of Reason" should indicate the unsoundness of pressing the connection. Dos Passos's social canvas is obviously much broader than Sartre's. Dos Passos also commands a much higher vantage in relation to his characters. Then, too, there is much more event in Dos Passos's novels than in this book of Sartre's, the whole of whose external action hangs upon the fact that Mathieu's mistress has become pregnant and must either be allowed to bear her child or be provided with the money for an abortion. "The Age of Reason" is, indeed, claustrophobic in its limitation of movement and action: we recognize that this mood expresses Sartre's belief that only an understanding of the true meaning of freedom allows man to escape the increasing pressures of life. The characters in "The Age of Reason" talk obsessively about freedom. They may mean anything from a refusal of the responsibility of marriage, to political quietism, to Gide's acte gratuit. From Sartre's other work, not from anything he tells us in this book, we know that these are all false interpretations and that by "freedom" he means the taking of a full responsibility for our own lives, and that his notion of responsibility goes so far as to reach the categorical imperative of Kant: we must always act as if our choice should be the rule for mankind.

Much closer than any resemblance of Sartre's method to that of Dos Passos is, I think, its resemblance to the microcosmic method of the early Aldous Huxley, where the miseries of a small, especially exacerbated segment of society—the society, roughly, of the author himself—is taken to stand for the whole modern dilemma. And this is not the sole respect in which "The Age of Reason" brings Huxley to mind.

Behind Huxley's present religious position there stretches, of course, the history of a long search for an authority in life. It is only in his last novels that Huxley has openly personified this authority in a strong father-figure, who is a sort of earthly liaison to God. But it has always been clear that his need of a something to which man might cling was actually the need for a someone; and what we have watched, as his ideas have evolved, is the process by which the real physical parent-person has been transformed into an ideal parent-person, the alchemy by which parental flesh has been changed to parental spirit. Before Huxley could permit any authority to the father, he had to rid him of body. The sexual disgust and confusion from which his characters have always suffered is primarily a disgust with the sexual parent; it is only resultingly a disgust with themselves.

One must be struck by the similarity between the sexual atmosphere of "The Age of Reason" and that of Huxley's novels. None of Sartre's bohemians is sexually at peace, each fights his sexual impulses. It is in the sexual sphere, in other words, that Sartre centers the conflict between good and evil in life. Like Huxley's books, "The Age of Reason" is heavy with unpleasant reminders—bad tastes in the mouth, self-inflicted bleedings, vomit, body odors—of the kind of dominion the body can exercise over the spirit. And all the characters are concerned in some unsatisfactory child-parent relationship: Boris, Ivitch, Daniel all look to Mathieu as to a father; Mathieu's own crisis has to do with his fear of parenthood; Daniel "solves" his homosexual problem by assuming the incongruous role of father to Mathieu's child. The deep sense of separateness from which these people suffer is actually an alienation from the parents in whom they could once have placed full confidence, an alienation which we are given evidence to believe has a sexual source.

Here the analogy to Huxley must sharply end. Where Huxley goes on to replace the authority of the physical father with the authority of God the Father, and His saintly representative on earth, Sartre remains rigorously atheistic and—as we know from his other writings—incorporates all authority into the individual himself. Where Huxley's philosophy ensues in passivity, the Existential philosophy insists upon man's involvement with his time.

And yet, there seems to me to be a large suggestiveness in the common emotional ground from which the two take off—the fact that Sartre, like Huxley, is so concerned to destroy the parental figure of authority. Huxley has found another authority to substitute for it; might it not be possible that Sartre will need to do the same? While one hesitates to conjecture that perhaps the very fierceness of the Existentialist protest against authority disguises a longing for it, we recall that Heidegger, the German Existentialist, became a Nazi, and we take note of the fact that the Communist Brunet in "The Age of Reason" is given, almost all unconsciously, a quite different moral quality from the other characters. Huxley chose God; might not the Existentialist choose the State—the proletarian dictatorship, say, though not the fascist dictatorship? Might not the final act of freedom be the free choice to give up all purely personal freedom?

In his little volume, "Existentialism," Sartre acknowledges his "distress" that God does not exist to give man "essence," and thus his inescapable moral values. "Everything is permissible if God does not exist," he quotes from Dostoevski. But we need be neither theists nor without moral principle to refuse to erect ourselves, with Sartre, into the first, final, and only source and repository of all values. For to do this is surely to place an insupportable burden of responsibility upon ourselves as individuals and to be tempted, as experience teaches us that the overburdened individual is always tempted, to seek some external organization, theological or political, which will take the weight from us—this, or else to be entirely incapacitated for action.

As an artistic performance, "The Age of Reason" is rather more than competent. I especially like its relaxed command of language, its easy movement between the colloquial and the educated idiom. Its chief interest, however, is as a document in an extraordinarily interesting moral research.

DIANA TRILLING

Men Overboard

THE DARK SHIP. By Richard O. Boyer. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

THE MANY AND THE FEW. By Henry Kraus. The Plantin Press, Los Angeles. $2.50.

BOTH of these books purport to fill the very real need for honest, close-up writing about American trade unions and their members. Boyer's volume is subtitled "an account of the life and times of a sea-going trade union, of the pioneers who built it and the men who maintain it on the globe's seven seas." George F. Addes and R. J. Thomas sign a preface to Kraus's book in which they call it "a simple story of simple people." In both cases, the blurbs are deceptive. Both authors—Kraus to a lesser degree than Boyer—have written tracts that are about as persuasively realistic as the hostile pictures of trade unionism distributed by the National Association of Manufacturers. Kraus is infinitely less artful than Boyer. But it is Boyer, because of an unhappy accident of history, who gives the show away.

The occupational hazards confronting a journalist who follows the Communist Party line have been frequently and painfully revealed. Few recent cases are as gruesome as that of the author of "The Dark Ship." Some readers may recall that, not many months ago, Mr. Boyer, who splits his personality between the whimsical headquarters of the New Yorker and the orthodox office of the New Masses, contributed a profile of Joseph Curran, president of the National Maritime Union, to the New Yorker. It was an ardently affectionate work, a labor of proletarian love. These pieces, it develops, formed the basis for a large section of the book on the maritime union which Mr. Boyer has now published. But disaster struck at just about the time the book was going to press. Curran became a "renegade." He turned and bit the Communist hands that fed him and proclaimed that the Communist Party was practicing its familiar strategy of "rule-or-ruin" in the N. M. U.

Mr. Boyer's dilemma probably calls for pity rather than polemics. He had valiantly attempted to present the N. M. U. as the creation of a bunch of ordinary working stiff, with poetry in their souls, politics on their minds, and simple devotion to their fellow men in their hearts. According to this romantic tale, Joe Curran was nature's nobleman, around whom all this virtuous business revolved. But suddenly, in the closing pages, the tone shifts. Harry Bridges, who has remained devout, emerges as the hero of all maritime endeavor. As for Curran, Mr. Boyer suggests strong doubt that the build-up in the preceding pages was justified. On page 299 he writes:

Some months later this unity of the seven maritime unions that had paid off so handsomely in increased wages was faced with dissolution as a result of Curran's charge that the coalition was dominated by Reds. In the serious union struggle that followed, charges of "Red" and "agent of the bosses" were hurled with an abandon which could only please N. M. U.'s enemies. But the N. M. U. is a democratic union and the rank-and-file, in the last analysis, will decide whether the unity gained after such a long struggle was profitable or harmful. It is the rank-and-file which will decide in their own good time whether the unity that gained them the largest raise in the history of the industry was a Moscow plot or action in the best interest of the membership.

So this saga of the sea ends in a swamp of party-line gibberish. The man overboard is named Curran. Needless to say, Boyer makes no attempt to examine the nature of Curran's charges against his former Communist associates or to explain why "Big Joe" finally lost patience. The whole performance gives the book something of the quality of a trick mystery story, for the villain turns out to be the guy nobody could have suspected in the first two hundred pages.

Kraus' ideological paralysis is more candid. His subject is the historic General Motors sitdown strike of 1937. But in his own author's introduction, he writes:

The question of interpretation rose most sharply perhaps in the treatment of such an individual as John L. Lewis. The author would certainly not excuse the conduct of this man during the war nor his surrender of principles which he did much to energize in the early days of the C. I. O. Yet he does not regard the outstanding role played by Lewis in this narrative, based as it is on incontestable fact, as a contradiction. It is his firm conviction that the social entity rather than the individual is the determining factor in history. . . .

Whatever this means, it probably explains the wooden, lifeless representation of the struggle at Flint which Kraus offers. Unlike Boyer, Kraus makes a genuine, if awkward, effort to avoid flagrant factionalism in choosing his favorites. But the "people" to whom the book is ostensibly dedicated are totally overshadowed by his passionate desire to write a "pro-union" book, dramatizing the glories of "unity" in the labor movement. The lives of trade unions and their members are unhappily more varied and complex than Kraus is prepared to admit in public. And his story throws strangely little illumination on the sad internal struggles that have followed the United Automobile Workers' bright hours of triumph. It is an unrevealing chronicle, like a collection of newspaper clips adorned with a few intimate scenes of young unionists at the barricades.

The literature of contemporary labor battles remains meagre and unsatisfying. But it can only be written by men whose imaginations transcend party lines and house-organ stereotypes.

JAMES A. WECHSLER

Security and Stimulation

CHILDREN OF THE CUMBERLAND. By Claudia Lewis. Columbia University Press. $2.75.

THIS book is a significant contribution to the study of child development. Its title is misleading. It is a regional study, and an extremely interesting one, but it is a great deal more. It is an analysis of the effects of two vastly different environments upon young children—that of Sommerville (the name is fictitious) in the Cumberland mountains of Tennessee, and that of Greenwich Village in New York City.

The general approach of the book is clearly stated by the author when she says in the introduction that it is for those "who like to speculate on the sources of human personality and behavior." Results are not final; the methods of study used are not those of pure science. In this fact lies one of its distinctive values. An examination of children, not in offices or other "controlled" surroundings, but in their natural habitat, has certain definite advantages. And a presentation of them, not as series of reactions, but as living, breathing human beings, also has advantages. Subjective interpretations of human behavior may be as valid as objective interpretations. And Miss Lewis combines rare sensitiveness and deep insight with considerable literary skill.

She grapples here with one of the most fundamental and baffling questions facing educators today, the relative value for children of emotional security—of love and a sense of belonging—as opposed to an environment conducive to achievement, to learning. On the whole, the Sommerville children had security but very little else. They were loved. They did everything—from driving the cows home to attending funerals—with their parents. Each child was sure of his place in the group; he had no need to feel jealous of the others. But their homes were ugly, crowded cabins, barren of elements that stimulate curiosity or the urge to do or to make, that develop a sense of beauty, or that make demands on powers of adaptation.

The Greenwich Village children had what the Sommerville children lacked—stimulus, variety, relatively rapid change, and the need to make adjustments. But many of their parents were too taken up with their own affairs to give them the time and attention they needed. Nor were they given sufficient chance to become active participants in the life of the home.

The Sommerville children were relatively easy to handle in the nursery school; they were compliant and offered a minimum of rebellion against adult authority. The Village children were high-strung and more difficult, but they were also more eager, more alive, more responsive. They were both more aggressive and more creative.

Making allowances for complicating factors, Miss Lewis concludes that if city children could know more of the security of the Cumberland children, theirs would be the better environment, since it would do more to develop latent capacity and to stimulate adjustment on a high level.

I myself would question whether the Cumberland parents—living on a bare subsistence level, many of them on relief—really gave their children security. And for this reason, I think Miss Lewis may have overestimated the negative influence of the lack of stimulation in the rural environment. But despite this and other limitations, the value of the book is unquestionable. Educators tend to place too much emphasis on programs and to slight the importance of human relations in the classroom; psychologists are prone to minimize the place of achievement and to lean too heavily on the factor of emotional security. This is one of the few books which seek to give due consideration to both factors.

AGNES E. BENEDICT

"Factism"

FREEDOM OF THE MOVIES. By Ruth A. Inglis. The University of Chicago Press. $3.

THIS doctor's thesis, sponsored by the Commission on Freedom of the Press, is a significant achievement: it manages to keep the fascinating subject of movie censorship completely submerged under a flood of facts and homilies which are, in some mysterious way—I grant the author—related to the question of movie censorship. Sociological "Factism" here creates new values in the middle strata of meaninglessness. The technique for devoting eight years to research, and ending up with little more consciousness than was contained in the material of research itself, is as follows: a) always assume that a new idea is wrong; b) when it is obviously correct, treat it as a presumption. When it is no longer possible to maintain the fiction that the other fellow's point of view may be right, forget about right. But whatever happens, never be subjective! Subjectivity, not money, is the root of all evil. And if it is also the root of all good—well, one makes sacrifices.

"The problem as regards the movies is only an individual instance of the general question which has puzzled philosophers and statesmen for centuries: How can the public will prevail and order be maintained and, at the same time, dissident minorities have their proper influence for change? (Two other publications of the Commission . . . discuss the problem in general terms.) The problem is one of devising social mechanisms for achieving these results."—This is sociological factism in its naked essence: the notion that "mechanisms" are capable of achieving "results." It is subjective will that achieves—anything. Mechanisms achieve only themselves. One is either identified with the public will that "prevails," or with a "dissident minority." This is the entire point, this identification. Miss Inglis thinks it presumptuous or superfluous to take sides, so she has written a book that is competent, but dull.

However, the book contains numerous facts; and one of the most interesting is that the formula that lies at the core of the motion picture Production Code (which was written by a Jesuit) is one of "compensating moral values." That is, a bad lawyer is balanced by a good lawyer; if an unhappy marriage is presented there must also be a happy one; guilt, suffering, punishment must follow upon the commission of any unconventional sexual or aggressive act. In this way, the conservative morality buttressing the status quo is preserved, without ignoring modern life-experience. But, naturally, both morality and life take on a fundamental ambiguity. The Code adheres not to the truth of life but to "morality." What is this morality which admittedly contradicts reality? It seems clear that it is nothing but the unnailed sword.

When morality no longer grows out of the necessities of life, that morality is something no self-respecting person will respect.

DAVID T. BAZELON

Nazi Economics

PRIVATE INVESTMENT IN A CONTROLLED ECONOMY: Germany, 1933-1939. By Samuel Lurié. Columbia University Press. $3.

ONE of the most powerful pieces of Nazi propaganda, which achieved great public acceptance in the pre-war period, was the picture presented of its economic miracle. The Germans boasted that they had achieved a "crisis-proof" full-employment economy. Mounting indices of production and apparent increases in wages were used to advertise the regime. Dr. Lurié, in his crisp, lucid study of the investment pattern, exposes these claims. Real wages, he shows, were kept down by freezing wage rates at the level of the 1933 depression. The long-run pattern of the German economy, he concludes, had to find outlet in war, which "was an inevitable stage in the dynamic evolution of the 'New Economic Order'."

The Germans, while abandoning the automatic regulatory function of the market, retained to a very large extent the free enterprise pattern of ownership and motivation. The basic pattern allowed for control over prices, the wages and mobility of labor, the supply of money and credit, and, finally, over the forms of industrial organization. In this last sphere, in fact, some entrepreneurial organizations were mere extensions of state administrative control. Cartelization was fostered, and in some cases compelled.

The direction of investment was achieved through control of capital formation, and by keeping a close rein on the credit and banking facilities which were, in time, aligned with the economic objectives of the system. Initially, the Reichsbank was used as the source of public credit, and as the springboard of investment control. A distinctive feature of the system was the self-financing of business enterprises which were allowed to accumulate funds of capital in the form of hidden reserves, by means of excessive depreciation allowances or other accounting fictions. These were variously applied according to the needs served by the given business in the national plan.

The question has often been argued whether or not the Nazi economic system, as it developed, meant the destruction of the capitalist ownership of industry. According to Dr. Lurié, the system of free enterprise was kept largely intact. Indirect "steering controls" were employed, but "coercive measures played a relatively minor role . . . the carrying out of public policies was done primarily through the channels of private economic motivation." This implementation of state programs, moreover, was "frequently associated with substantial profits to the private interests involved."

Though Dr. Lurié's style is a trifle turgid at times, his study is well documented from original sources, coherently organized, and carefully presented. It deals with an important subject which ought to be of interest to the layman as well as the professional economist.

R. RICHARD WOHL

American Pattern

THE MARCH OF FREEDOM. By William Harlan Hale. Harper and Brothers. $3.

CONFESSING that he had forgotten most of the American history he had once learned, Mr. Hale asked his publisher to let him "start at the beginning, at the bottom of the class, and write the story of what I find out." This "layman's history of the American People" is proof that he did his homework diligently and enjoyed himself thoroughly into the bargain. It shows evidence of extensive and varied reading and it is written with a gusto that communicates itself easily to the reader. As a refresher course in American history, I can recommend it enthusiastically.

Mr. Hale is a pragmatic liberal whose acid test of government is its responsiveness to the popular will. In the American march of freedom, as he sees it, there have been many halts, retreats, and wrong turnings. "Sometimes," he writes, "the people triumphed and at other times they failed and receded, and then the next generation had to pick up the pieces and start all over from there. And they did pick up the pieces: that struck me as one of the great patterns of American life." This is a cheering message for the dog-days of reaction provided, as the author says, that the American past is regarded "not as a benign recollection but as a precept to renewed action."

KEITH HUTCHISON

SEND FOOD TO EUROPE • Reliable, Quick Service!

No. 78—3 lbs. coffee, 1 lb. milk powder, ½ lb. tea.....	$4.55
No. 79—2 lbs. butter, 1½ lbs. bacon, 1½ lbs. corned beef.....	$7.20
No. 80—1 lb. egg powder, 2 lbs. fruit jams, 1 lb. sweet cocoa.....	$5.50
No. 81—10 toilet soaps, 3 lbs. soap powder & flakes.....	$4.25
No. 82—1 lb. chocolate bars, 1 lb. hard candies, 2 lbs. dried fruits, 1 lb. rice.....	$4.60

Write for Further Information and Price List. P. O. Receipt on Request

An additional 33¢ postage on packages to Austria, Hungary & Russia

J. KOHLS ~ PERSONAL PARCEL SERVICE

315 WEST 102nd STREET

NEW YORK 25, N. Y.

Academy 2-3844

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

ADDITIONAL London Decca recordings I have heard include one of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony performed by de Sabata with the London Philharmonic (Set ED-19; $15). From it I have learned more about de Sabata as a musician—that he is capable, as Toscanini is not, of occasional eccentricity or perversity, like the incredibly slow pace of the first movement; but also that he is able to maintain in the music, even at that pace, the sustained continuity it must have. After the first movement there is just a very fine performance in the usual tempos (there are, I must add, some discontinuities of pace at the breaks of the records). The recorded sound is dull, and the winds are much too weak.

As far as I am concerned there has been only one reason for listening to Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé"; and that has been Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony. But now I have heard a performance by Münch with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra which I judge—from what it sounds like as it comes off the London Decca records (Set ED-29; $7)—to be fully the equal of the Boston. That is, as it comes off the records it has all the miraculous refinement and subtlety of coloring of the Boston performance in Carnegie Hall (which the Boston doesn't have on the recent Victor records). In other words, it is marvelously recorded, with only a slight edge to the violins and a little high-frequency distortion at climaxes.

The first movement of Brahms's Third Symphony, as performed by van Beinum with the London Philharmonic (Set ED-22; $11) is too stolid, the finale over-deliberate; and the second movement, which begins as the Andante it should be, is spoiled by too many changes of pace. The recorded sound is clear but not lustrous with the wide-range Brush pickup, and best with one of limited range like the Zenith.

Some of the fine Tchaikovsky music that we hear in American performances of "Swan Lake" (the introduction, the swan queen's solo, the dance of the four cygnets), together with some that we don't, is well-performed by the National Symphony under Sidney Beer; and the recorded sound is very good except for a slight edge to the violins (Set ED-11; $5). Also, some of the music from Tchaikovsky's "Sleeping Beauty" that we have heard in performances of "Aurora's Wedding" and "Princess Aurora" (the introduction, the Bluebird), together with some fine music that we haven't, is well-performed by the B. B. C. Theater Orchestra under Stanford Robinson; but this time the recorded sound, though good on a limited-range machine, is dull with bad distortion in loud passages on a machine of wide range (Set ED-18; $5).

Schubert's Piano Sonata Opus 122, one of the earlier members of the series, and of smaller stature than the later ones, has nevertheless its moments of power in addition to the characteristic Schubert loveliness. And even this loveliness requires some sharpness of contour in its phrases—of which there is none in Kathleen Long's smooth, pallid performance. The sound of the piano has the usual London Decca dullness and weakness of treble (Set ED-26; $7).

On London Decca single records: Berlioz's delightful "Beatrice and Benedict" Overture, well played by Sargent with the National Symphony, and superbly recorded, with only a slight edge to the violins and a little high-frequency distortion in loud passages (K-1416; $2). The Overture and Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah," well-played by Sargent with the London Symphony, and well-recorded (K-1499). Mendelssohn's fine "Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave" Overture, well-played by Unger with the National Symphony, and well-recorded except for violins that are lusterless and edged on a wide, but not on a limited-range machine (K-1120). Weber's "Freischütz" Over-

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
21st ST.
86th ST.
86th ST.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
23rd ST.

RKO NOW

"DICKENS" BROUGHT TO LIFE — N. Y. Post
JOHN MILLS • VALERIE HOBSON
"GREAT EXPECTATIONS"

By CHARLES DICKENS
— and —
"THE WEB" — Edmond O'BRIEN
Edna RAINES
"SUSPENSE THRILLER." — N. Y. Herald Trib.

BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

"RIP-SNORTING WESTERN." — N. Y. Tele.
Dennis MORGAN • JANE WYMAN
"CHEYENNE"

JANIS FAIGE • BRUCE BENNETT
— and —
"HIT PARADE OF 1947"

Eddie ALBERT • Constance MOORE

CHINEM
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN
COLUMBIA
B'way & 62 St.

MOTION PICTURE

BING CROSBY

Joan Caulfield • Barry Fitzgerald

"WELCOME STRANGER"

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —

THE POET OF THE PIANO

CARMEN CAVALLARO & His Orch.

PLUS

Paul & Eva Reyes • Nip Nelson

55¢
TO 1 P.M.
(Tax. Incl.)
Mon. to Fri.
Inclusive

NOW
TIMES SQUARE

PARAMOUNT

Midnight
Feature
Nightly

Memo to: NATION READERS

From: THE NATION ADVERTISING DEPT.

Those of you who have a class product to sell would do well to consider using The Nation's advertising columns. Why not call us today so that we can further discuss this profitable possibility with you.

Barclay 7-1066

STAGE PLAY

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Miraculous Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEATRE, 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4250
Exes. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

—Garland.
Journal-Amer.

ture, well-played by Leinsdorf with the London Philharmonic, the violins in loud passages weak and veiled on a wide-range, muffled on a limited-range machine (K-1589). "O Rest in the Lord" and "Woe Unto Them" from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," music I don't care for, beautifully sung by Katherine Ferrier, contralto (K-1556). A Chopin Mazurka in F minor and his Valse Brillante Opus 34 No. 3, well-played by Nicolas Orloff, and the Impromptu Opus 29 with its middle section distorted by the usual exaggerated rubato—the sound of the piano again being weak in treble (K-1424). And on a Parlophone single (R-20444; $2) the tenor arias from "Don Giovanni" sung with beauty of voice by Tauber—Il mio tesoro with a vitality that gets explosive, Dalla sua pace occasionally with the mannered phrasing of the operetta style.

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 223 By MR. Y.

Letters to the Editors

The Case of "Father" Duncan

Dear Sirs: I have read with much interest Mr. Neuberger's excellent article in your issue of July 19, about the Metlakatla Indians. It does not, however, tell the whole story.

There can be no doubt about the value of the work of "Father" Duncan. He was a devoted person. But he had personal characteristics which embroiled him, first with the Canadian authorities, and, in his old age, with the American authorities. Incidentally, the story of his quarrel with Bishop Ridley, as I heard it a good many years ago, was not one of jealousy on the part of the Bishop, but of a rather profound difference of opinion as to the service of the Church of England. I was told that Mr. Duncan, whose popular appellation of "Father" was said to have been distasteful to him, objected to the communion service reminding his charges of their earlier cannibalism.

However that may be, at the time of Duncan's death, the cannery and saw-mill to which Mr. Neuberger alludes were no longer in operation and the settlement was at a low ebb. Its rehabilitation was under the influence and guidance of the Department of the Interior.

The settlement on Annette Island was, as Mr. Neuberger says, in pursuance of an order by President Cleveland. But the President's authority to make the order was challenged and Con-

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the first of six puzzles constructed by Mr. Y., in competition with Mr. X. At the end of the competition, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

ACROSS

- 1 Wagers with a Greek. (9)
- 6 Steam comes out of them. (5)
- 9 Gold animals collide and have something in common. (7)
- 10 11 across confuses Tabbies. (7)
- 11 Shake! It sounds like a third of a game. (3)
- 12 Old England is barely disturbed by its lack of color. (6)
- 13 It's painful for the God to return. (4)
- 15 Are they sent from a maiden to a saintless place? (8)
- 16 Must one profess to be so minded? (6)
- 18 One has a hat on his head with a blemish on his cheek. (6)
- 20 Such crimes go unpunished. (8)
- 23 Young blade of Treasure Island. (4)
- 24 Rub the wrong way with a French drink. (6)
- 25 Scratch the back of this animal. (8)
- 28 There's a point to them, so they're not quite unnecessary. (7)
- 29 There's a purpose in what some apartment-dwellers pay for clothes. (7)
- 30 This also has a purpose, to a degree. (5)
- 31 And in Germany, it's found in a colorful insect. (9)

DOWN

- 1 This is the limit! (5)
- 2 Friendly pilots? (7)

- 3 I'm not in, as a result of making Popeye photogenic. (10)
- 4 How would you like to be Nelson for a change? (8)
- 5 They're smooth as upside-down containers. (6)
- 6 A spicy club came here. (4)
- 7 I take the proper attitude, after short notice. (7)
- 8 The butler is usually this at first. (9)
- 14 Is this the seaman's answer? (10)
- 15 6 down is the head of this country. (9)
- 17 Buried among Communists? (8)
- 19 A sudden riser gets the raven up. (7)
- 21 Take 19, but not up, and be in addition a flower. (7)
- 22 Brothers of the D.A.R. replace the water in 24. (6)
- 26 French word and a song. (5)
- 27 Where the flea found a flaw? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 222

ACROSS:—1 DISINTEGRATES; 10 OPERATE; 11 LACTATE; 12 PETRINE; 13 OVERLAP; 14 SHAVERS; 15 SLENDER; 16 INQUEST; 20 MORBID; 23 NOISOME; 24 MACEDON; 25 TABBIES; 31 NIRVANA; 32 SECESSIONISTS.

DOWN:—2 INERTIA; 3 IMAGINE; 4 TEETERS; 5 GALLOWES; 6 ACCRETE; 7 ENABLED; 8 COMPASSIONATE; 9 TEMPERAMENTAL; 17 QUIBBLE; 18 EROSIVE; 19 TRESSES; 20 MEMENTO; 21 BACARDI; 22 INDRAFT.

gressional action followed, in 1891, to put the matter beyond question. It was provided that the affairs of the Metlakatlahs should be subject to the regulation of the Secretary of the Interior, acting through the Bureau of Education for the natives in Alaska.

Years later, the possibility of rehabilitation of the settlement was threatened by encroachment of the great fishing companies upon the waters surrounding the island. President Wilson intervened with an executive order, and then the firm action of the Department of Justice made the situation secure. See Alaska Pacific Fisheries Co. v. United States, 248 U. S. 78, in which I had the fortune to appear for the government in the Supreme Court. For this interference with "free enterprise," the Administration was, in some circles, roundly denounced. The fish supply for the rebuilt cannery was, however, secured, and the experiment in "planned economy" went on with the happy results which Mr. Neuberger describes.

LA RUE BROWN

Boston, July 20

A Tree for Goudy

Dear Sirs: I invite all those who have admired the late Frederic W. Goudy to make a parting gesture of respect for this native American genius, by subscribing $1.50 each to the planting of a tree in his memory, in Palestine.

It is my hope to collect enough to enable us to plant an entire grove of trees, as has been done in memory of other world-famous non-Jewish personalities of all countries. (There are, for instance, George Washington and Abraham Lincoln forests, as well as the groves.) If you think well of this plan, won't you please send me your check? Please address me at 216 East Forty-fifth Street, New York 17, N. Y., eighth floor.

ALBERT SCHILLER

New York, July 24

Cape, Not Oxford

Dear Sirs: While we were reading (with pleasure) Rolfe Humphries's review of C. Day Lewis's translation of "The Georgics of Virgil" in The Nation of July 5, we noticed a slight error. Mr. Humphries says that "an English edition was published by the present publishers, the Oxford University Press." As a matter of fact, the English edition was put out by Jonathan Cape.

ALISON LURIE,

Oxford University Press
New York, July 8

CIGARS

ACCENT ON YOU

with personalized cigars. Rare smoked. Cellophane printed with your name, product, etc.

Does wonders for you socially and in business. For executives, salesmen, clubs, parties, etc.

Three sample cigars and details FREE if requested on business stationery or sent to anyone for 10¢

ACE MAIL ORDER CO.

East Orange 1, N. J.

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-2
598 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

MILLIONS OF USED, RARE and out-of-print books stocked in 15 cities. Mention interests if catalogues are wanted. TAAB, 529 S. Melville St., Phila. 43.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order, ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Available under GI Bill of Rights. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20, N. Y.

CURRIES

HOW TO MAKE GOOD CURRIES: Your request with a 3¢ stamp will bring you our Recipe Booklet of precise Indian recipes for making curries of chicken, lamb, shrimp and vegetables. Learn the simple principles of using this condiment; it changes ordinary foods into new and delightful dishes.

JAVA-INDIA CONDIMENT CO.

IMPORTERS

442 Hudson Street New York 14, N. Y.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocation, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

SITUATION WANTED (COUPLE)

YOUNG COUPLE, FRENCH TUTORS applying modern educational methods, seek position with Brazilian, Canadian or American family, teaching children. Box 1727, c/o The Nation.

To place an ad—call BARCLAY 7-1066

RESORTS

PLUM POINT
Vacation fun year round
on the majestic Hudson

Seasonal sports
delicious food
open lake for sailing
18 MILES FROM NYC • NEW WINDSOR, NY • NEWBURGH 4370

1½ Hours from New York City

White Gates

WAPPINGERS FALLS, NEW YORK

For the Easy Informality of a Country Home
Swimming, Clay Tennis Courts, Ping Pong,
Bicycles, Badminton, Archery, etc.
Recordings Library

Open Dining and Outdoor Dancing Pavilions

Our Cuisine—Our Special Pride

Weekly $45.00 to $50.00

Weekends $9.00 to $9.50 per day

Telephone Wappingers Fall 469

REEZEMONT PARK ARMONK, N.Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

the most of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
Phone Armonk Village 888

Pine Rest

R. Lise Laub Pine Hill, N. Y.

Telephone: Pine Hill 3876

Exceptionally located on hill amidst pines.
Delicious home cooking. European style.
Large rooms with hot and cold water.

Deuel Hollow House

WINGDALE, N. Y. Phone 3691

In Berkshire foothills, 75 miles from N. Y. City on N. Y. Central R. R. Off beaten path, delightful hiking country. Delicious food served on terrace overlooking our private lake. Tennis, volley-ball, badminton, boating, swimming and fishing.

Complete informality — Adults

RAIZEL COHEN DAVID SACKS

CHILDREN'S CAMP

WALTTEL HOUSE ON FRANKEL FARM

MT. BETHEL, PA. Bangor 9273

VACATION FOR ALL THE FAMILY

Modern farm hotel combined with progressive children's camp, 75 miles from New York City. All rooms with private bath. Meat, poultry, dairy products and vegetables from the farm.
Rates: — Adults $11 Week — Children $50 Week
N. Y.: Ella Frankel, 241 East 108th St. LE 2-3804

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, New York. Farms in the Mass.-New York Berkshires. Also consulting broker for organizations.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2915 M.

HOME BUILDING INFORMATION

On your specific problems by qualified designer, builder and engineer, regarding PLAN, DESIGN, STRUCTURE, MATERIALS, COSTS, HEATING, AIR CONDITIONING, Etc. Individual, detailed and unbiased answer to any single question $2. Check, cash or money order for:

TECTON, P.O. Box 116
Station F, Milwaukee 9, Wis.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 16, 1947

NUMBER 7

The Shape of Things

THE 1948 PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN GOT OFF to a lying start in the Caucus Room of the Senate Office Building, under the painfully thin guise of an investigation of war contracts. Through the miasma of perjury and peanut politics generated by the Ferguson-Brewster committee, a few broad observations can be made. The Republicans, drugged by four straight knockdowns, go right on fighting Roosevelt, by reflex, as though he were still in the ring. This is evident in the prompt and enthusiastic choice of son Elliott as a major target, even if we ignore the sworn testimony of one witness that the committee's assistant counsel had privately remarked: "We are not using a shotgun; we are shooting at him [Elliott] with a cannon." It is just as apparent, from his own admissions, that the President's son had been characteristically indiscreet enough to give the investigators a little ammunition, though it was grapeshot rather than cannonball. Nor can anything be said in defense of the transaction whereby plane-manufacturer Howard Hughes retained, for $10,000, the committee's former counsel, Hugh Fulton. All this is small stuff, however, with no fraud even alleged thus far—only a minor lobbying operation, hardly to be compared with the expansive activity of greater corporations in search of larger war contracts.

✱

THIS PICAYUNE INQUIRY, NOW SUSPENDED, is a burlesque of the great Senatorial probes of the past, such as the Walsh-Wheeler performance that sank the Harding Administration and sent some of its top officials to jail. Unfortunately for the political hopes of the Republicans, Brewster and Ferguson appear to have no comparable targets. What is more, Brewster himself, long regarded as a Washington errand-boy for Pan American Airways, is as vulnerable as the victims of his subpoenas. No one can picture old Tom Walsh squirming in the witness chair before his own committee, charged, as Brewster was charged by Hughes, with offering to squash an investigation if the suspect would agree to merge his concern with a corporation favored by the Senator. Still less can one imagine Walsh and his accuser calling each other liars one day and agreeing to drop their respective charges the next. The sudden adjournment of the hearings until November may indicate that the G. O. P. realized it would have to find more noisome scandals than this if it were to make hay while the August sun shone—and better investigators to expose them.

✱

WHAT CONSTANTINE POULOS PREDICTED IN The Nation of June 28 has already begun to happen. On the eve of Administrator Griswold's arrival in Greece, Poulos wrote: "The Greeks in power will use us for all we are worth. . . . They'll take the dollars, they'll make some revisions in their economic and political policies to please us, and sooner or later they'll ask for more money." The Greek government has not yet asked for more money; it could hardly raise the ante while the first jeeps and trucks and guns are still being unloaded in the Piraeus. But last week, Premier Maximos dispatched a note to Mr. Griswold and to Washington requesting the revision "in favor of the army" of the present plan to spend half the American aid funds on the Greek military establishment and half on the civilian economy. The note also hinted at the probable eventual need of American armed forces to clean up the guerrillas. That is the start. Watch closely, fellow-citizens, as the weeks pass, and see whether the guerrilla forces don't grow and grow, and banditry increase, and the Communist threat mount. Watch what sorts of goods go to Greece from America. Watch your dollars, voted by a panicky Congress; find out, if you can, into whose pockets they ultimately find their way. The implementation of the Truman doctrine has only begun.

✱

THE SOVIET DELEGATE'S ZEAL IN BACKING the candidacy of Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary for membership in the United Nations led him onto rather thin ideological ice last week. His argument before the Security Council's Committee on New Members was not exactly strengthened by an elaborate denunciation of American ideas of human rights in general, and on the new labor law and the loyalty check-up in particular. The Nation doesn't like those measures any better than Mr. Krasilnikov does, but we seem to recall that the Soviet government also goes in for loyalty tests on rather a massive scale. The Russian representative would probably remind us that the Soviet Union is a revolutionary state which makes no pretense of applying democratic safeguards to opposition groups. But this thesis has been weakened, we think, by Russia's repeated insistence that

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	153
The Dollar Crisis	154
A New Spanish Upset	155

ARTICLES

Palestine: Rule by Riot
Jews and Soldiers by Lillie Shultz	156
Jews and Mobs by Aylmer Vallance	157
The Battle of the Ruhr by Fritz Sternberg	158
Cartoon: The Razor's Edge by Ezekiel Schloss	159
Our Chance for Democratic Housing by Charles Abrams	160
In the Wind	162
Who's to Blame for High Prices? by Solomon Barkin	163
Everybody's Business: Too Little and Too Dear by Keith Hutchison	165

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	166
The Crucial Problem by Rustem Vamberg	166
The Composition of Living by Charles G. Bolis	167
Journey. A Poem by Constance Carrier	168
Robert Schumann by Charles B. Farrell	168
New Horizons by Benjamin Harrow	169
A Disturbing Tribe by Albert Guérard	170
Music by B. H. Haggin	171
Crossword Puzzle No. 224 by Mr. Y	171
Film Notes by James Agee	172

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon Literary Editor Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

it is, indeed, a democracy, after its fashion. Anyhow, we are sure Mr. Krasilnikov will do better for his Balkan clients if he sticks to the considerable merits of their case, and foregoes the satisfaction of exposing American "hypocrisy" in the area of human rights.

★

NOW THAT SENORA PERON HAS PEDDLED the glories of her husband's dictatorship through Western Europe, the Argentine regime is laying plans to break down sales resistance in the United States. Peter Edson, the Scripps-Howard columnist, reported last week that a contract had been drawn up between the Perón government and Edward S. Fenton of New York for a propaganda campaign in this country. Questioning Mr. Fenton directly, we got not only confirmation of the contract story but a good indication of the approach he has in mind. He says that Perón is thoroughly anti-communist and has always been just as thoroughly pro-American. Little in the way of public relations will be required to establish the first point, though Perón did have a brief flirtation with the Communists last year, and they with him. But it should take even more than the $5,000,000 supposedly allotted for the campaign to put over point number two. Mr. Fenton will have to black out the public memory of Perón's intimate connections with Axis emissaries throughout the war, and of his galling declaration of war against Germany only after Hitler had already taken to the bunker that was to be his crematory. If this is to be a successful promotion venture, Mr. Fenton will have to get more cooperation from Buenos Aires than we think can be counted on from the current exchange of diplomatic amenities. In his position, we would ask for more than verbal gestures at the coming Rio conference. We might also ask the Argentine to stop profiteering on misery by selling wheat to a starved world at $5.50 a bushel, roughly twice the price exacted by those bloated Yanqui imperialists who are Perón's favorite whipping boys.

The Dollar Crisis

THE British government's program for meeting the dollar crisis, drastic as it appears, is less severe than many commentators expected. Yet there was nothing in the various ministerial speeches in the House of Commons to suggest that the critical nature of the situation had in any way been exaggerated. Dr. Hugh Dalton, Chancellor of the Exchequer, pointed out that the existing gap between international payments and receipts meant exhaustion of the American loan before the end of this year. Nor are the sharp import cuts, now to be imposed, likely to solve the problem, even with the help of expanded exports, which reached a higher level in 1946 than in 1938, as Mr. Attlee pointed out in his speech to the nation last Sunday. Under the best of circumstances, it is difficult to see how Britain can avoid heavy drafts on its limited gold reserve in 1948 unless the Marshall plan produces substantial new aid. Consequently, it is not surprising that the Attlee program has had an unfavorable reception.

Tory criticism was, of course, to be expected under any circumstances. It has been violent but largely rhetorical. If the opposition has any alternative plan to offer, it has yet to make it public. A group of Labor left-wingers, on the other hand, has been very specific in its attacks on the inadequacy of the Attlee proposals which, indeed, appear to have been diluted since the Prime Minister outlined them at a private party meeting on July 30. In particular, they complain that proposed cuts in the armed forces are insufficient. They would like to see a definite date set for withdrawal of all British troops from Palestine, and they fail to see the necessity of maintaining a home establishment far above prewar strength.

Again, the Labor back-benchers are not satisfied that the government has adhered to the principle of equality of sacrifice in its new measures to hold down consumption and boost production. They point out that workers are being asked to work longer hours on a slimmer diet, to submit to partial restoration of wartime "direction of labor," and to refrain from demanding higher wages. Industry is also asked not to increase dividends, but a similar appeal a year ago was ignored. The left-wing critics believe that additional profit-taxes should be imposed now so as to check expenditures from unearned incomes.

Another left-wing proposal is of particular interest to this country. It is a suggestion that the British government forthwith notify Washington that it can no longer be bound by Article 9 of the loan agreement. Actually, while unwilling to take unilateral action, Mr. Attlee has asked the United States to suspend both this clause, which prohibits discrimination in purchasing imports, and also the clause providing for full convertibility of current sterling. The latter provision, when it became effective July 15, assisted an unexpected flight from the pound, adding greatly to British difficulties. It has also backfired on some American interests. Arguing, reasonably enough, that it cannot afford dollars for films when it lacks dollars for food, the British government has staggered Hollywood by a prohibitive import tax on foreign movies. The alternative, a much more agreeable one to American film makers, was to block all but a limited amount of foreign movie earnings in Britain. But this step would have violated the convertibility clause of the loan agreement.

The anti-discrimination clause makes it impossible for Britain to buy commodities for which it can pay in sterling while excluding those which can only be paid for in dollars. Thus it cannot, for instance, buy South American oranges unless it is also prepared to buy California ones offered at the same price. This ban on discrimination is very near to the heart of the State Department, for it is an integral part of the campaign to re-establish multilateral international trade. Yet, as long as the overpowering American trade surplus dominates the world-trade picture, strictly multilateral trading is most unlikely. Non-discrimination requires that restrictions of imports from the United States must apply equally to imports from other countries. As a result, the dollar shortage may force the British to reduce their meager cheese ration, while Italy, perhaps, is unable to dispose of her surplus cheese.

Absurdities of this kind are bringing the principle of multilateralism into disrepute. When countries lack the means to buy from us, we cannot expect them to starve quietly if their situation can be improved by barter deals. The Nation has supported the Administration's trade program, but until a more balanced international economy has been achieved, its full adoption is obviously impracticable. We hope, therefore, that Britain will be relieved of those loan conditions which are throttling it.

A New Spanish Upset

THE resignation of the Llopi's Cabinet had long been expected by those familiar with the problems of the Spanish emigration, but the circumstances in which it took place are none the less disquieting. When the Llopi's government was formed by President Martinez Barrio in Paris last February, after the resignation of Prime Minister Giral, it met with indifference or outright hostility among most Spanish Republicans, who simply could not understand why the Republican cause had been entrusted to so weak a group of men. Within a few months, the regime was virtually moribund. Señor Llopi's had failed to advance by an inch his double purpose—to win the support of the British Labor government and to reach an understanding with the Spanish Monarchists.

Llopi's visit to London last spring was a bitter disappointment. He found Mr. Bevin in no mood to discuss a change of regime in Spain; in fact, the British monetary accord with Franco was signed under the very nose of the Spanish Republican Premier. The Monarchists proved no more disposed to negotiate with his feeble Cabinet. Smarting under this double rebuff, Llopi's chose the only remaining alternative; he began to pose as an uncompromising "resistant" who rejected any deal with rightist groups. In his new role, the Premier not only failed to convince rank-and-file Republicans, but created an untenable situation inside his own Socialist group. The group is composed of two chief elements, followers of Indalecio Prieto and those of the late Francisco Largo Caballero. After the death of Caballero, who had always enjoyed tremendous prestige among the workers, no realistic politician would have thought of challenging Prieto's claim to leadership of the group. Three weeks ago, Prieto moved in from Mexico and took command.

On July 25, the Prieto Socialists held a strategy conference at Toulouse, their headquarters. The chief question was whether the Llopi's government should continue, despite its record, or should give place to a new junta representing the Prieto policy. In this debate, Llopi's naively imagined that he could hold his own against the real boss. But the moment the wily old leader began to speak, he swept the assembly along with him. The Toulouse Socialists have always favored a compromise with all non-Communist elements, including the Monarchists, and have minimized the question of restoring the Republic. They are ready for any kind of arrangement that will eliminate Franco, and their chief recommendation was to liquidate the government and force through the plans for a plebiscite. On this, Prieto was sure of a majority against the "resistant" Llopi's. Repudiated by his own group, Llopi's was, in effect, finished, but he tried to stave off the inevitable. It was the withdrawal of the Communists that finally forced him to resign.

The Toulouse assembly endorsed Prieto's proposal to create a "Spanish Brotherhood"—a conglomeration of factions excluding only Franco's followers and the Communists. Prieto justifies his intervention on the grounds that it was essential, before the meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations five weeks from now, to create an instrument capable of opening the way for the kind of "democratic" government London and Washington would like to see.

Prieto's organization will not be as inclusive as he pretends. Among those who oppose his plan are the leaders of the old Socialist Party, Dr. Juan Negrin, Alvarez del Vayo, and Gonzalez Peña, chairman of the U. G. T. (General Workers' Union); and several prominent Republicans who were formerly associated with Prieto but who reject his present position. Speaking for this group recently, Señor Albornoz, Minister of Justice in the Giral government, said pointedly: "Monarchy, no. Russian satellite, no. But Dominion—also no!" Against Prieto are also the majority of the U. G. T., sections of the anarchist movement, and the Catalan and Basque parties who consider the monarchy the bitterest enemy of regional autonomy.

Consequently, Martinez Barrio has enough elements at hand to build a genuine Republican government, from which only Prieto would be excluded—by his own will. But the President will forfeit this chance if he chooses another weak figure as Prime Minister or, in order to avoid political complications, sets up a mere skeleton Cabinet. In either case, he will present victory to Prieto, who would like nothing so much as to see the government-in-exile evaporate, leaving the field to his still unborn "Brotherhood."

PALESTINE: RULE BY RIOT

Jews and Soldiers

BY LILLIE SHULTZ

Jerusalem, August 10

THE arrest of the three mayors, L. Rokach of Tel Aviv, O Ben Ami of Nathanya, and A. Krinicki, chairman of the Ramat Gan local council—locked up on August 5 and, by the time this appears in print, probably released—is a blundering incident in a game designed to permit Britain to remain in power, whatever the ultimate recommendations of the United Nations Special Committee of Inquiry. To achieve this purpose, the British are prepared to provoke incidents which will enable the military to move forward in force, trample down Jewish settlements and other communities, and destroy the unity of the Yishuv. The precipitate execution, on July 29, of the three young Jews, Yaacov Weiss, Meir Nakar, and Avshalom Habib, was a step in this direction. The execution was ordered by the General Officer Commanding, over the objections of the High Commissioner and in the face of the announcement that the two British sergeants captured by the Irgun would pay with their lives. The order was carried out despite the fact that, given five or six days more, the Haganah would surely have found the hideaway of the sergeants.

The hanging of the British sergeants was to have been the signal for the most rigid measures against the Jewish community. Mrs. Goldie Meyerson, acting head of the Jewish Agency Executive, had been warned to expect this. The action may have been delayed by the horror of the Jewish community over the deaths of Pace and Martin, the subsequent attacks on Tel Aviv, in which five Jews were killed and sixteen injured, and then the attack on the funeral cortège. For three weeks, the country has been filled with rumors of impending martial law and the closing down of the Jewish Agency. The arrest of the three mayors, the outlawing of the Brith Trumpeldor, one of the older revisionist groups, suspected of having made an alliance with the terrorists, and the arrests of some thirty-five leaders of the Revisionist Party are comparatively light measures.

Officially, the Jewish Agency has protested the arrests and is expected to be able to effect the release of Rokach, Ben Ami, and Krinizki. Privately, there is not too much sadness over the arrest of these three, known to be anti-labor and opposed to the Haganah on the one hand, and, on the other, in contact with the rightist terrorist organizations as well as most cooperative in their associations with the British. The more cynical even explain the arrest of Rokach as a complex British maneuver to secure some popularity for Rokach and insure his election to the post to which they appointed him. The general strike of August 7 was a protest, not simply against the most recent arrests, but against a policy which has turned Palestine into a police state under the absolute control of the military.

This control is visible to all. British military camps dot every main road; armored cars and truckloads of soldiers with fixed bayonets race up and down every highway; at every turn and crossing, vehicles are stopped, passengers unloaded, cars searched, license numbers noted. All inhabitants of the country are required, under threat of arrest, to possess identity cards and to show them to any passing soldier who asks for them. All interurban or urban communication, except by telephone, shuts down at 7 every evening. When the road curfew begins, any violation places one in danger of arrest or even death; the nervous soldiers are instructed to fire on cars and pedestrians who do not halt.

In Jerusalem, the curfew imposed three weeks ago still operates. The section of the city where some 9,000 of its 10,000 Jews live is closed tight at 7 o'clock. Only working newspaper correspondents on necessary errands are about, though a number of other people have curfew passes. The silence of the streets is broken only by the tramp of soldiers' feet or the exchange of orders from the walkie-talkies. Such cars as venture abroad must have a driver's curfew pass and travel with lights on. There is always the danger some trigger-happy nineteen-year-old British soldier will shoot out of fear. Searches of people and vehicles are commonplace, even during the day. Admission to the three protected zones in which British personnel is housed is only by special order. At the slightest provocation, sirens sound, halting all vehicular traffic and, in some instances, pedestrian traffic as well.

An incident involving one of the most distinguished personalities in the Jewish community, M. Novomeisky, illustrates the tension. On August 1, the siren sounded at about 2 p.m. Later it became known that, at this moment, three terrorists had stormed a sentry box in the vicinity of the Jewish Agency offices, one of them being killed and two arrested. M. Novomeisky, a man in his early seventies, decided to escort his two secretaries to their homes. On the street, a soldier ordered him to return to his office. When Novomeisky refused, on the score that pedestrian traffic was allowed, the soldier said: "Go back or I'll shoot." Novomeisky went to his office and telephoned the chief of police, a friend. The latter advised him to stay where he was for, as he put it, "the soldiers are nervous today."

[Next week Lillie Shultz, director of the Nation Associates, will describe in detail the operations of Britain's police rule in Palestine.]

Jews and Mobs

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, August 10

DURING the past ten days, forecasts of sensational Cabinet plans, aimed to solve radically our economic crisis and make Socialist Britain independent of capitalist America, have monopolized the front pages of newspapers here. Since the stop-gap program of half-hearted deflation disclosed by Attlee represents little more than ineffective window-dressing, it is arguable that the advance publicity was not warranted by the event. In any case, one consequence of press concentration on the dollar crisis has been the slight attention paid to the outbreaks—small in scale but nationwide—of anti-Jewish violence.

On August 1, the Daily Express presented to its 4,000,000 readers a horrible photograph, nine inches deep across five columns, showing the dead booby-trapped bodies of two British sergeants hanging from eucalyptus trees. This picture, supported by a Jerusalem dispatch reporting that the deaths were due to slow strangulation, produced an inevitably strong revulsion of public feeling. It is probably true to say that a majority of Englishmen, unfamiliar with the Zionist case, nevertheless have an uncomfortable feeling that the White Paper Policy, sustained by Bevin's bayonets, represents not only a British failure in Palestine but a breach of pledges to the Jews. Hence the Irgun atrocity afforded a welcome psychological escape from the British guilt complex. Contrasting with the previous general opinion favoring prompt termination of the mandate and withdrawal of troops, widespread comment is now audible to the effect, "These dirty Jews have asked for it; let them have it."

It would be wrong to conclude that anti-Semitism is generally an active emotion in Britain: racial antipathies are not, indeed, characteristic of the British make-up. It is significant, however, that whereas Hitler's blitz bombing caused no broken windows of shops bearing German names, the two sergeants' deaths evoked not only intelligible horror but extravagant anger. It must be admitted that the average Briton, disclaiming anti-Semitism, nevertheless reacts emotionally with irrational vehemence to a brutal crime if it is committed by Jews.

The question is, how far do last weekend's outbreaks of violence reflect not only latent anti-Jewish feeling but fascist propaganda? The past year has seen the reemergence of various organizations reminiscent of the ideology of the prewar British Union of Fascists. Mosley himself conducts a company which publishes literature and a news letter and includes a widespread book-club network. Active also is the British League of ex-Servicemen, operating in London and the south. In addition, there is the so-called Unity Group, composing the Union for British Freedom (London and Brighton), the Sons of St. George (Northern England), the Imperial Defense Party (Manchester and Liverpool), and the British Workers' Party (Bristol). All of these organizations make anti-Semitism the chief plank in their policy. Their known leaders include numerous fascists who were jailed in wartime under regulation 18-B. Moreover, the Unity Group is controlled by Raven Thompson, former director of Mosleyite publicity.

A careful cross-check has satisfied me that no member of the British Union of Fascists figures among those arrested during the week's rioting. Some were adolescent gangsters out for plunder; others were illiterate Irish Catholics. It is significant, however, that the areas of the worst outbreaks—London, Brighton, Manchester, and Liverpool—coincided with the most active centers of the above-mentioned fascist organizations. It is further noticeable that rioting in these and other towns followed the organized appearance of anti-Jewish slogans and fascist emblems, painted on house walls, and that during the attacks on Jewish ships, factories, and synagogues, shouts of "Death to the Jews!" were accompanied by cries of "Hitler was right!"

It is important not to exaggerate the immediate influence of the Mosleyite movement, but the government's repeated refusal to illegalize racial propaganda reflects its undue complacency. The past week's outbreaks demonstrate how easily anti-Semitism can be inflamed. Moreover, "scratch an anti-Semite and you'll find a fascist." Given conditions of unemployment and hunger, the Mosleyites might stage a comeback.

The Battle of the Ruhr

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

IT WAS a British government official who, according to an Associated Press report, described the American-English coal conference in Washington as "the Battle of the Ruhr," thus emphasizing its critical importance. One might go further: the Ruhr is perhaps the most decisive factor in the parallelogram of forces which will decide whether or not we shall have a third world war.

When the Russians refused to participate in the deliberations on the Marshall plan and the Paris conference became a conference of Western European countries, numerous press reports assured us that everything in Paris would proceed well since the discussions could no longer be disrupted by Moscow. It took but a few days to prove this view an illusion.

For Europe today, the decisive question is not merely reconstruction, but reconstruction based upon a fundamental transformation of the social structure.

The Russian attitude toward this trend is absolutely clear: for its own ends, Russia is strongly backing the social forces—labor and agrarian—which are transforming Europe and Asia. American policy, on the other hand, opposes those forces and seeks to counteract them everywhere. From China to Germany—both neighbors of Russia—this country is lending its influence, and in many cases its material aid, to the most reactionary elements of the population. By doing so, we have already driven millions of progressive, democratic people into the arms of the Russians, or the Communist parties.

American policy is thus leading to the destruction of independent left elements in both Europe and Asia. It is strengthening the factors leading to war by helping to crystallize the division of the world, ideologically and geographically, into two opposed blocks. It is against this political background that the Battle of the Ruhr must be analyzed.

What are the stakes in this battle? Put briefly, the question is whether in the Ruhr, the heart of Europe and its most important industrial center, the transformation of European society is to be blocked for many years by American opposition.

This issue did not emerge yesterday; it has merely entered a new phase. It was on October 22, 1946, that British Foreign Minister Bevin, in an important speech before the House of Commons, declared that England had taken over control of coal and steel production in the Ruhr; that the machinery and chemical industries would be taken over next; and that these industries would never again pass under private ownership. But the Battle of the Ruhr has recently acquired new importance, for reasons too little discussed in the press.

Europe's crisis has lasted since the war came to a close. It has affected every sector of the Continent's eco-conomic life. In England, it has taken the form of a serious dollar crisis, since Britain cannot today—or in the near future—export enough to enable it to import the foodstuffs and raw materials required to maintain a Western European standard of living. At the same time, it is a crisis in production and in building throughout Europe. It is a food crisis in almost every country. Persons who argue that the situation is no more than a temporary consequence of the war, similar to that which existed in Europe in 1918 and 1919, fail to understand what has happened to change the underlying economic and social factors in the various countries. If this were 1919 instead of 1947, the problem would be relatively simple. During the war years, the United States increased its production and its productive capacity so tremendously that it would need to utilize only a very small fraction of this increase in order to help the European countries reach their pre-war levels and stand on their own feet. But Europe is no longer the Europe of World War I. The economic groups that held power then have, for the most part, been liquidated by years of fascist domination and wartime destruction. Capitalism itself has been either destroyed or shaken to its foundations; everywhere it is in process of transformation. Therefore, Europe's reconstruction is not only, or even primarily, an economic problem, but a political one.

FRITZ STERNBERG is an economist and author of "The Coming Crisis."

In this period of change and rebuilding, the Ruhr is bound to play a decisive part. Production in England today is not far below its peacetime level; French production as a whole has reached 90 per cent of normal; while the Ruhr, like all of Western Germany, is barely turning out a third of its prewar production—in the case of steel, only a little over 10 per cent. The major portion of German heavy industry is concentrated in the Ruhr. In its reconstruction there are tremendous possibilities but also great dangers. During the years of Hitler's "military economy" (Wehrwirtschaft), the Ruhr, with 20,000,000 tons of steel annually, was producing about as much as England and France combined, and as much as all of Russia before the Nazi invasion. One need only ponder these figures to realize how explosive is the question of reconstructing the Ruhr, from the point of view of national as well as social and military interests.

THE British Labor government has taken over coal production in England. Socialization of steel has been postponed only temporarily; it will be accomplished during the period for which the Labor Party was elected. To British Labor, committed to a program of gradual socialization at home, the application of this principle to heavy industry in the Ruhr is a major step toward strengthening the democratic Socialist forces in Germany while destroying the social basis of those classes which supported Hitler and the Nazi war machine. British Labor sees the best guarantee against the rebirth of an aggressive Germany in the decisive change in German society which must result from the expropriation of the holdings of big industrialists and the social ownership of heavy industry.

But the British will soon have no dollars left with which to pay for their imports. They desperately need new American credits. Until now, they have paid almost half the occupation costs of the joint Anglo-American zones of Germany, amounting to about $500,000,000 a year. They want the Americans to pay three-quarters of these costs, or some $250,000,000 more. They know that if German production is to be considerably increased, more food must be imported, and that this, too, must be paid for by the United States.

Secretary of Commerce Harriman recently declared in London that the Labor government had not only failed to increase coal production in the Ruhr but had done a far from impressive job in coal production at home. He failed to mention, perhaps naturally, the fact that under the Churchill government British coal production was below today's level. He ignored, too, the prewar years of slow decay in the coal fields under Tory rule.

Facts like these should be kept clearly in view during the coming weeks, when American officials and the American press will be repeating over and over the simple official slogan that increased production is the one important issue and that it should not be mixed up with extraneous social and political considerations. Concentrate on production, we shall be told, and put off the controversial question of socialization for a few years.

THE RAZOR'S EDGE

The sure results of this policy must be explained with the utmost clarity. If the British Labor government, under financial pressure from America, is compelled to give up its plan for socializing heavy industry in Germany, its own prestige and position will be seriously compromised. If the American position wins, every British Tory will know, and no longer merely hope, that he can count on wholehearted support in Washington for every act of opposition to or sabotage of Labor's Socialist program in England.

But the consequences of an American policy aimed at restoring capitalist control in Germany would be even more far-reaching. In the face of the social ferment at work in Europe today, industrial reconstruction along prewar lines is completely illusory. The social antagonism during the world crisis after 1929 had already become so intense in Germany that big business could maintain its economic power only with the political help of the Nazis. The Second World War has wiped out the last hope of restoring capitalism in continental Europe, both by shattering capital values on a vast scale and by largely liquidating the middle class.

Any attempt to recreate the old system artificially is doomed to failure. Any such attempt will drive democratic groups to the Communist camp. Even the London Economist, not a Socialist but a liberal weekly, has warned America that an effort to rebuild heavy industry in the Ruhr under private ownership is likely to make France, as well as the Ruhr, go Communist.

It will be difficult to bring America, with its unquestioning acceptance of free enterprise at home, to support the forces in Europe which are seeking to organize the Continent on a Socialist basis. Yet today, the basic principle of American foreign policy is to do everything possible to stop Russian expansion. Perhaps if the makers of foreign policy in Washington could be convinced that the restoration of capitalism in the Ruhr would in the end only play into Stalin's hands, they would listen more attentively to the demands and arguments of their British allies. For if the American program is forced upon the British, a barrier to a new war will be destroyed and the progressive forces, which today still stand between America and the Soviet Union, will be swept away.

Our Chance for Democratic Housing

LAST IN A SERIES, "RACE BIAS IN HOUSING"

BY CHARLES ABRAMS

THE most effective method for stabilizing neighborhoods and removing the tensions caused by the competition for dwellings is to provide minorities with the living space they need.

If there were enough housing for everybody, minority groups would soon abandon the tendency to infiltrate and then inundate vulnerable neighborhoods, a characteristic sequence in American cities. If, in fact, there were no race covenants and no exclusion practices, there might be a more equitable distribution of minorities in all neighborhoods and no shift toward a particular racial predominance in any. Provision of living space merely in circumscribed areas will not preclude these racial shifts, for quantitative adequacy of housing will not repress the yearning of those of the minority who can afford it to reach out for social and psychical parity with the majority.

The prominent part the fear of infiltration plays in forcing a change in the composition of a neighborhood is confirmed by its absence in certain fixed patterns.

In many of our northern sections, there have always been Negro belts, many of them adjoining the more fashionable sections. The presence of Negroes disturbed neither property values nor social status. It was often considered a great convenience, in fact, to have the Negro servant living close by. New York City has had Negro belts that offered no threat to adjoining sections, in Brooklyn, Greenwich Village, Columbus Circle and other areas. The areas, however, were then considered settled in character; there was no prospect of imminent saturation of the neighborhood by the minority, and no activation of the standard fears of loss of social status, decline in values, or loss of neighborhood associations. Were New York City's Negroes—7 per cent of its population—evenly distributed, their presence today would hardly be noticeable. This applies to other cities as well.

So too, in many of our southern cities: Negroes live in the same areas and on the same streets with whites and there is no exodus by the whites. This, of course, is due to the dominant position of the whites in the South, and the resultant absence of the above-mentioned fears, but it illustrates, by an extreme instance, that it is the operation of these fears rather than the presence of the minority that precipitates shifts in the racial composition of a neighborhood.

Public housing projects further prove the point. Where the new housing development is a self-contained community, creating its own environment, fixing the long-term patterns of living, and removing the fear that any single race might overwhelm the neighborhood in disproportionate numbers, the project offers no serious race problem despite its mixed tenantry.

If Negroes were accepted as tenants in large private developments, such as Stuyvesant Town, no resistance from white tenants is indicated so long as they could consider the area settled in character and racial composition. No fear of a mass invasion by the minority would be stimulated. The presence of Negroes in the project would not, in itself, disturb either the owner's investment or the tenants' social status.

Limiting the number of tenants of any one race in a large-scale project has been criticized as a "quota system." But policy need not prescribe a quota for any one group any more than it does for another. While there should be no fixed rule for selecting tenants by racial percentages, the effort to attain representation of all races in newly created neighborhoods is essential to sound tenant selection policy. Intelligent policy would weigh such factors as character and responsibility of the potential tenants, regardless of race, as well as their ability to cohere into a community.

Unless all races are represented in the creation of new neighborhoods, the ghetto will never be broken up and housing operations will simply replace old ghettos with new. To effect a heterogeneous pattern, the redistribution of races in new neighborhoods is indispensable. The fundamental principle of equality of opportunity in public and publicly aided projects is, of course, paramount. But once that principle is established, common-sense administration will conform not only to it but also to the other considerations in tenant selection that make for a successful neighborhood relationship and the dissolution of the ghetto pattern. Common sense, in fact, will go far toward meeting the complex issues involved.

This does not mean that, in a rehousing program, neighborhoods inhabited by a single race should be immediately broken up and their occupants absorbed by forced draft into separated sections. Education of the minority is as essential as education of the majority in interracial living, and this may be a long process. Many families are accustomed to their present neighborhoods, preferring to live with their own people and enjoy a common social and cultural life. But the choice should remain theirs. Under no circumstances should there be an arbitrary division of the new neighborhoods into homogeneous groupings deliberately set up to respect class or racial lines.

Neither minority groups nor the public in general have shown an awareness of the greater implications of housing programs. Minorities often seek projects for their particular race alone, rather than protesting their new isolation in these developments. It would be far better, in the long run, if they got less housing but were represented in all new developments.

WITH a need for homes for twenty million families during the next decade, with a vast government-aided home-building program inevitable if the housing log-jam is to be broken, and with more than a third of our families living in slums that must be replaced sooner or later by new neighborhoods, America faces a dramatic challenge. It can either create neighborhood patterns in which its races may be integrated, or it can stratify existing patterns for generations ahead. Or, worse still, its minorities may be drawn from presently mixed neighborhoods and corralled into new segregated sections. It is therefore vital to understand the problem and the implications of the present opportunity.

The government housing program thus involves more than housing. It is a proving ground on which the practical validity of a great ideal can and should be demonstrated—or upon which may be shattered any hope of ever again creating the environment necessary for a new interracial understanding. Federal policy, above all, must be directed toward building mixed neighborhoods, like those in the housing projects, in which educational processes can have a fair chance of operating.

Winning the battle against segregation will not be easy. It will require not only courage, but statesmanship. It will entail understanding, by the minorities, of the bigger stakes involved. It may be necessary for them to subordinate the doctrinaire to the practical upon occasion. They will have to weigh the probable gains in one area of legislation against the probable losses in another. They should weigh the relative advantages of local, decentralized operations over federally centralized operations. Minorities must recognize that, while a decentralized program will not win interracial living in all places, local gains are vital gains and far more constructive than mere declarations of equality on the federal level which have little chance of being honored in actual application.

There should, however, be no retreat from gains already achieved. Public education and civil rights legislation must go hand in hand. Education must not only precede the fight but continue after the victory, until the civil right is established in tradition as well as in law.

THERE are other specific advances to be fought for: Progressive opinion should be mobilized to press for legislation providing an adequate number of dwellings at rents all families can afford.

The successful formula of interracial occupancy, adopted by the many local agencies, should be continued and expanded wherever possible. Information on successful experiences of interracial occupancy should be disseminated for the guidance of all local authorities and to help them in extending such policies. Indifference, fear of furthering the experiment, misinformation, and ill-informed pronouncements have deterred progress when proper information might have advanced it.

The creation, by public and private enterprise, of new neighborhoods with self-contained environments should be promoted as the most effective means of increasing understanding between races and decreasing discrimination. Heterogeneity, not homogeneity, should be the aim.

Federally-owned housing projects should be enjoined against discrimination as to race, color, or religion. Nor should discrimination or segregation be encouraged, directly or indirectly, by federal agencies. The devitalized federal civil rights acts, which ostensibly grant Negroes equal rights in the purchase and lease of real property, should be strengthened so as to embrace and restrain federal discriminatory practices.

Wherever the public extends its aid or lends its powers to any public or private agency, neither segregation nor discrimination are tolerable and should be barred by the enabling legislation. Public aid must be liberally construed to include assistance, either by loan of credit or otherwise. So too, when governmental power alone is given in aid of a private enterprise. If, for example, the power of eminent domain is employed to assist a private company to acquire land, discrimination must be forbidden though the project be in private ownership.

Real property must be subjected to public control when its use results in the exclusion of vast masses of citizens from shelter. The racial restrictive covenant is such an abuse of private property; it is contrary to the public interest and should be invalidated both by statute and judicial holding.

FEDERAL intervention in housing has created another opportunity to demonstrate that people can live together as neighbors regardless of race or color. No more than an experiment a decade ago, it has become a frontier today. Upon the evolution of government housing policy in the next few years hangs the question of whether the environment will now ever again be restored to the point where educational processes can function.

We can continue to countenance racial segregation, exclude prescribed groups, incite racial tensions, optimistically hope that the imaginary walls against infiltration will remain unbroken, continue to acquiesce in a scheme of living that is a challenge, not only to real estate stability, but to common-sense democracy.

Or we can, at long last, try to break through the barriers that have stood in the way of real racial harmony and understanding. The choice may be hard to make and the program difficult to carry out, but the public housing experiment has demonstrated that it can be done if only we rise to the occasion.

In the Wind

THE WIND whipped through Greenwich Village last week, trying to bring relief to some of the more deserving, these summer dog-days. But even better relief is in store for Villagers, soon. Whitewash letters two feet high are scrawled on the windows of an empty store, across the street from the Eighth Street Playhouse. They promise, with immense excitement, that "Shapiro is Coming!"

RELIEF OF ANOTHER SORT is in store for Greece, as we all know. But perhaps the Omaha World Herald dropped a brick on July 13 when it declared that "Greece's food requirements may cut deeper than expected into Greek aid funds." From Athens itself, by the way, comes the word that Parliament Street has been rechristened "Argentine Democracy Street," and Stadium Street will be known henceforth—officially—as "Churchill Street." A secret operative on the spot informs the Wind that he overheard an Athenian remark the other day, "If Washington would give another million, the Greek government would gladly call Athens 'Trumansburg.'"

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL ARENA has been entered, for the first time, by the vegetarians, who claim 3,000,000 adherents in this country. Several weeks ago, they nominated Dr. John Maxwell, of Chicago, for President of the United States. Watch it, Harry, Harold, Arthur, Doug, and Robert Alphonso!

SPEAKING OF WHOM, the Wind has been tipped off to the following lines which are to be found in Pierce Egan's edition of Grose's "Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue," published in London in 1823: "TORY. An advocate for absolute monarchy and church power: also, an Irish vagabond, robber, or rapparee." The suggested etymology, the Wind's tipper-off goes on to say, is entirely accurate. The ultimate source of the word is the Gaelic torraighe: "pursuer."

A COUPLE OF TORAIGHES have gotten loose in Rapid City, South Dakota, where all biology books have been banned which contain "teaching of atheistic evolution."

TO BE WELL EDUCATED, however, is still of some advantage. As witness this Sears, Roebuck ad in a recent issue of the Baton Rouge State-Times: "Need aggressive, enthusiastic, young college man or woman. . . . Permanent. Must be able to typewrite, spell. . . ."

NOTHING WRONG WITH the spelling of the New York Times, which informed its readers recently that one of the films to be preserved in the Library of Congress would be "The Best Years of Our Liver."

[We invite our readers to contribute to In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

Who's to Blame for High Prices?

BY SOLOMON BARKIN

THE President's challenge to industry to reduce prices is being heeded by few sellers. Retailers already overstocked with goods of war-time quality are seeking to move them with publicity streamers heralding sales. But many of the most ardent price cutters are barred from following even this course by state price-maintenance laws. The more ambitious projects, such as the "Newburyport Plan," proved less spectacular than the headlines. The Newburyport publicity became so disturbing to free enterprise, however, that the Boston Better Business Bureau rushed into print to reassure everybody that these heretical merchants had not reduced—had not even agreed to reduce—all prices by 10 per cent. What finally put the quietus on the Newburyport experiment was the refusal of wholesalers and manufacturers to play ball by cutting prices for the merchants.

Manufacturers' announcements of price cuts usually prove, on investigation, to be phony. In many cases, producers have merely brought their prices into line with those of other manufacturers. The overwhelming fact is that the basic industries, in which there is restricted competition, have not reduced prices. All published reports bear out this conclusion. The current N. A. M. poll of its members confirmed that no price cuts are reported in the glass, cement, clay products, iron and steel, machinery, heavy equipment, ore and coal industries. One large manufacturer of electrical goods announced price increases. This was before the recent rise in coal and steel prices.*

Why is production, now at an all-time high, not pressing prices downward? With labor peace prevalent, whom are we to blame? Long ago, the N. A. M. assured those who differed with it that prices would fall with the end of OPA. Instead, they rose. Why?

We knew the answers to the present price question as early as 1940. The depression of the thirties had made us search deeply into our economy. The Temporary National Economic Commission summarized our conclusions. Unfortunately, the war shelved its findings.

What determines the course of prices in this country is the existence, or non-existence, of competition among producers. Competition is the only effective force we now have. If it is insufficient to drive down prices, then we must return to the controls we discussed in the late thirties and put into effect during the war. All recent investigations show that business concentration increased during and after the war. Industrial mergers have mounted. In large sectors of American industry, a few producers dominate the market. They are not competitors in the old sense; they are semi-monopolistic competitors who respect each other's right to live and live well. Ruthless competitive forces do not fix their prices. The prices are wilfully set by producers who keep their own interests keenly in mind. True, prices are developed with some eye to the market, but that is a conditioning, not a determining, force.

In an economic world of "big business," what chances are there for price cuts? The answer to this question must be sought in the code of business practice developed by these big business organizations.

LET us examine this code. Its first and major plank is an aversion to price reduction. Businessmen don't like price cuts even when prices have been jockeyed to their present unreasonable heights. Price cuts do not guarantee the individual price cutter a market, since other producers are apt to follow suit. This means price wars, and price wars are destructive and costly. The recent clamor to exempt general price cutting from the anti-trust law was inspired by a desire to arrange orderly price reductions by collusion and so prevent them from "disorganizing the market." Businessmen prefer, and some state laws require, that the "adjustments" take the form of concessions rather than outright price cuts.

In the semi-monopolistic branches of American industry, which cover the great mass of American manufacturing divisions, the manufacturer is under no market compulsion. Interested in maximum profits rather than full employment or production, he is reluctant deliberately to reduce prices. Moreover, the manufacturer frequently has no information on the potential volume of sales for different prices. He plots his price course by hearsay, past experience, and prejudice. That is one reason why the benefits of technological savings are only slowly passed on to the consumer. During the twenties, few of these were transmitted in the form of lower prices or higher wages. Governmental action and union organization improved the situation during the thirties. These decades should have taught us not to rely extensively on management's voluntary policies, not to expect that either lower prices or higher wages would normally result from technological savings.

The second plank in this big-business code is to rely on non-price competition to develop markets. Producers

SOLOMON BARKIN is Director of Research of the Textile Workers Union of America, C. I. O.

* See Keith Hutchinson's article, Too Little and Too Dear, on page 165

—EDITORS.

try to capture markets, not through lower prices, but by advertising and by emphasis on quality, service, performance, brand names and other product characterizations. This form of competition appears to assure greater consumer loyalty and to prove effective in driving out rivals. Moreover, it is less offensive to public morality.

The farther a producer is removed from the consumer's market, as in the case of the capital goods industries, the less sensitive he is to the need for reducing prices. His concentration on non-price competition blinds him to the potential value of price reductions to the national economy. It even encourages him in his efforts to restrain competition. Producers try increasingly to solve the problems of the contracting market through reduced production rather than lower prices, thus intensifying the forces hastening business contraction. Already, we are witnessing numerous instances where trade associations, as in the case of the coat-and-suit and textile industries, are cautioning their members against overproduction and urging them to curtail output. So deeply entrenched is this fear of price cuts, that the businessman's first thought, even when prices are inflated by extensive shortages, is to reduce operations rather than expand demand through lowered prices.

The third plank is to produce goods intended primarily for the middle income groups and to say to hell with the great mass of American workers and farmers on the lower income levels. The emphasis on non-price factors has meant a concentration on quality-product characteristics. Frills have been multiplied. Costs of products have been built up. This means that large groups of consumers are cut out altogether, opportunities for economic expansion are limited, and the standard of living of millions of Americans is repressed.

The fourth plank is to hedge against a possible depression. There is no confidence in continued prosperity. Business wants prices that will yield profits in good times and bad. Mr. Irving S. Olds, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation, in reporting first-quarter 1947 profits, declared that "we must make money in a period like this to accumulate funds to take care of a period when operations may be at a considerably lower rate. We know that we cannot expect the great operating rates of the present time to continue." Other businessmen reflect that if prices are low when business is good, it is not possible to increase them when business is bad and when costs are higher due to the lower volume.

American business, which calculates its prices on a cost-plus basis, sets them on the assumption of a low level of operations. The overhead cost per unit of output is therefore high. In 1945, over one hundred American industries reported to the War Production Board that they had distributed their overhead costs on the assumption that they would operate at only 52 per cent of capacity. It has been estimated that the break-even point for American industry in 1946 was 60 per cent. It is doubtless lower now. When demand is great, as it has been, profits are high—fabulously high. Mr. Olds, in his previously quoted statement, intimated that after the 15 cents wage increase, the break-even point was at about 65 per cent of capacity.

THE results of this business code are disastrous. We are distributing income at the rate of $185 billions; we are producing at the rate of $224 billions. The gap means depression. Declining demand will discourage producers. They will, as they are already beginning to do, curtail operations. A serious recession is in the making. In fact, it may be said to have begun. It is being considerably modified, at the moment, by the wave of wage increases recently negotiated by trade unions. They are primarily responsible for the recent upsurge in business. But the over-all situation demands drastic measures.

A constructive program now can do much to offset the depression-creating effects of current business price policies:

1. The present round of wage increases must quickly be applied to all types of workers in addition to organized industrial employees.

2. Federal and state public panels, manned by representatives of business, labor and the consumer, must be established to review complaints on the price and production policies of individual businesses. These panels are not merely intended as an emergency measure: they must be permanent. They must be endowed with as much power as is politically feasible, so that they can collect facts, hear the complaints of individual citizens, and enforce correct price and production policies. The test of their effectiveness will not be the implementation of anti-trust laws but the promotion of a stable economy of full employment with an ever rising standard of living.

3. We must immediately require the disclosure by businesses of their annual financial and cost statements and their tax returns, to facilitate public study of their practices.

4. We should demand the repeal of all state price-maintenance laws which were enacted in an underemployed economy.

5. The government should aid and encourage scientific study to facilitate the development of competitive products. Compulsory licensing of all patents must also be an essential part of this program.

A realistic program must start with the recognition that we live in an economy in which price competition no longer prevails in vast areas of American industry. The proposed program is intended to awaken the American people to the fact that American business follows semi-monopolistic pricing and production policies and practices.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Too Little and Too Dear

IN THEIR apologies for price increases, the steel tycoons give the impression that they are surprised at their own moderation. Chairman Irving S. Olds of United States Steel has asserted that steel prices have risen much less than those of many commodities. In order to match the average advance in the wholesale commodity index since 1940, he said, they should have risen not 7 per cent but more than 50 per cent. The American Iron and Steel Institute has advertised the fact that steel is the cheapest of metals—only $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound. (Is steel sold by the pound?) It claims that labor and material costs have risen by some \$600,000,000 since the beginning of the year, nearly twice the amount of additional revenue that the price increases will produce.

Iron Age, the industry's trade paper, says that the new prices will cost steel consumers $370,000,000 annually. This may not seem a large amount when set against a national gross income of $220 billion. Moreover, the steel-using industries are generally so prosperous that they could, if they so desired, absorb this extra cost from profits. It is doubtful if many of them will do so; with demand for automobiles, refrigerators, building materials, and countless other articles still running ahead of demand, higher steel prices are likely to be passed on to ultimate consumers on a cost-plus basis.

But even though higher steel costs are no excuse for a general rise in industrial prices, the steel industry's action is hard to justify. Certainly, justification cannot be found in the industry's earnings for the first six months of 1947. Much has been made of the fact that in the second quarter there was, apparently, a sharp decline in profits, as compared with those of the exceptionally profitable first quarter. There is, however, some reason to believe that this decline is partly due to padding of expenses. For instance, operating income of United States Steel (proceeds from sales less employment and material costs) was $89,365,000 in the first quarter and $91,859,000 in the second. Yet a fall of some $10,000,000 in net profits is reported. The explanation is simple. In the three months, April-June, the corporation paid about $6,000,000 more in local taxes than in the first quarter—apparently a normal difference between the two periods. The remainder of the reported fall in net profits is more than covered by an increase in depreciation reserves, made necessary, according to Mr. Olds, by the higher cost of replacements. Thus, if the accounts for the two periods had been drawn up on a strictly comparable basis, earnings for the second quarter would have been slightly higher than those for the first.

Another fact shown by study of United States Steel's reports is that the 12 per cent wage increase won in April has added very little to the corporation's unit labor costs. Comparing the first and second quarters of this year, we find that the ratio of labor costs to sales rose less than one per cent. Obviously, greater labor productivity is largely offsetting the wage increase and this is also indicated by the fact that shipments of finished steel per head of the working force were nearly one ton more in the second quarter than in the first.

Again, if we compare United States Steel earnings for the first six months with those in other prosperous periods in the past, it is plain the price rise cannot be excused by a plea of low profits. The total net for the period was $68,571,379. Assuming that the second half of the year brings equally favorable results—and with the price increase plus the near certainty of continuous capacity operations, they may very well be still better—the total for the year will exceed $133,000,000. Only three times in its history, in 1916, 1917, and 1929, has the corporation turned in larger earnings than this. In three prosperous prewar years—1937, 1940, and 1941—profits were $94,900,000, $102,200,000, and $116,200,000, respectively.

Steel claims that it is a "feast or famine" industry and must, therefore, be permitted to earn enough in good years to provide for improvements and expansion. At the present time, it is true, the big steel concerns are spending large sums on capital account. But, although the industry is quite unable to meet current demand for steel, with the result that production in many steel-using industries is curtailed, it is not adding to basic capacity. It is, to some extent, expanding plant for turning out finished products in especially short supply, such as steel sheets, but, for the most part, the purpose of its capital expenditure is the reduction of costs.

This is a perfectly legitimate and even laudable objective. But taken in conjunction with a firm refusal to increase basic capacity, it suggests that the aim of the industry is not to provide a basis for cheaper steel but to cut back "break-even" points to an extent that will enable it to sit out the next depression comfortably.

Big steel men are gloomily addicted to the theory that the American economy is stagnant. They have no faith in prolonged full production and full employment. They do not believe that, in future years, average annual consumption of steel will do more than keep pace with the population. Consequently, they are hotly disputing the conclusions of highly competent government economists who predict a steadily rising trend in the per capita consumption of steel. Dr. Louis Bean, economic adviser to the Secretary of Agriculture, has shown, for instance, that in prosperous 1941, steel output was equal to 1.7 tons for every employed worker in the country. On this basis, employment at the level of 60,000,000 jobs would indicate a need for over 100,000,000 tons, while present maximum capacity is about 91,000,000. Steel industry leaders reject this reasoning. They estimate requirements at no more than 76,000,000 tons in 1950, and 78,000,000 in 1955. If they are right, it means heavy unemployment ahead. That, of course, is just what they expect and, in order to play safe, they want to keep capacity limited and prices high. It's a first-class example of the monopoly tactics which private enterprise is following to disaster.

[This page will not appear for some weeks while Keith Hutchison is on vacation.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

WHAT THIS COUNTRY needs is a thoroughgoing cultural revolution, and it might well begin with a revolt against the food served in most restaurants.

Some time ago, I went to a French restaurant which is supposed to be one of the best in the country and is certainly one of the most expensive. The place was noisy and crowded to a degree no self-respecting restaurateur would tolerate, and the food was—mediocre. Only the wine, which came from France, was what it should have been. For the rest, the mise en scène bore about as much resemblance to a genuine French restaurant as waterlogged string beans to genuine haricots verts.

I wish I could report that some of the noise was the sound of angry patrons protesting against the flouting of every principle of good eating, but the patrons were as docile as lambs.

"Bad taste leads to crime." But in this country, it is not so much bad taste as the docility with which mediocrity is accepted that leads to the commercialized vice of serving bad food. One has only to listen to a discussion of dining in America to realize that the public taste is far better than the quality of public food would indicate. But in this, as in more crucial matters, Americans combine a marvelous talent for grouching in public with a capacity that passes belief for taking what is offered in public. In dining, as in politics, they choose what seems to them the better of two bad dishes, thereby insuring that, next time, both dishes will be worse.

In almost any eating place in France, one can, or could, get good food, well cooked. This was the delightful end-product of a long tradition of good cooking, in turn the result of a long tradition of demanding good food, upheld by who knows how many explosions of French temper set off by lapses from the norm. American cooking, at its best, is also excellent. But Americans, lacking the sanction and support of tradition—which they scorn, anyway—assume that what they eat, like what they see and listen to, is something for which they have no responsibility and over which they have no control. When they do get good food—which is likely to turn up in very unlikely places, for the good cook with a sense of honor often pursues his art in an obscure kitchen—they regard it not as their due but as a special dispensation. And given their passivity, so it is.

This passivity is, I'm sure, partly the effect of bad cooking. For there is nothing more boring or frustrating than a bad meal, involving as it does not only the actual horror of the food itself but contemplation of the waste and despoilation of what was originally good and promising material. Frustration long drawn out enervates the spirit, and, in the end, renders its victims so helpless that they are not only incapable of protesting against bad food but of denying that what they get is "what the people want."

One can only hope that someday someone will throw a blue plate at a restaurant keeper's head. It might release the pent-up energies of a people who always expect too much and invariably demand too little. Yours for the revulsion.

THE SHORTER FICTIONS, most of them fantasies, of E. M. Forster, hitherto hard to come by in this country, have now been brought out in "The Collected Tales of E. M. Forster" (Knopf, $2.75).

As Lionel Trilling says in his excellent study of Forster, the two stories which are not fantasies, The Road to Colonus and The Eternal Moment, endure best and are of particular interest because they contain in embryo the themes, symbols, and ideas of Forster's five novels; the others are not wholly satisfying, though they sometimes have wit or point or charm.

They are, moreover, uneven in conception and execution. The Other Side of the Hedge is definitely a failure on both counts. The Machine Stops, a "counterblast to one of the heavens of H. G. Wells," is heavy-handed and too long.

But stories like Other Kingdom, The Curate's Friend, and The Celestial Omnibus, particularly the first, in which a young girl escapes her conventional husband and his world by fleeing into a beech wood and turning into a tree, have always pleased me. All of them are nicely turned and well-placed darts in the bourgeois hide. Aside from that, they yield the limited but special pleasure one gets from watching the informal experimental exercises rather than the final formal performances of an artist who seems to enjoy his work.

I shouldn't label such stories summer reading, because summer reading in the conventional sense bores me. Still, they should be very appropriate for a reader in the precarious embrace of a hammock slung from two presumably stable trees and suspended between an earth and a sky which will presumably keep their appointed places.

The other day, my favorite radio columnist, John Crosby, reported an innovation on the air—a new kind of two-part singing in which one singer handled the lower notes and another took care of the higher reaches. Wait till Petrillo hears about it. Before we know it, singers will be assigned their octaves, and broadcasters will have to hire two or more singers for each song or pay for standbys for all notes above or below the union scale.

Two correspondents have reminded me that "The Wings of the Dove" is now available in the Modern Library. Which is fine—but it doesn't exactly fill my bill for an inexpensive edition of all the works of Henry James.

The Crucial Problem

PATRIOTISM OR PEACE? By Adam de Hegedus. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

THIS is an excellent book, brilliantly written; unfortunately, its title is incorrect, and so is its conclusion. Patriotism is not the antithesis of peace—unless we substitute, for love of country, love of more and more country, as Haldane's "patriots" do. The antithesis of peace is war, and whoever chooses this alternative may be either a fool or a scoundrel, but certainly no patriot.

The jacket tells us that the author comes of a family with a title four hundred years old; it neglects to say that Mr. de Hegedus, before the war, was the London correspondent of a chauvinistic Hungarian newspaper. The fact is apropos, because it lends even greater force to his all-out attack on nationalism.

In a profound and poignant analysis, Mr. de Hegedus shows that nationality cannot be reduced to race or language, and that, whatever its spiritual sources, nationalism is entirely the product of environment and education. I would not agree with his contention that "nationalism in turn intensified the desire for democracy"—certainly it is not supported by the example of Poland or Hungary, where the intensely nationalistic squirearchy did its utmost to prevent democratic development. Nor would I subscribe to the statement that Hitler's diagnosis "was correct . . . the world had a great desire to be united, even by force." Most of the countries which the Nazis overran did not exactly manifest such a desire, and Mr. de Hegedus himself makes the contradictory statements that "nationalism . . . is urgently separatist in character" and that "the nation-state as such wishes to be independent." But his diagnosis of nationalism as "the most widely used dangerous mental drug in our time" is masterly and sound.

Mr. de Hegedus's style is fascinating—a successful blend of English scholarship with the wit of a Hungarian journalist. His scholarship is made evident by his thorough knowledge of the relevant literature and his lack of bias. His wit is wise: "After the outbreak of peace, lies should be the first casualties." Or, "It is part of our tragedy that whereas the true story of the past, for most people, is a book written in a foreign language, the story of the present is written in invisible ink."

The journalist in him occasionally shows itself in factual inaccuracies. Thus, he mistakes Paul Valéry for the "frightened poet-ambassador" Paul Claudel. He claims that Hungary had 25,000,000 inhabitants, whereas the population, including Croatia, never exceeded 20,000,000. And he is even more inexact when he says that "Twelve million Hungarians ruled over 25,000,000 members of subject races." In speaking of the "grand total of 16,000,000 Jews living at present," the author apparently overlooked the so far uncounted millions wiped out by the Nazis and their associates. Finally, Luther, in many respects a forerunner of the Nazis, did not translate the Bible into "his own mother tongue, called today Middle German," but combined the German that was spoken around Meissen in Saxony with the German of the Imperial Chancery, Kanzleideutsch, to create the Neuhochdeutsch which, according to Professor Munro Chadwick, came to be generally accepted as the standard language of the schools.

These inaccuracies, however, are only minor blemishes on Mr. de Hegedus's fine portrait of nationalism. His diagnosis is not matched by his suggested cure. Not only does he indulge in the paradox that "war comes when the horrors of peace exercise a more powerful impression than the horrors of war," but he also believes that power politics is a necessity. By putting power into the service of a moral purpose, he asserts, force will create the unity of large areas first, and bring about, in an unpredictable future, the unity of the world. This, however, presupposes that power should be recognized by "the majority of the world as a moral purpose." His solution, I am afraid, begs the question. If the effective use of force depends on the recognition of its morality by the majority, why cannot this majority-morality put its will into effect without using violence? As long as nationalism has to be fought with A-bombs and rockets, the medicine would appear to be even more dangerous than the disease itself.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

The Composition of Living INDIRECTIONS FOR THOSE WHO WANT TO WRITE. By Sidney Cox. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

SIDNEY COX has been teaching writing, reading, and the composition of living for nearly thirty years: first at Columbia, then at Montana, and for the last twenty years at Dartmouth. The dominant lines of what he has taught—and learned—are pulled together in this extraordinarily suggestive, wise, instructive, witty, and truly seminal book. I will state at once my conviction that everybody ought to read it.

Probably I ought to add that I studied with Mr. Cox for three years at Dartmouth, that he is the only man who ever "taught" me anything I found useful about writing, and that he was the strongest "faculty influence" on me and my closest friends. That makes me suspect as a reviewer, no doubt: maybe the book seems so important to me because it is a notebook on a three-year course, you say. Perhaps; but I don't believe it. Within the interstices of this condensed and artfully deceptive simplicity there is room for play—including by-play and inter-play. The wise words on composition are themselves beautifully composed, and it is not necessary that the reader be a Cioxian initiate for him to be instructed and amused, and to come forth the wiser for his pains.

Mr. Cox's theme is composition. He states it baldly at the outset:

The act of composition is performed by all of us. Every time we make up our minds we compose. We change the composition of ourselves and of the world. Where there is life at all there is a constant forming. And the fun and joy in living comes when we make incompatibles unite.

"Indirections"—which also might be called Out of Conflicts Composition—is therefore not exclusively "for those who want to write." It offers itself, as half a conversation, to all who want to make anything—anything but money.

Although "Indirections" does address itself always to the manifold problems, including punctuation and even marketing, of ordering experience and communicating it through the written word, this statement is to be taken as literal truth. For Mr. Cox knows, and teaches, that good writers are those who have something to say and who have to say it. He is therefore as concerned with what they have to say as he is with the way they say it. It follows that what he himself says about making something meaningful of life applies with as much force to painters, musicians, teachers, preachers, mothers, and lovers as to writers. And for him, a good writer is one who also lives, in part at least and however imperfectly, the lives of some of these others. The good writer makes a composition of his own life before he can achieve his end: to make a reader (one will do) "turn a corner or a hair." By this composing he achieves the maturity which admits the equal validity in life of "joy, irony, tragedy, and faith."

This is not an easy doctrine, with its insistence on the ambiguities of life, its risky demand that we seek meaning first and security second—or last. Writers who are obsessed with the chaos of our time will sneer at the book's assertion that meaning can still be wrought from existence. Doctrinaire thinkers will snort at its injunction to reconcile irreconcilables—"right" and "left" are not only used symbolically here. Concocters of busy best-sellers will not even bother about it.

But it will be a continual source of inspiration and illumination to those who have loved Lewis Carroll and Molière, Tolstoy and Hemingway, Cervantes and Robert Frost, Dostoevsky and Herman Melville, Shakespeare and Chaucer; to those who want to write from feeling and living for the delight and enrichment of more than a coterie; and to those who, writers or not, are absorbed in the process by which men "gain their minute of composure and just a breath of confidence for the long succession of composings that is staying alive."

CHARLES G. BOLTÉ

Robert Schumann

ON MUSIC AND MUSICIANS. By Robert Schumann. Edited by Konrad Wolff. Translated by Paul Rosenfeld. Pantheon Press. $3.75.

THE later reputations of the dominant nineteenth-century music critics—Hector Berlioz, Robert Schumann, Eduard Hanslick, and George Bernard Shaw—form a collection of curious and depressing stories. Berlioz has been systematically misrepresented; Hanslick has been systematically vilified; and Shaw has been systematically ignored; while Schumann, conversely, has been systematically overpraised.

Schumann alive was regarded by many of his contemporary purveyors of musical culture as an irresponsible, perhaps even dangerous, radical. But Schumann dead was taken up and almost deified in Germany as the ideal critic. German musical hegemony leaves little room for an outside opinion; the correct view of Schumann the critic was impressed on the musical world, and one may safely say that for seventy years it has not been seriously challenged. The present edition has inspired a rash of articles in the American musical press, all chanting his praises—and demonstrating that the process of glorification is a continuing one.

However, the "correct" view can be maintained only by those who neglect to wade through the bulk of Schumann's reviews: the famous pieces on Chopin, Berlioz, and Brahms are known by everybody, but they afford only an incomplete, though not uncharacteristic, picture. The reviews of hundreds of forgotten compositions by scores of forgotten composers are necessary to correct and complete that picture.

Schumann's most characteristic critical reaction—to which attention has occasionally been called—was a tendency toward overpraise. Besides being natural with him, this tendency was also partly the manifestation of the particular critical hobby-horse Schumann rode. In itself, a hobby-horse is nothing—one remembers at once Berlioz and the apoggiatura, Hanslick and Brahms, Shaw and Wagner, while the critic without any hobby-horse is apt to be a critic with nothing on (or in) his mind. The difference is that Schumann was riding a dogma having little to do with music, and one for which we can have only a jaundiced regard today. Schumann was an active pan-German and spent his entire critical career urging on, for the greater glory of German music, every English, German, Dutch, and Danish nonentity who showed any promise whatsoever; while at the same time he tended to regard anything that came out of France (with the conspicuous exception of Berlioz, too great a figure to be ignored), Italy (above all), and even Vienna (although he tried, unsuccessfully, to move his journal there) as a bad influence on German music until proved differently.

Schumann also had, I fear, a mushy soul, of a sort particularly distasteful today. In any event, his prose does not survive its period very successfully; it gushes, endlessly. We find in it none of the crispness and élan which make Berlioz and Shaw, writing about forgotten people and events of fifty and a hundred years ago, still scandalously readable. Schumann's use of the Davidsbündler must be regarded as an expression of this mushy quality, which I take to represent the feeble elements of high German romanticism, although the

Journey

Between this and that other country is neither barricade nor sentry.

Plausible under elm and maple past the train window move the people, no foreign air in face or clothing,

nothing to warn me, nothing, nothing—no signboard's word to tell me whether this is one country or the other.

Yet once arrived, without confusion
I move expertly through the station:

no stranger whom the traffic vexes,
I can evade the trucks and taxis:

sure-footed sleepwalker, I saunter across the park, see without wonder the War Memorial, the benches, familiar sun, familiar branches.

I wait the proper bus, and waiting hear my name called in sudden greeting—and find my own responses come apt in the local idiom.

CONSTANCE CARRIER

dramatic presentation of criticism can be done brilliantly, as Berlioz has demonstrated.

It cannot be denied that Schumann was perfectly sincere and completely honest in his opinions; indeed, this is the one aspect of his work to retain a strong claim on our affections. He detested what he considered sham and occasionally brought himself to the point of being blunt and brutal with it, wreaking particular havoc among the flourishing virtuoso piano junk being ground out by the mile by the Thalbergs and Czernys. He did encourage, to the limit of his abilities, such younger composers as came within his pan-Germanic plans; and along with Gade, Bennett, Hirschbach, Norbert Burgmüller, Verhulst, and Franz, he did introduce Berlioz, Chopin, and Brahms to Germany.

Attempting today to estimate his contemporary influence is somewhat difficult, but it was probably less than his propagandists have represented. Historically, his position has long been secure; but of all the important critics of his century, he is probably the least interesting intrinsically, and the one most visibly dated by the passage of time.

The present volume of selections from Schumann's criticisms is obviously intended to perpetuate the mythical Schumann among the lay public rather than afford a representative conspectus of the work of the actual Schumann. It is an excellent example of what I would call perversion by editorial malpractice. The famous pieces on the famous composers are included; the equally enthusiastic pieces on the gentry who fell by the wayside, as well as the characteristic notices on the contemporary virtuoso literature, are ignored except for a purely token representation (Gade, Lachner, Czerny) tucked away at the end. For the uncritical amateur enthusiast, the book may have some value; for the reader genuinely interested in Schumann, it cannot be recommended. Editorially, the book is a genuine curiosity: a thing of snippets and clippings and disemboweled torsos. The editor declares that "the edition is complete as far as Schumann's writings on the great composers is concerned," but he was so obsessed with the notion that anything which could be regarded as merely topical should be expunged that even the notices printed in something like their original shape are full of excisions. Occasionally, he condescends to indicate the cuts, but just as frequently he fails to bother; so only a page-by-page comparison with the original will show where and what has been eliminated.

The translation is attributed to the late Paul Rosenfeld; and the editor goes out of his way, in his introduction, to denounce the translation by Fanny Ritter (1877), previously the only one, and still the only complete one in English. But a comparison of the two shows that Rosenfeld's "translation" is nothing but Ritter patched, and frequently little patched at that. Schumann's preface and the scattered quotations from letters not included in Ritter—perhaps twenty pages in all—are indeed newly translated; but everything else is mere revision, and concerns itself largely with style, not sense.

CHARLES B. FARRELL

New Horizons

ON UNDERSTANDING SCIENCE.

An Historical Approach. By James B. Conant. Yale University Press. $2.

PRESIDENT CONANT has become a distinguished educator. But we should remember that before he became president of Harvard he was a very distinguished chemist. It is but natural, therefore, that he should stress the importance of science as part of an educational curriculum.

This book—the result of a series of lectures delivered at Yale University—deals with Dr. Conant's views on how best to instill the spirit of science into young men who are to be our lawyers, writers, politicians, business men—into everybody, in short, except the young men who are to form our army of scientists. The object, that of making non-science students familiar with the "scientific spirit," is not new; the method proposed, however, does not altogether follow a familiar pattern.

Some twenty years ago, the University of Chicago started "survey courses" in science for non-science students, and the plan was adopted by many colleges throughout the country. Some of the texts prepared for use in such "outlines" show refreshing sparks, but, up to the present, such courses have not proved conspicuous successes. Having had some experience with these outlines, I have come to the sad conclusion that the excellence of a text is no measure of how successfully it can be applied in lecture and laboratory work.

Dr. Conant's book is not another science "outline." Here we find a rather detailed study of several "case histories"—of how a few scientists "stumbled through thickets of erroneous observations." The lucid exposition is intriguing, and one is tempted to shout, "Here, at last, is the book," were it not for the after-thought that there may be many a slip between book and classroom. I am told that Dr. Conant is teaching (or will teach) the course at Harvard. We shall have to be patient for another year or two for the postscript which Dr. Conant will undoubtedly furnish us.

The "case histories" studied deal with the lives and activities of a few outstanding men of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when experimental work was relatively simple, and, therefore, more easily understood by the layman than the scientific activities of our day. With much detail, and with emphasis on problems which had to be overcome, the works of Boyle dealing with the pressure exerted by the atmosphere, of Galvani and Volta and their electric battery, of Lavoisier and combustion, among others, are illustrated. Selections are made with an eye to bringing out certain common attributes: new techniques, such as the use of mercury to make a barometer, and the invention of the air pump; new concepts, such as the substitution of the idea that "nature abhors a vacuum" by the concept that air exerts pressure; and difficulties of experimentation. An attempt is made—but rather cautiously explored—to show interconnections between science and society.

Throughout the book, Dr. Conant makes it clear that he is not much interested in adding to the store of scientific knowledge which the student may possess, but rather to giving him an "understanding" of science—an object, which, on paper at least, he has carried out admirably. And such attempts as this distinguished chemist makes here should be multiplied; for, to take one example of paramount importance, our statesmen in Washington, who have to deal with the disposal of the atomic bomb, show, on the whole, an abysmal ignorance of anything approaching the physical sciences. For them—and for others—the book by Conant (coupled with Hecht's "Explaining the Atom") should reveal new horizons.

BENJAMIN HARROW

A Disturbing Tribe

PILGRIM OF THE ABSOLUTE:
LEON BLOY. Selections by Raïssa Maritain. Introduction by Jacques Maritain. Pantheon Books. $3.50.

THE church is one, and legion. There is a conventional and vapid Catholicism—the simpering painted plaster statues of the St. Sulpice Quarter. There is also a free, ardent, paradoxical form of faith, mystic and quasi-rebellious, at times prophetic and even apocalyptic, with touches of Milton, but also of Byron, Carlyle, and Nietzsche. To this strange brood, belong the Lost Leader, Lamennais; the Satanic dandy, Barbey d'Aurevilly; Louis Veuillot, at least for his virulence; Huysmans, Claudel, Péguy, Bernanos; in Spain, Unamuno. Baudelaire would fit admirably, if only he had not stated so definitely, right to the end, that he was not a believer. Back of them all, and greatest, is Pascal. A disturbing tribe, constantly hovering between beatification and excommunication; the terror of the bien pensants, the right thinking, that is, the unthinking.

Of such was Léon Bloy, whose life and thought are here distilled in his own words by Raïssa Maritain, whom he brought into the church. She does not conceal or edulcorate any of his aspects. Léon Bloy believed literally the Gospel truth that wealth is sin. Others have said that property is theft and the profit motive degrading: he makes us feel it, as Christ felt it, with the irresistible power of a spiritual revelation. But though he had espoused poverty, he finds no joy in his wedded life with her. He curses those who keep him in the blessed state of utter destitution.

And his abuse is unmeasured, especially his abuse of his fellow-Catholics. "Never has there been anything as hateful, as completely abominable as our Catholic world today." Not merely the conservatives of the Maurras-Franco school, who "dream of a restoration in which a watchdog's kennel would be offered to Our Lord Jesus Christ," but the Sisters, whose orphanages are sweatshops, "Society Monsignori" like Msgr. Bolo, the Assumptionist Fathers for their politics, Cardinal Richard for his wealth, Benedict XV for his neutrality. When the flower of Catholic aristocracy perished in the Charity Bazaar conflagration, Léon Bloy let out a yell of delight: "At last! Served them right!"

How can we reconcile this vitriolic abuse with Christian charity? Veuillot too had sneered at the "Charitans." Léon Bloy assumes, like Torquemada, that rigorous chastisement is the highest form of love. A perilous method. Bloy, in his favorite book, "Salvation Is of the Jews," denounces the scurrilous anti-Semite Edouard Drumont. But Drumont, too, claimed to be a good Catholic, and his tone is exactly the same as Bloy's; Bernanos still admires the author of "Jewish France."

"As time does not exist for God, the inexplicable victory of the Marne may have been decided by the very humble prayer of a little girl who will not be born for another two centuries." Evidently Bloy does not try to make sense. He knows it and revels in it. With him, as with Paul, Tertullian, Pascal, his own master Hello, and even learned heretics like Reinhold Niebuhr, the mystery of the Cross is scandal, foolishness, absurdity, paradox. "Revelation is a lackluster firmament obscured by mountains of sinister clouds from whence occasionally darts forth, only at once to withdraw, the very tip of the arms of lightning." All this requires, not faith, which I have, but an extremely peculiar kind of faith, of which I am utterly destitute. If the second essential Commandment be "Love thy neighbor," if Charity be greater even than Faith and Hope, then it will be hard to give the name of Christian to this tortured angry man, belching forth volcanic abuse, lighting fitfully our darkness with a glare which is not of heaven.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
66th ST.
68th ST.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
42nd ST.
REGENCY
23rd ST.

RKO NOW
SHIRLEY FRANCHOT GUY
TEMPLE • TONE • MADISON
'HONEYMOON'
Based on VICKI BAUM Story
— and —
Pat O'BRIEN
Walter SLEZAK
Anne JEFFREYS

'RIFF-RAFF'

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

"DICKENS" BROUGHT TO LIFE . . . SHEER DELIGHT."
JOHN MILLS • VALERIE HOBSON

'GREAT EXPECTATIONS'
By CHARLES DICKENS
— and —
'THE WEB' Edmond O'BRIEN
Ella RAINES

"SUSPENSE THRILLER."—N. Y. Herald Trib.

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MANHATTAN
CUNIAL
B'way & 62 St.

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

—Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Illustrious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEATRE, 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4236
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

Memo to: NATION READERS

From: THE NATION ADVERTISING DEPT.

Those of you who have a class product to sell would do well to consider using The Nation's advertising columns. Why not call us today so that we can further discuss this profitable possibility with you.

BARclay 7-1066

Give to help fight CANCER!

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 224 By MR. Y.

TO BEGIN at last to catch up on the books that have piled up, and to begin with the finest of the lot, Dame Ethel Smyth's "Impressions That Remained" (Knopf; $5): This book, originally published in 1919, is the first instalment of the memoirs of the famous woman composer who died in 1944. Born in 1858, one of the typical large family of an English major-general who was antagonistic to her musical inclinations, she went to study music in Leipzig. There her remarkable personal qualities won her the intimate friendship of the families who dominated the musical life of the city, including the Herzogenbergs, those friends of Brahms who are always mentioned in program-notes, and in whose home in fact she met Brahms and got to know him well enough to write a chapter on him that is better than any of the full-dress biographies. Nor was it, of course, only Brahms but almost all the musical greats of the time—Clara Schumann, Joachim, Grieg, Tchaikovsky, Rubinstein, Levi—that she heard, met, observed, and describes.

Nor is it only musical folk that she writes about with such keen perception, humor, and verve. The book begins with delightful chapters about her family—her mother, for example, whose "own point of view tended to obscure that of the other person—so much so that we often chaffed her about her style of relating a conversation: 'So he said something or other, and I said not at all, that's where you're quite wrong. . . .' Later there are equally fine chapters on her English friends. And throughout there are the observations on music, of the caliber of her remark about Wagner's "having written operas the length of which always seemed to me artistically arrogant—a wilful ignoring of the limits set by nature to human receptivity. But Wagner is, among other things, the greatest hypnotizer the world has ever seen, and for the hypnotized time does not exist."

In striking contrast to all this sharpness of perception, vivacity of mind, and vitality of literary style is the colorlessness of Bruno Walter's mind, the flabbiness of his translated writing in his autobiography, "Theme and Variations" (Knopf; $5). The mere factual

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the second of six puzzles constructed by Mr. Y, in competition with Mr. X. At the end of the competition, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

ACROSS

- 1 Varga-girl's boyfriend in Scheherazade's tale? (8, 6)
- 9 Pours out when the act ends. (7)
- 10 Takes more margin in depressions. (7)
- 11 A hang-over isn't much use on dark days. (6)
- 12 Stoop and eat out of them. (8)
- 14 Twin beds are commonly stolen. (7)
- 15 Makes organic footnotes. (5)
- 17 Dairy account. (5)
- 19 Dear to the editor. (7)
- 21 He recommends several glasses each day. (8)
- 23 Dry up! (6)
- 25 He comes out of a big lane. (7)
- 26 He makes wharf decay. (7)
- 27 Pavement on the road that Dante walked? (4, 10)

DOWN

- 1 Novel in which the baby slept? (9)
- 2 It's short and conical. (7)
- 3 Tinny note for nobody. (9)
- 4 Turkey and Syria are near this. (4)
- 5 Poohbah claimed to be descended from such an atomic globule. (10)
- 6 Well-known passage by Forster. (5)

- 7 Examine the thread in peace. (7)
- 8 Is twice worshipped. (4)
- 13 Strange, but in Germany food comes last. (10)
- 15 When he loses his head, he lives here. (9)
- 16 The price of frills? (9)
- 18 Any one of a Shakespearean quartet. (7)
- 20 Rapid movement in scores of things. (7)
- 21 What makes the Little Brothers so disturbed? (4)
- 22 It's not easy to get a hundred the first thing! (5)
- 24 On the verge of collapse. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 223

ACROSS:—1 ALPHABETS; 6 MEATS; 9 BULLION; 10 TACTICS; 11 TIC; 12 ALBINO; 13 SORE; 15 MISSIVES; 16 ARSENT; 18 CAPONE; 20 UNSOLVED; 23 DIRK; 24 BUREAU; 25 RAM; 26 NEEDLES; 29 RAIMENT; 30 ABUSE; 31 REDUNDANT.

DOWN:—1 AMBIT; 2 PALACES; 3 ANIMATIONS; 4 ENNOBLES; 5 SATINS; 6 MACE; 7 ADIPOSE; 8 SUSPECTED; 14 ABSOLUTION; 15 MACEDONIA; 17 INTERRER; 19 PARVENU; 21 VERBENA; 22 BURSAR; 26 MOTET; 27 FLUE.

record which it offers is interesting at times, as are the long discussions of Mahler's methods and results, the briefer ones of other conductors' and singers' performances. But even the factual record is often sketchy, cloudy, and incomplete; for men like Walter have had experiences which could provide fascinating material for a book, but which they consider it necessary to be tactful about; and Walter is excessively tactful: there is, for example, not a word about Furtwängler—his performances before 1933, his behavior after 1933, about which Walter undoubtedly has opinions.

Tact may be the right word for Szietgi's omission of Arthur Judson from his "With Strings Attached" (Knopf; $4); but a less pleasant word would have to be used for his inclusions in that chaos of pretentious "reminiscences and reflections"—the profusion of names dragged in for a purpose. Thus, "Kreisler was playing a concerto by Mozart (that 'supreme internationalist and equalitarian in art,' as Olin Downes felicitously put it) . . ."

Film Notes

THE UNFAITHFUL comes out against inadequately premeditated divorce and even suggests that a cuckold should try to understand and forgive his wife's adultery. It does not suggest, however, that he should ask her forgiveness for his far more contemptible failure to discipline his jealousy. And it dresses up what might have been good and plain, if rather immature, drama in some of the most superfluous plot-complications in years.

"Ivy" is an unusually ornate melodrama about an Edwardian murderess; it stars Joan Fontaine, who pops her eyes, coarsens her jaw, and wears her elegant clothes very effectively. The real star is whoever was chiefly responsible for the dressing, setting, lighting, and shooting, and that, I infer from past performance, is the producer, William Cameron Menzies.

"Moss Rose" is also English-turn-of-the-century, ornate, and about murder. It is not by a good deal as good of its kind as "Ivy." But Peggy Cummins is famishingly pretty; and Ethyl Barrymore, in an even sillier role, has moments when her sardonic slip shows, and others of such pure, gentle splendor that they make Gainsborough look like Varga.

JAMES AGE

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-2
598 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

CIGARS

ACCENT ON YOU

with personalized cigars. Rare smoked. Cellophane printed with your name, product, etc.

Does wonders for you socially and in business. For executives, salesmen, clubs, parties, etc.

Three sample cigars and details FREE if requested on business stationery or sent to anyone for 10¢

ACE MAIL ORDER CO.

East Orange 1, N. J.

TYPING SERVICE

MANUSCRIPTS EXPERTLY TYPED. Plays, stories, novels, criticisms, rewrite, instructions; low rates, prompt delivery. "MANUSERVICE," 109 East 153rd St. ME1rose 5-4993.

HELP WANTED

Teacher Wanted. THE MODERN SCHOOL at Stelton, N. J., seeks a recent graduate with a musical background. Being small, the school offers an excellent opportunity for a teacher to become an educator while working with small children. Alexis C. Fern, Principal.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

BUSINESS PROPOSITION of interest to physician, M.D. astrologer, under 50 years, must speak French. Box 1728, c/o The Nation.

FARMS & ACREAGE

FAMOUS MEMBER of Metropolitan Opera wants quick sale of his 100 acre farm: easy distance of Tanglewood; 7-room salt box; bath; electric; fireplace; artesian well; view; one room studio; plantation evergreens; privacy; partly furnished; possession immediate. $7,000 total price. BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, N. Y.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515 M.

Classified Advertising Rates

74¢ A LINE (SIX WORDS)

Minimum three lines

Box No. counted as three words

Classified Display $7.39 per inch

Attractive Discounts for Multiple Insertions

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street New York City 7
BARclay 7-1098

RESORTS

KAATERSKILL

North Catskills • Greene County • New York

Unique Venture in Hospitality

More than a resort — its cultural and homelike charm is different. Small, informal, yet distinctive with high standards. 200-acre estate, 2200 ft. high. Swimming, varied athletic recreational facilities, international menus of superior quality. Reasonable rates.

Open Decoration Day thru September

Reduced Rates in June-September

The Home of MR. & MRS. KARL D. HESLEY
Jewett, New York • Telephone: Jewett 521
Write for Brochure • Make Reservations Now

HATHAWAY LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR — FOR ADULTS

Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces. Tennis courts, handball, badminton. Swimming pool, sun pavilion, horseback riding. Golf course nearby. Delicious food. Easy transportation. American-Jewish cooking. Attractive rates.

For reservations or booklet write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone Tannersville 299

A picturesque Estate

Diversified Book and Music Library

Swimming Pool • Golf

An Adult Resort 45 miles from N. Y. C.

TEL. HIGHLAND MILLS 3071

From

WESTERN VIEW FARM

high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an inn which is in its twenty-eighth season under the same ownership-management.

Rates per person: $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week

TED OHMER

New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty and rest and relaxation. One hour from New York

ALL SPORTS IN SEASON

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7905

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE

STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK

83 miles from N. Y. via N. Y. Central

Charming lake and countryside, rustic surroundings. Fishing, boating, fishing, other sports. Beautiful walks. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for vacation and weekends.

Adults • Rate: $50

RESERVE EARLY

GRETE POPPER Tel. Stanfordville 2931

CHILDREN'S CAMP

WALTELL HOUSE ON FRANKEL FARM

MT. BETHEL, PA.

Banger 0273

VACATION FOR ALL THE FAMILY

Modern farm hotel combined with progressive children's camp. 75 miles from New York. All rooms with private bath. Meat, poultry, dairy products and vegetables from the farm.

Rates: — Adults $65 Week — Children $50 Week
N. Y.: Ella Frankel, 241 East 18th St. LE 2-5864

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons Price $1.45 per carton, postpaid. Send check or money order, ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 23, 1947

NUMBER 8

Twenty Years After

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THIS week the federal loyalty check begins. In response to President Truman's order, backed by $11,000,000 voted in Congress, 1,900,000 employees of the executive agencies and departments will supply the government with fresh fingerprints and information about their records and connections. Each department or agency is responsible for assembling the facts about its own workers, but the facts will be examined for evidence of disloyalty by the Civil Service Commission, the FBI, and other federal intelligence offices. In doubtful cases a full inquiry will be made by the FBI and the findings reported to the head of the department in which the suspect is employed. The department head may suspend the employee in question, but the case will be passed upon by a departmental review board and also, in case of an appeal, by a three-man federal board of review whose decision will be final.

This, broadly, is the set-up. Compared with the summary methods used to root out disloyalty in many foreign lands—including several safely remote from the Russian sphere—the methods to be applied in Washington are manifestly moderate. By way of contrast, I call the reader's attention to the details of British military rule in Palestine, presented by Lilie Shultz on a later page. In America persons suspected of subversive political views are not arrested or imprisoned. They are not even dismissed from government jobs without being given at least a technical chance to defend their records. Nor are they punished beyond loss of jobs when they are found guilty. I say this in fairness to the government; but I repudiate as disingenuous and dangerous the notion, frequently advanced these days by persons who call themselves liberal, that the restrained procedures used in Washington somehow justify the loyalty check itself and the purposes behind it.

On the contrary, the government of the United States has no excuse whatsoever for carrying out a purge on the scale promised, with or without safeguards. The ruthless measures of repression employed in Eastern Europe are viewed with profound disapproval in Washington; those in Palestine have been tactfully ignored. But I would suggest that the mild repressions now being carried into effect in Washington are less defensible than either. This country is not in revolution; it is not in the grip of civil disorder. The government is not threatened from any direction. If a political drift is discernible in the country, it is to the right. The Communists, however irritating, are neither more numerous nor more aggressive than in years past. Only hysteria or a calculated desire to make political capital out of the general fear of Russia can explain the institution of an organized system of thought control in the federal departments.

For the loyalty check is not designed merely to rid the government of Communists and Communist sympathizers. If it were, strict libertarians might still con-

Boardman Robinson in The Nation of September 7, 1927

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

Twenty Years After by Freda Kirchwey	173
The Shape of Things	175
The Pleasant Boomerang	176

ARTICLES

Lining Up the Americas by Robert Bendiner	177
India Grapples with Freedom by Shiva Rao	179
In the Wind	180
Poland Today. II. Trade and Planning by Alexander Werth	181
Tyranny in Action by Lillie Shultz	182
Self-Portrait of Germany by Del Vayo	185

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Local Ibsen by Joseph Wood Krutch	186
Under Cover. A Poem by Mark Van Doren	186
Appeasers Please Note by Thomas J. Hamilton	187
Russia in Brief by Keith Hutchison	188
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	188
Music by B. H. Haggin	189

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 190

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 225 by Mr. X 191

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Schultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.
Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

denn it, though the loyal followers of Stalin have done their best to rob such defenders of valid arguments. But the record of recent political dismissals shows how catholic and elastic is the federal definition of disloyalty. The recent announcement that ten more persons had been ousted from the State Department included an official estimate that 831 workers had been dismissed as political "suspects" from the government service as a whole; this before the new check had even begun. How many of them were suspected of communism was not mentioned, but the State Department made no pretense that the twenty persons so far ousted from its staff were even supposed to be Communists. They were dropped, it said, for "security reasons," without further specification.

It is a fact widely known in Washington that of the first ten dismissed several had no idea what charges had been brought against them. Some of them are likely to take their cases into court. I. F. Stone reported in PM on July 2 an astonishing conversation with Assistant Secretary of State Peurifoy, the official handling the department purge. A few lines are worth reprinting:

[He] did not think the ten were Communists, nor did he think more than a few might be called fellow-travelers, but he was dubious about their associations. . . . When I asked whether they would be told the evidence against them, he said they would not. When I asked whether they would be given a statement of specific allegations against them, he said no. . . .

In other words, even under the methods applied in stable and comfortably conservative America, government employees are losing their jobs on charges which are never specified and are thus impossible to disprove.

And while the departments rid themselves of suspects, the federal courts carry through trials which are obviously political in purpose, whatever legal bases may be found. The conviction of the Communist Gerhart Eisler for passport fraud was no doubt technically justified. He did use a fictitious name, and he did conceal his political affiliation to get out of France and into the United States in 1941. The jury ignored the fact that every hunted Communist attempting to escape the Gestapo and the Vichy police did the same thing if he could. The recent case of the Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee raised other technical issues, but it was decided on similarly political grounds. An analysis of the trial by I. F. Stone, who discussed the Marzani conviction in The Nation on July 12, will appear in an early issue. Essentially, for all their legal differences, these cases are of a piece. They are clearly part of a sweeping attack by the government on Communist and left groups; the law is invoked where other, simpler methods are lacking.

On August 23, 1927, Sacco and Vanzetti died in the electric chair, and American justice proved how low it could sink under the weight of anti-radical, anti-alien emotion. Before he died, Vanzetti, in a letter to a friend, said: "What I wish more than all else in this last hour of agony is that our case and our fate may . . . serve as a tremendous lesson to the forces of freedom so that our suffering and death will not have been in vain." Today, on this twentieth anniversary of his death, we must bitterly acknowledge that Vanzetti's wish has not been fulfilled. The "forces of freedom" seem to have been demobilized, while small men in office exploit the whipped-up fears of Congressmen and voters. So far hysteria has not swept the country into the extremes of Palmer's "red raids" and the Lusk committee—and the conviction of the two Italian Anarchists. But we are well on the way.

The Shape of Things

ARAB LEADERS FROM THE MUFTI ON DOWN disclaim responsibility for the sudden outburst of attacks on Jews that seemed likely last week to add the horrors of inter-communal slaughter to the rigors of police rule in Palestine. The Mufti characteristically blamed the Jews for his followers' violence. But Arab leaders in Palestine seemed puzzled by the ugly explosion and have tried, some at the risk of their lives, to prevent continued attacks and avoid provocative statements. The decision of Haganah to punish the Arabs responsible for the killings was itself ill-advised in spite of British failure to do so. However scrupulous the Jewish forces intended to be, their counter-attacks inevitably took on the aspect of reprisals rather than police action. And, also inevitably, they killed several innocent Arabs who happened to get in the way of their bombs. As this is written, the violence seems to have simmered down. Whether the Moslem feast days provided merely temporary distraction or the judgment of sober leaders of both groups has actually prevailed, the next few days will show. One thing is certain. Communal warfare can only damage the political hopes of Jews and Arabs alike. While it reflects no particular credit on the British, its chief result will be to convince the world—and especially the United Nations—that the two peoples cannot safely be left to rule themselves. So obvious is this that some leaders in both groups have hinted at "outside"—meaning British—instigation. But no evidence has appeared to back up the insinuation. A more likely explanation is the all-pervading tension of a country living under tight police control while its ultimate fate remains suspended somewhere between Geneva and Lake Success.

✱

INDIA'S NEW DAWN CAME UP LIKE THUNDER last week in a fashion which must have set a-wagging many a grizzled head among the disciples of the late Mr. Kipling. This was to have been expected. An empire was dying in chaos; two new states were being born to a violent heritage they were ill equipped to cope with. But now that the rioting has subsided it is possible to bring this advent of India's independence into clearer perspective. England has left India with no ifs and buts and without the shame of a colonial war. Other empires might take note. Two Indias have emerged without the horrors of the civil war which a few months ago seemed probable. Credit must go to England's statesmen and to India's statesmen: to the Labor government and Mountbatten, to Gandhi and Nehru. The problems that the new governments face are vast enough, as Shiva Rao points out in his article on page 179. They are problems of food, of the reorganization of a complex system of administration, of introducing new methods of agriculture and industry. They are problems of vested interests, both political and economic, and of bringing to realization the ideals of social justice for which many of India's leaders have fought. But they are now India's problems, and for the first time India has a chance to solve them. Let no friends of freedom become impatient if the process is slow and arduous.

✱

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN OF A political party has only one function that we know of: to win votes for the ticket—by organization, by personal standing, by persuasion, and by strategy. This simple fact makes a mystery of the President's apparent leaning toward Clinton P. Anderson for that post in the Democratic hierarchy. As director of the 1948 campaign, to succeed the ailing Robert E. Hannegan, Mr. Anderson would bring to the party the gift of the Solid South, which is rather like presenting a quart of milk to Elsie the Cow. Where Democratic votes are sorely needed, we cannot see Mr. Anderson as the man to get them. Voters who resented price control will find more appeal among Republicans, who really killed OPA, than in Mr. Anderson, who as Secretary of Agriculture merely undermined it. Proponents of the Taft-Hartley labor act will not be wooed from the party that pushed it through Congress by a Cabinet member who only urged the President to sign it. And those who want an inequitable tax bill will regard the Republicans as their best bet, even if the Democratic campaign is piloted by a man who shares their view on the subject. In short, Anderson would win over a few conservatives, while among trade unionists and liberals his appointment would have the rousing effect of a tepid washrag. Hannegan may be no more than the Missouri politician that Harold Ickes so often and so unflatteringly paints him, but along with his assistant, Gael Sullivan, he constantly urged on the President a legislative program for housing, lower prices, and unhampered trade unionism. He had the political sense to know what his fellow-Missourian had better recall—that when the country wants to buy tory government it prefers it in the reliable Grand Old Package.

LOADING THE THIRTEEN MEMBERS OF THE Brink family into a 1931-model car, Los Angeles County officials recently started the clan on the long road back to Bartlesville, Oklahoma. For weeks Ma Brink had held out against returning to Oklahoma, for the family, after five years' sojourn, had acquired legal residence in California. But the county officials, with a vast experience in such cases, finally "induced" the Brinks to leave with the promise of four new tires and tubes, a new battery, a tail light, and a connecting rod for the jalopy. With characteristic canniness, the officials refused to give the Brinks a lump sum for expenses en route, but arranged that they should receive small stipends from other welfare agencies along the line of march. No sooner had the Brinks arrived in Oklahoma than the welfare officials there disclaimed responsibility, on the ground, of course, that the Brinks were now legal residents of California. At last report the Brinks were headed westward again on Highway 66, made famous in "The Grapes of Wrath." The first case of its kind to occur since the war, the Brink story was treated in the Los Angeles press in a manner calculated to serve notice that the lush days of war-time prosperity were over. Somewhat out of practice in the fine art of shuffling relief cases back and forth across state lines, the Los Angeles welfare officials are obviously preparing for the period of stress and strain that lies ahead. Let future historians note the saga of the Brinks and their eleven children as the first adumbration of the "hard times" of 19—!

✱

THE LIVELY FEUD THAT HAS DEVELOPED in the ranks of the Republican Party in Oregon shows how sharply the public-power issue cuts across party lines in the Northwest. Guy Cordon, the senior Senator from Oregon, is a conservative Republican who acquired, in his long service under Charles McNary, an appreciation of the vital part played by public power in the development of the Northwest. Carrying the fight for the Bonneville Power Administration budget in the Eightieth Congress, Senator Cordon finally succeeded in rounding up commitments for a quite adequate appropriation. It now develops, however, that this compromise was sabotaged, at the zero hour, by a fellow Oregonian and Republican, Representative Lowell Stockman of Pendleton. After Senate and House conferees, including both Cordon and Stockman, had agreed on the compromise proposal, Stockman finally joined forces with New York's John Taber in the coalition that eliminated appropriations for the McNary-LaGrande transmission line, the Detroit-Eugene line, the Eugene-Reedsport line, the Reedsport-Coos Bay line, and the Goldendale-Detroit line. Indignant over this betrayal, Senator Cordon has placed the blame for "a thoroughly inadequate budget" for Bonneville squarely on Stockman. As a result, it seems likely that the Second Congressional District in Oregon will have a new Representative in 1948.

THE ARMY'S CIVIL AFFAIRS DIVISION ALMOST made a terrible mistake. It almost produced "All My Sons," a Communist play, for native audiences in Germany, Austria, and Japan. How did the army find out "All My Sons" was a Communist play? A. H. Sorenson, national commander of the Catholic War Veterans, said it was in a telegram to Secretary of War Kenneth C. Royall. How did Mr. Sorenson find out the play was Communist? It was so classed by one of his organization's field investigators who took in the show and prepared a résumé of it. Mr. Sorenson himself "is too busy to go to the theater." He is also too busy, it seems, to read the New York drama critics. They banded together last winter to name "All My Sons" the best production of the season. Obviously a knavish lot—Atkinson, Barnes, Mantle, and the rest: here was a play about a war profiteer who shoots himself, and they didn't recognize it—or chose not to recognize it—as Communist propaganda. Well, accounts have been settled. In response to Mr. Sorenson's protest the army has reexamined its decision and concluded, in the words of one of its spokesmen, "that we were a little off base." Signals off! The show must not go on! Anybody got a good play about a war-profiteer who dies of coronary thrombosis and goes to heaven?

The Pleasant Boomerang

THE panic in Hollywood at the announcement of the new British import tax of 75 per cent on American films must have surprised a great many Americans who weren't aware of the fact, though some say it is just a Hollywood theory, that the American film industry has been making only enough in this country to cover expenses, in spite of record attendance (now on the decline), and has been getting its profits mainly from British rentals. It will be a blow, particularly to anti-British isolationists, to discover that even that great private enterprise, American Daydream, Inc., has been dependent for support on Great Britain, of all countries.

One can't help feeling that hurt pride as well as the prospect of a flat pocket-book played a part in the reaction of the American film industry. Eric Johnston's statements have been marked by a sense of injury, and the action of the "big eight" canceling further shipments of movies to Britain indefinitely—which will have no effect for six months—was clearly a case of over-response. It must have been a shock to them to discover that the British public had not even rioted, let alone thrown out the Socialist government, at the prospect of being deprived of American films. On the contrary, when the London Evening News took a poll of the man in the street, only two out of twenty interviewed said they preferred American to British pictures, and of the others "nearly all were agreed that the loss of the majority of American second-feature rubbish would be a good thing."

Theater operators and film producers in Great Britain are opposed to a tariff of such proportions, for economic reasons. At the present rate of production, it is not possible to provide enough British films to take the place of those now imported from America, and the result would be the closing down of theaters and, as they point out, a loss in entertainment taxes. The effect of such a tariff would, moreover, almost certainly be prejudicial to the distribution of British films in America. The government, no doubt, will back down a bit, and the American film companies will calm down. A compromise will be reached. And the whole episode may turn out to have a salutary effect on the complacency with which Hollywood turns out "second-feature rubbish."

It seems justifiable to assume that the British move had cultural as well as economic motives. As long ago as January 16 Sir Stafford Cripps hinted that Britain might curb the importation of Hollywood films unless their quality were improved. "I am certain there are millions of filmgoers in this country," he said, "who are anxious to see the best films from other countries, and I emphasize the word 'best.'" Sir Stafford was not merely speaking for himself. More than one observer has noted that there has been a revolution in British taste during the years of trial. Whether as factor or result or both, British film-making has been going through an exciting renaissance—it was described recently in a very interesting article by Cyril Ray in Harper's. This means among other things that the British have a standard of their own by which to judge the American product.

The British deliberately export only the best of their films. It seems likely that any compromise arrangement in the present dispute will tend toward a similar discrimination in American films. And it is just possible that if our "second-feature rubbish" can no longer be palmed off on Britain, it won't seem worth while to make it just for American consumption.

When Eric Johnston said self-righteously that the British should not expect to get a dollar's worth of films for 25 cents, an English movie critic retorted that "for too long we have been paying a dollar for 25 cents' worth of entertainment." Touché—and so have we. Mr. Johnston also said, ominously, that the Attlee program on American films "may have set in motion a chain reaction which could blast the hope of all trade revival around the world." It could, on the contrary, set in motion a chain reaction by which—O happy irony—Americans would be freed, by their British cousins, from the torture of the other half of the double feature.

Lining Up the Americas

BY ROBERT BENDINER

IF THE United States delegation has its way at Rio de Janeiro, a hypothesis only slightly less probable than at previous pan-American gatherings, the current conference on hemispheric defense will be long on platitude and short on achievement. The meeting itself is both an anti-climactic admission of our failure to quarantine a politically diseased Argentina and a vague promise of more positive action at the conference to be held—provided everyone behaves well at Rio—at Bogotá in January.

The intention of Secretary of State Marshall and his advisers is to limit the conference to the signing of a treaty for which there is no compelling need. By the terms of various agreements dating back to 1938 the countries of the hemisphere are already committed to the Monroe Doctrine, pledged to consult each other in cases of aggression, and agreed on the principle of mutual defense. And beyond these commitments they are all bound by the Charter of the United Nations. As a restatement of these aims a formal defense treaty can do no harm, but in the matter of enforcement it is unlikely to make a peso's worth of difference.

This is true even if the conference overrides, as it surely will, the Argentine plan to invoke the same unanimity rule that has stultified the U. N. Security Council, because the American proposal is little more effective. General Marshall favors action on the basis of a two-thirds' vote, which would be excellent were it not for the proviso that any military action would be binding only on those who voted for it. Since there is nothing to prevent any state from going to the aid of another even now, little is added by an understanding that two-thirds of them may do so if they feel like it.

Underlying the American reluctance to go beyond this instrument at the moment is Marshall's failure to get a pet army project through Congress. I refer, of course, to the plan for standardizing the military machines of Latin America by furnishing them generously with our own surplus equipment. This was to have been at once the basis for implementing a defense treaty and, in the case of Argentina at least, a persuasive argument in favor of signing. There is no doubt that the refusal of Congress to act on the measure has left the Secretary marking time and slightly the worse for embarrassment, for there can no longer be any question that he is an enthusiastic sponsor, if not the originator, of the idea.

The arms plan, according to former Secretary of State

Byrnes, was spawned in the War Department while Marshall was Chief of Staff, and when the General succeeded Byrnes, he was clearly told by Under Secretary Acheson that the State Department had no use for the scheme at all. Originally, Byrnes had favored it, but he was easily persuaded by Spruille Braden, then Assistant Secretary, to oppose it on the basis not only of Argentina's untrustworthiness but of the competition and jealousies it would arouse and the intolerable financial burden it would impose on states hardly able to sustain their poor economies as it was, without having to engage in an armament race. Except for General Hildring, this view was unanimously held by top officials in the department, but Marshall brushed aside the arguments and, unknown to Braden, directed his representative on the coordinating committee for State, War, and Navy to give the plan his approval. The interdepartmental committee then made a sly effort to ease the scheme through Congress, deliberately trying to keep publicity to a minimum. It was at this point that Braden, already sorely tried, gave up in disgust, resigned, and declined a choice of posts that would conveniently have removed him to the other end of the world.

WHAT was Marshall's objective in formulating policy for Latin America? He was eager, in the first place, to resolve the whole nagging quarrel with Argentina, which was not only diverting him from the more critical problems of Europe and Asia but endangering his Republican support in the Senate, where Vandenberg had long favored a rapprochement with Perón. Secondly, Marshall is still enough of an army man to see unity, at least in part, as a technical question of military synchronization. What good it would do us in an atomic or bacterial war to have Peru equipped with American M-1 rifles and Chile with American PT boats is entirely beyond me, but this would not be the first time that a future war had been planned with the last war's weapons.

It is held in some quarters that the whole arms plan is directed against the Soviet Union and that the weapons would serve to suppress Communist movements in Latin America. This might well be the effect, but if it is the purpose, it leaves a great deal out of account. Aside from strengthening the comparatively rich, anti-yanqui, and at least semi-fascist Argentine at the expense of its weaker neighbors, it assumes that the Perón regime can be counted on to side automatically with the United States in a showdown with Russia. Such an assumption completely overlooks the role which the Argentines have assigned to themselves and which is not to be taken lightly, however short of the mark they may fall.

Argentina today aspires to leadership, not merely of the Latin American countries, which would be nothing new, but of Latin countries everywhere. It sees itself as the center of a third bloc of nations, standing for "peace" and holding the balance of power between the capitalist-dominated states of the Protestant world and the Communist-dominated states of the Soviet orbit. It was this ambition, according to one of the keenest observers of Argentine affairs, that lay behind the trip of Señora Perón to Portugal, Spain, Italy, France, and the Vatican—a trip that coincided with the "continental peace resolution" circulated by Perón in this hemisphere.

Delusions of grandeur? Perhaps. But megalomania has an important place in the political world, as Hitler and Mussolini demonstrated, and it cannot be safely ignored. The Communists of Argentina are not ignoring it in the case of Perón. Whatever he may say of them—he is inconsistent on the subject—they fully support both his Five-Year Plan for industry and his "peace" policy, and they share his antipathy for the United States. John Herling reports in the August issue of Harper's that they are even "urging an alliance between Perón's labor federation and the C. T. A. L., the hemisphere labor organization run by Lombardo Toledano." And in return, the same writer says, the Argentine ambassador to Moscow recently went out of his way to express sympathy with the views of Henry Wallace and to suggest "that Roosevelt's policy toward Russia had been far preferable to Truman's." Asked at a press conference whether he believed an attempt would be made at Rio to outlaw communism throughout the continent, Foreign Minister Bramuglia replied, "Argentina, as a democratic nation, has no intention of outlawing communism." I cite these incidents merely to indicate that Vandenberg and others who would arm Argentina as an anti-Russian gesture are putting their money on what is at best a highly erratic entry. Neutrality and balance of power, not anti-Sovietism, are the keys to Argentine policy.

A much surer bet for combating communism would be economic assistance, comprehensive and well-planned, for the entire southern continent—a Marshall plan for the Americas. No one can take seriously President Truman's remark that we have had such a plan for a century and a half in the form of the Monroe Doctrine, and the United States delegation has had considerable trouble in its efforts to keep economic aid off the Rio agenda. The Argentine delegate gleefully introduced it before he had fairly stepped off the plane. Cuba, at this writing, threatens to force inclusion in the treaty of a clause directed against "economic aggression," meaning specifically our own restrictive sugar quota. And at least three other states favor an immediate economic conference.

SECRETARY MARSHALL was statesman enough to see that the problems of Europe could not be solved by piecemeal contributions and patchwork diplomacy. It is not too much to expect him to apply the same reasoning to the south. Even from a strictly military point of view, a collection of poverty-stricken, jealously intriguing states armed with American weapons would be of far less help to us in the ultimate catastrophe of war than a continent equipped to supplement our industries and furnish its own adequate shipping. Marshall may succeed in postponing all economic discussion until the Bogotá meeting, but it would come as no surprise in Washington if, under pressure, he were to produce a token Marshall plan, said to have been already worked out. If he does, he will not only steal a march on Perón but hold out hopes for Bogotá that cannot be matched by dangling before his fellow-confererees the prospect of standardized jeeps from Juarez to Tierra del Fuego.

India Grapples with Freedom

BY SHIVA RAO

Madras, August 14

TOMORROW India will split into two full-fledged dominions within the British Commonwealth. India proper will have a population of about 290,000,000; Pakistan will have 70,000,000. Some states, like Hyderabad and Kashmir, have not yet declared whether they will join one of the new dominions or remain independent. Nehru has made it clear that refusal to join will be regarded as an unfriendly act, and Mountbatten has tried to persuade recalcitrant princes to see the wisdom of joining.

Many of these princes are threatening to make nuisances of themselves, as Nehru bluntly said a month ago. Since the division of India has taken place, and the British withdrawal will be almost complete with the formal declaration tomorrow, princes like Nizam of Hyderabad are reviving old claims to territories such as Berar, which he ceded to the British some decades ago. Berar is a rich, cotton-growing region with a population of 4,000,000 virile Hindus who would rather fight than accept again the suzerainty of Nizam, a ruler with medieval conceptions of the relations between a prince and his people.

Nizam is not alone in pursuing former grandeur. Lesser princes, who have apparently decided to join the Indian union, have collected, during recent months, suspiciously large quantities of war material. They harbor strange notions of princely dignity and privilege. Autocracy dies hard, however much the princes may accept the outer forms of a democratic regime.

What makes these princes a formidable menace to India's infant democracy is that, with their considerable resources, they can find work for large numbers of demobilized soldiers who are desperately looking for employment. Over 1,500,000 of these men who helped the Allies win the war are today a danger to the establishment of democratic rule. They fought the war because they were paid well to do so; no high principles of liberty or freedom moved them. A demobilization officer once explained his difficulties to me. "These men," he said, referring, at the moment, to a unit which had been in Italy for two years, "they like Italian wives, dancing with Italian women, going to the cinema. How can they now go back to their Punjab villages, which have none of these attractions?" Demobilized soldiers, scattered throughout India, want work and adventure. Many princes can provide both, and arms in abundance.

That is one great danger. Another is the rapidly vanishing supply of food. Imports have been disappointing; Burma, normally our best supplier, is busy putting down gangsterism and cannot turn its attention to the export of rice. Our summer rains have been irregular and inadequate, and the forthcoming rice and maize crops will reveal a considerable deficit. Some provinces have a six weeks' supply; others, no more than three. The daily ration has been cut down to eight ounces; further reduction seems impossible. The appearance of famine conditions has been reported from three regions near Delhi. Summing up the food situation, a worried official used these words: "Like 1943 [meaning the Bengal famine] but on a more widespread scale." Late rains, even at this stage, may save the withering crops and provide water and fodder for cattle, but the new dominion governments, particularly Nehru's, will face a severe food crisis immediately after the assumption of office.

The lack of food won't be the only major problem. Cloth, salt, sugar, matches, and oil are all things India's millions want every day of their lives. They are equally difficult to obtain. Industrial workers impatiently demand decent living conditions and wages enabling them to meet the high prices of most commodities. The strike fever seems to be spreading, despite Nehru's insistence that industrial strikes, whatever the provocation, constitute "stabbing the country in the back." The peasant, groaning under the demands of the landlord and his agents, wants to know when the promise to abolish landlordism will be kept. Everywhere there is deep social and economic discontent which won't wait indefinitely or express itself wisely.

Mountbatten, foreseeing much of this months ago, decided upon an almost immediate British withdrawal, the final stage of which will be reached this week. The question is whether the two successor governments, India and Pakistan, can successfully tackle the situation, complex and difficult enough to tax all the resources of even a well-established administration. British withdrawal is taking place under circumstances of exceptional adversity.

SHIVA RAO is correspondent in India for The Nation and the Manchester Guardian.

IN THE course of my last dispatch, I hinted at the realignment of political forces which might result from the division. It is clearer now that the Hindu Congress and the Moslem League cannot command the allegiance of all their present followers for much longer. The Socialists, who have formed a dissatisfied group inside the Congress, are becoming increasingly critical and may decide to break away altogether. The Communists, whose relations with the Congress have been even more unstable, have built up for themselves an influence the precise measure of which will be revealed in the next general elections. They are likely to win a number of seats at the expense of the Congress.

The Moslem League, too, is showing signs of internal cleavage. The establishment of Pakistan has had unforeseen results. For 30,000,000 Moslems living in India proper Pakistan means no gain; on the contrary, they lose privileges like separate religious electorates and representation in the legislatures and permanent services in excess of their population ratio. The Pakistan Moslems can afford to divide on real issues. Thus, in the recent contest for leadership of Western Pakistan economic considerations were given prominence.

Bitterness caused by the division of India will not subside for some time. The new dominion governments will have their hands more than full, dealing with famine, the general shortage of consumer goods, and terrorist outrages. Later, when the worst of the present crisis has passed, it seems more than likely that the vested interests—the princes, big business, and the landlords—will make a determined attempt to capture the machinery of government. Nehru has vision, courage, and strong democratic convictions. So long as his leadership lasts, India's government cannot succumb to totalitarian influences. It is essential, therefore, that his Cabinet deal successfully with the urgent social and economic problems facing the country.

Regarding Pakistan, one cannot be equally sure. Jinnah will be governor-general and president of the Constituent Assembly; later he will also be president of Pakistan's Parliament. He will choose the members of his Cabinet and the governors of the provinces: in other words, Pakistan will be a dictatorship without concealment or apology. If Pakistan under Jinnah can solve its problems more effectively than India under Nehru's leadership, dictatorship will have established a strong claim to the allegiance of India's millions,

In the Wind

BY GOLLY," said the Candle, "it's Taft-Hartley Week." "By Golly," said the Wind, "but you're right. The Taft-Hartley law, to coin a word, goes into effect, to coin another, on Thursday, August 22. How shall we celebrate it?"

"I know," said the Candle. "I have just the thing. Leave us read aloud from Mr. Prentice and Mr. Hall's versatile promotion letters. It just so happens that I have three of them here in my tallow."

"Let's have a look," said the Wind. So they did:

I

The [Prentice-Hall] Labor Guide uncovers vital provisions in the new [Taft-Hartley] Law which the union official can turn to powerful advantage. It shows him how to use these provisions to offset legislative curbs and retain the gains his members now enjoy. It explains the methods you must use under the new Law to achieve Union Security, to gain new benefits, to step up Union finances.

The Labor Guide explains the impact of the new Law on your next contract. It tells you what to go after. It shows you how to cope with the new demands that Management will make. It tells you what preparations to make for that critical next bargaining session. . . .

—Extract from a promotion letter for Prentice-Hall publications sent to union officials after passage of the Taft-Hartley act.

II

The new labor law gives you extraordinary advantages that you should prepare to grasp at once. . . . You're apt to miss its most powerful benefits unless you understand just what it means in terms of your own set-up.

We have prepared for Management the special kind of guidance it needs to reap the full benefit of this vital new law. . . .

You must get fully fortified now for your most difficult and your most fruitful bargaining session. . . .

—Extract from a promotion letter; same company, same situation, but sent to business officials.

III

When this news [passage of the Taft-Hartley act] hit the front pages, one well-known lawyer immediately said: "This law will tend to remove the settlement of many industrial disputes from management and labor and transfer them to lawyers, the federal board, and the courts. . . ."

Yes, overnight it has dawned on a number of farsighted lawyers what the new labor law means in terms of new opportunities for them. . . .

Begin at once and ride the crest of the wave, because competition is still slight. . . .

—Extract from a promotion letter; still the same company and same situation, but sent to lawyers.

"You know," said the Candle, bemusedly, after they had finished, "I admire the enterprise of Prentice-Hall. They are trying to bring order out of confusion. So shines a good deed in a naughty world."

Upon which, the Wind snuffed him out.

Poland Today

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

II. Trade and Planning

Warsaw, August 3

SOVIET communism is totally unacceptable to the Polish people, and the Polish Communists know it as well as anybody. But there are certain features of Soviet organization and economy which they—and not only they—consider valuable in the process of rebuilding Poland. Large-scale nationalization was, in any case, inevitable in Poland, with immense amounts of all kinds of industrial property left ownerless after the war. Planning also was essential, and the planner-in-chief, Hilary Minc, Minister of Industry—who studied Russian methods during the war, adopting what was best and casting aside the more objectionable features of Soviet economy—is generally considered, even by his political enemies, one of the first-class brains in the Polish government.

The Three-Year Plan is harmonious, coherent, strictly within the limits of practical possibility, and neither too doctrinaire nor too rigid. Poland's economy is a blended economy, a combination of three "sectors"—the state sector, the cooperative sector, and the private sector. The transition to socialism is taking place by degrees; the government is not forcing the issue. Wholesale trade is largely in the hands of the cooperatives, and retail trade is in private hands; in both cases abuses are being fought. For example, when the government found that Spolem, the principal cooperative organization, was not coping adequately with grain purchases, a government body was set up which proceeded to deal directly with the local branches of Spolem and no longer with its central body. Similarly, in order to fight against excessive profiteering on the part of the private shopkeepers, the government has been setting up its own department stores in various towns—less as a socialization measure than as a warning and a price-regulating agency. As a result, there is a certain feeling of insecurity among all kinds of property holders: shopkeepers who dread price control or the competition of a government store, and house owners who fear requisitioning and billeting. But on the latter point full reassurance has been given, and, to encourage the private rebuilding of houses, landlords have been guaranteed against forced billeting. If you have the money, you can rebuild a six-room house in Warsaw and live there all by yourself.

On the whole, however, the consumer and not the shopkeeper or house owner may be considered the government's favorite. In dealing with the peasants the government has been very cautious; the highly unpopular forced-requisitioning system of 1945-46, painfully reminiscent of German occupation days, was abandoned at the first opportunity, and the peasant now receives the free-market price for his produce. It is impossible, however, to generalize about the peasantry. Some of them are very prosperous (partly as a result of years of profiteering); others, such as those I saw in the northern part of Warsaw province, scarcely make ends meet.

In an interview with Mr. Minc, I learned that, according to his estimates, the cost of living had gone up only about 30 per cent since 1945, and that the sharp speculative rise in prices last spring had been checked by drastic government action. He indicated that large-scale inflation had been avoided, but that, for the present, one could hardly speak of an "official" currency rate; the present rate of 100 zloty to the dollar—in contrast with a black-market rate of 700 or 800—had little relation to the price level. He said there would be no really official rate until stabilization was decided upon; this, it seems, will be done fairly soon.

THE Minister attached chief importance to industry. One of Poland's proudest achievements is its output of railway carriages at the rate of over 1,000 a month and of railway engines at nearly 20 a month. Poland's steel production was still small at just over a million tons a year, and some steel and iron ore would continue to come from Sweden and the Soviet Union. With the loss of Galicia, Poland would also fall short of self-support in petrol. At present the country's greatest international asset was coal; it was already producing coal at the rate of 57 or 58 million tons, and the interesting thing was that, with the growing industrialization and the geographic changes Poland had undergone, its home needs were far greater than before the war.

Russia, under the trade agreement with Poland, was receiving 6,500,000 tons of coal a year. In addition, Russia imported Lodz textiles and other smaller items from Poland, but of Poland's total foreign trade of $300,000,000 this year, less than one-third was with Russia. The coal margin left for export elsewhere was, Mr. Minc said, over 18,000,000 tons; of this, 3,000,000 went to Sweden, nearly 2,000,000 to Czechoslovakia, and smaller quantities to France, the other Scandinavian countries, Italy, and South America. And 250,000 tons would be sent to Britain. "Since 1945-46, when we traded almost exclusively with Russia and Sweden, the relative importance of our trade with Russia has greatly declined; our natural tendency is to exchange with East and West alike," Mr. Minc said. He failed, however, to mention one important aspect of trade with Russia, namely, that the Polish army is almost entirely supplied with Russian equipment, in the absence—for the present—of an appreciable Polish armaments industry.

That Mr. Minc desired large-scale trade "with East and West alike" he emphasized several times; and since then he has, indeed, gone to Paris to negotiate a new commercial agreement with France, "to make sure of another link with the West" as was widely remarked in Warsaw. When I saw him, he said: "We cannot go to the Paris meeting on the Marshall plan. But our refusal to go does not mean that our economic relations with the West have been severed. Far from it, we have no autarchist tendencies, either in terms of Poland or of some imaginary 'Eastern bloc.' We can contribute to Europe's recovery, but not on the basis of 'Germany first.' If we get credits to develop our agriculture and our coal industry, it will help all of Europe. We can export—and already have begun to do so—eggs, bacon, and dairy produce to Britain, with which we have a satisfactory though still a rather small trade agreement; we have a hard-working population, and the advantage of our state planning is its great flexibility. Our credit is good; we are essentially sound and credit-worthy."

For all that, Mr. Minc considered trade with Czechoslovakia and other countries of Eastern Europe important in a different way: this was trade based on "joint planning." The Polish-Czech trade agreement, which he had just signed, represented, he said, 10 per cent of all Poland's exports and 5 per cent of all Czechoslovakia's exports. The agreement, or rather agreements (for he had signed more than 600 different documents!), provided not for a simple exchange of goods but for over-all cooperation between the industry and agriculture of the two countries, for technical cooperation and joint planning. A body would be set up to control the execution of the agreements. Czechoslovakia would have an outlet to the sea, along the Oder to Stettin. Mr. Minc stressed that what made such an agreement possible was (1) the parallel social changes in Poland and Czechoslovakia, with their emphasis on planning; (2) the alliance of March 10; and (3) the changes in the economic structure of the two countries. Before the war the Czechs constantly feared Polish agricultural competition; now that Poland's big rural areas in the east were lost, the countries were more alike, and instead of competition there could be fruitful exchanges.

[Mr. Werth's next article will discuss Poland's political set-up and its relationship with Russia, the West, and the Vatican.]

Tyranny in Action

BY LILLIE SHULTZ

Jerusalem, August 17

THE British are determined not to get out of Palestine, not to permit the Jewish population to increase, and to destroy the Jewish community if that is necessary for the health and welfare of British interests in the Middle East. The most convincing proof of British intentions is the nature of the administration of the country. Today Palestine is purely and simply a police state. When Britain was named as the mandatory power for Palestine in 1920, it immediately replaced the military regime with a civil administration. At the end of World War II the order of events was reversed. Today the military authorities rule Palestine, while the High Commissioner is a figurehead. The existence of terrorism in Palestine is used by the mandatory power as a reason and excuse for the police measures employed, but the same officials who seek to justify their repressions admit that the vast majority of the Jewish community is against terror. All the official Jewish organizations, including the Agency and the Vaad Leumi, are determined to end it, but they believe they cannot do so as long as the British military authorities—like Franco in Spain—impose sanctions against whole communities or groups for the acts of a few individuals.

As in most modern dictatorships, police control has been established by a series of regulations. The latest are the Emergency Defense Regulations of March 2, which established the General Officer Commanding as the real administrator of Palestine. The defense regulations of 1936 and 1937, on which the regulations of 1945 and 1947 have been based, were intended to protect the Jews, and the country in general, from recurrent Arab riots. The present regulations apply almost exclusively to Jews, although Jews are nowhere mentioned by name. In practice, they often receive the death penalty for crimes which carry a maximum sentence of five years' imprisonment for Arabs; where Jews get life imprisonment, Arabs usually get six months, rarely as much as a year.

The regulations wipe out all remnants of civil liberties, freedom of press, and of association. Their effect is to flood the country with fear, and to destroy the stated purposes of the mandate. They represent, moreover, a direct violation of the Order-in-Council of 1922-23, under which Palestine is supposed to be ruled. This order provided that no law shall be enacted which is inconsistent with the provisions of the mandate or which tends to discriminate among the inhabitants of Palestine on the grounds of race, religion, or language. Today 165 provisions of the recent Emergency Defense Regulations do precisely that. Violations of these emergency regulations are punishable by death, life imprisonment, fine, seizure, forfeiture, and demolition of property. Collective responsibility—a Nazi concept, universally condemned by civilized states—is imposed on towns, colonies, and organizations for acts committed or alleged to have been committed by any individuals within them.

LILLIE SHULTZ, director of the Nation Associates, has left Palestine for Geneva, where the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine is preparing its report for the General Assembly.

A person may be punished without knowing he has broken a rule, since the code itself provides that new regulations may be issued orally. Although the authority who makes or issues an order may bring it to the attention of persons who, in his opinion, ought to have such information, failure to do so does not invalidate the regulation. Military courts have superseded civil courts in authority. They may try all cases, and must try certain cases. There is no appeal from a decision of a military court; not even the High Commissioner can overrule it. Reversing the common presumption that a man is innocent until proved guilty, the emergency regulations place the onus on the person accused. In Palestine today punishment is meted out to persons suspected of having attempted to commit an offense against public security, those suspected of having committed such an offense, and those proved to have committed such an offense.

UNDER the control of the General Officer Commanding is the police force. According to the regulations, any member of the military, any police officer, or any mukhtar may arrest, without warrant, any person he finds committing an offense against the regulations, or any person he suspects of so doing. Any member of the military may seize suspect goods, articles, or documents.

As for punishments, a judgment of death may be rendered for the discharge of a firearm at any person or group; the throwing or depositing of a bomb, grenade, or incendiary article with intention to harm; the carrying of firearms, ammunition, grenades, explosives, or incendiaries. Liable to the same sentence are all members of a group one or more of whose members have committed the foregoing offenses.

Other penalties prescribed by the emergency regulations include life imprisonment for the manufacture of arms; for endangering or being suspected of endangering the safety of any vessel, aircraft, harbor, pier, or any part of the communications system; for wearing any part of any uniform of His Majesty's service, or that of a foreign country, or anything likely to be mistaken for such. One can be jailed for five years for harboring a person wanted for any reason by the police or the military.

Great authority is vested in each military commander. He may requisition land, goods, animals, or services. He may direct the forfeiture of any house, structure, or land suspected of having arms discharged from it, and destroy the house and everything on the land. As a punitive measure, he may evict persons, seize and occupy property in any area, without compensation. His power over the individual is, in effect, absolute. A military commander may order any person placed under police supervision for a period of one year. The person is then required to remain within the area specified by the military commander; he must remain indoors, in his residence, from one hour after sunset until sunrise; he may be visited at any time by the police; on the call of the district police officer, he must go immediately to the nearest police station.

Special powers are given the High Commissioner. He may order statutory martial law for any designated control area. Under statutory martial law, the district commissioner is obligated to close every government office. Civil courts are adjourned and the military court tries all offenses. The military commander may shut down every bank, telephone, telegraph, and postal service in the area. Without his permission, no person, vehicle, or object may be taken out of the area.

The High Commissioner also has the power to order the requisition of any land required for military purposes, to seize the property of any person he thinks has committed or abetted in an offense. The owner, master, and agent of a vessel or aircraft are deemed to have abetted illegal immigration if they are proved to have been on board a vessel or aircraft carrying such immigrants. These officers, and anyone who harbors them or harbors an illegal immigrant, are subject to summary trial in a district court and eight years' imprisonment, or a fine of one thousand pounds, or both.

Censorship is applied energetically to newspapers and all other printed material. The censor may prohibit and, in fact, does prohibit publication of any matter he finds prejudicial to the public interest. In the case of a censored newspaper, the publisher may not indicate, without permission of the censor, what has been censored, omitted, or added.

It was under the Emergency Defense Regulations that the arrests of June 29, 1946, were made. It was under these regulations that entire business centers and residential quarters in Jerusalem, Haifa, and Tel Aviv were requisitioned, thousands of persons compelled to leave their homes, and many business and professional people deprived of the means of livelihood. Under these regulations, martial law was declared in Tel Aviv and part of Jerusalem from March 2 to March 17. Under these regulations, 500 people were dragged from their houses on August 1 for screening purposes; the military demolished a house in Givat Shaul where arms were found on August 4; the High Commissioner banned the Brith Trumpeldor youth organization; thirty-five Jewish leaders were arrested on August 5. So constant are the searches that the army has recently put out a confidential manual, which I have seen, explaining how to conduct searches of village or settlement, quarter or town, single house, flat, group of houses or flats. This directive says, quite matter-of-factly: "So you see that you can arrest and search practically anyone behaving in a strange manner or whom you suspect, and, if you are wrong, it doesn't very much matter—the great thing is to act first and let questions be asked afterward."

THERE are about 718 Jewish "detainees" in Palestine and Kenya today—persons arrested and held for indeterminate periods. They are not charged with any specific offense; many have no idea why they are being held. Four hundred and sixty are in the Latrun camps, A and B; 40 are in Bethlehem; 280 in Kenya. In addition, there are at least 500 Palestinians under supervision who have to report to the police, usually once a day, frequently three times a day. These people are subject to rearrest every time an incident occurs. Among the inmates of the Kenya camp, there are some who have been detained for up to seven years, many from three to four years. Among them are seventy former soldiers, ten of whom were arrested while still in active service. Persons detained are not told why: the detention order merely states that the military commander considers their detention necessary for public order. As a rule they are informed that they are suspected of belonging to an illegal organization, without particulars or proof.

Frequently persons are arrested because of resemblance, in face or name, to a wanted person. A man named Moshe Alofia was detained at the beginning of 1946 and held for several months because he looked like a man wanted by the Criminal Investigation Department. Another time, all persons named Levy were held until the C. I. D. found the Levy they wanted! Persons acquitted in the courts are often rearrested. A man named Arie Horowitz was charged with carrying firearms in 1944. He was tried and acquitted. He was taken, none the less, into custody by the C. I. D., and sent to Eritrea; he was not released until 1946, after contracting a serious illness. Another man, Benjamin Atzit, was sentenced to prison in 1942 for carrying arms. On March 3, 1946, he completed his term. Immediately upon his release, he was taken into custody and sent to Latrun.

Among the detainees are ex-members of the A. T. S. and the W. A. A. F. who were detained immediately upon their discharge from service. Their records, which I have seen, were either exemplary or good. Some of these girls have been in Bethlehem prison for two, three, and four years. Boys of thirteen to sixteen have been arrested, most of them for distributing leaflets, and some have been in detention for six or seven years. Pregnant women and mothers of numerous children have also spent extended periods at Latrun.

The only recourse a detained person has is to apply to an advisory committee whose function under the regulations is to make recommendations to the military commander. Since April, however, there has been no committee at all. Even before that, neither the detainee nor his lawyer was ordinarily interviewed by the committee; it sat in secret and decided the case, in consultation with the police, on the basis of the police file. In a few exceptional instances, detainees appeared before the committee or, more frequently, the secretary of the committee interviewed the detainee. But it took, on the average, between four and six months for any case to reach the committee.

CONDITIONS in the camps are poor. Food is insufficient and inferior. The detainees are required to cook their own meals. All food supplements must come from their own families. In the event of illness, hours pass before an ambulance arrives. If hospitalization is recommended, detainees must wait until there is a vacancy at the government hospital in Jerusalem. They spend the waiting time in the central prison in Jerusalem. While in a hospital, the detainee is chained to a bed.

The camps lack any sort of cultural provisions; no newspapers, books, films, or lecturers are available. No cigarettes are supplied. No sheets are issued. Clothes are scarce. The detainee is not permitted to engage in gainful labor or learn a trade. He is allowed to send one letter a fortnight. Letters are delayed by the C. I. D. for as long as three weeks, and the detainee must pay for his letter paper and postage. A single visitor's permit is granted, once a month, to the closest relative. During a visit, guest and detainee stand separated by a barbed-wire fence. The detainee is not permitted to be with his family on special occasions, such as births or deaths.

The record cited above is the clearest declaration of the intentions of the mandatory power. But Britain and the world may be sure of one thing. The Jewish community will resist. Neither its strength nor its fighting spirit should be minimized.

Self-Portrait of Germany — Del Vayo

THIS column has occasionally quoted the French monthly, Esprit. Here is a review that admirably lives up to its title; edited by a group of Catholic writers, it is one of the most intelligent publications of the new Europe. Esprit speaks for the enlightened, liberal Catholics of France—such men as Jacques Maritain, Georges Bernanos, Foreign Minister Bidault, and Cardinal Verdier, Archbishop of Paris—most of whom, unlike their American confrères, supported the cause of the Republic throughout the Spanish War.

The scholarly and authoritative fashion in which Esprit has, in successive issues, examined the political problems of the postwar world makes it required reading for those who want to understand the trend of European thinking today. Several months ago, I was amused to see an article of mine in The Nation, discussing Europe's new concepts of democracy, bitterly attacked by Edgar Mowrer in the New York Post. He accused me of drinking from Communist wells; actually my piece was based on a special study which Esprit had made of this particular subject.

The June issue of Esprit is entirely devoted to the German question. It is a special number, almost book size—75,000 words—composed exclusively of articles by Germans. This is no narrow survey written by intellectuals for intellectuals, but rather an enquête unique in which men of diverse, indeed diametrically opposed, social and political views were asked to interpret the Germany of 1947.

The study falls into eight parts: 1. States of mind; 2. Memoirs of Nazism; 3. Is Germany guilty? 4. Complaints of the occupied; 5. Is Germany democratic? 6. German youth; 7. Christianity and the churches; 8. Lines of the future: Germany, France, Europe.

Reading through the pages attentively, I came to three conclusions. First, there is ample justification for the repeated warnings of those who believe that the possibility of a fascist revival in Europe, with Germany as its center, is far more real and menacing than it was two years ago. Second, if the United States has no intention of using a fascist Germany against Russia or of promoting the creation of a fascist Germany, then its policy of preventing a thorough purge of Nazi elements is one of the most tragic blunders of our time. Third, there is still a chance—though time is running short—to build a democratic Germany. That can be done, however, only through active assistance to anti-fascist elements, destruction of fascism's capitalist underpinnings, nationalization of industry, strengthening of the workers' political role; in a word, through a policy directly contrary to that now being pursued by General Clay.

Esprit's survey establishes conclusively the continued existence of German fascism. "We cannot deny the sad truth," writes Walter Kosack of Strendlingen-am-Rhein, "the lying propaganda of the Nazis is still alive among a large section of the population and is bearing fruit. The Nazis continue to exercise their corrupting influence everywhere because the political purge was never carried through effectively." From Georg Reichardt of Bingen comes the warning: "If the Allies were to withdraw from Germany today, the old Nazi spirit would quickly take the ascendancy." These are the voices of honest German anti-fascists who are not afraid to look squarely at the facts. But listen to the statements of avowed Nazis—discreet enough, however, to leave their articles unsigned: "A good German cannot but be a National Socialist. After 1933, things went better in every domain."

In Germany today, the struggle is still between an anti-fascist minority, made up of the survivors of the concentration camps and emigrés who have returned home in the past two years, and an aggressive Nazi minority. Between the two, stands the mass of Germans, largely indifferent, without a fixed political horizon, easy prey for a new fürher of any political stripe who will show them the road back to national grandeur. A year ago, this intermediate mass was still a factor that could only acquire real significance in the degree to which the relations between the big powers deteriorated. Then came the light—not from the East, as in the Bible, but from Washington, where President Truman emerged as a present-day Archangel. Since his speech of March 12, these millions of Germans, who might have been steered into democratic paths by an intelligent Anglo-American policy, have recovered their confidence and are beginning to look upon their nation no longer as an appendage but rather as the central force in Europe. The most militant see the possibility of winning the war Hitler lost by offering themselves as shock troops in the next conflagration. Little matter if the ideal of the Master Race must, for the moment, be abandoned while they go into battle under the orders of a superior Anglo-Saxon high command; the very fact of being accepted into the Western camp is, for them, the first step in Germany's return to its former rank as a major power. What otherwise might take fifty years of painful, uphill struggle could be accomplished overnight, should President Truman declare: "I request the Congress to recognize a state of war between the United States and Russia." It is for this moment that many of these Germans live.

Esprit has made no discoveries; it has simply furnished documentary proof of facts generally recognized by serious students of Germany. Returning last week from a visit to the American zone of occupation, Nathan Straus, former United States Housing Administrator, said: "The Germans dream of two things—enough to eat and a war between the United States and Russia."

War need not come. Indeed, I am persuaded that the masses of people everywhere will make a conflict between East and West impossible. But the damage done by the policy of nourishing Germany's dream of power and thwarting the efforts of its small democratic minority will be more difficult to repair.

[Mr. del Vayo left for Paris last week and will cover the most important European developments between now and the September meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations in New York.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Local Ibsen

IBSEN: The Intellectual Background.

By Brian W. Downs. Cambridge University Press. $3.25.

DURING the last ten or fifteen years, the reputation of Ibsen seems to have been passing successfully through its dangerous age. There was a time when it looked as though his plays were getting to be outmoded, and as though they could never again be anything else. Obviously, his "social problems" were hopelessly dated, and yet it was upon the timeliness of these same problems that his earliest admirers had based their praise. Even in the commercial theater, however, "Hedda Gabler," "The Wild Duck," and even "Ghosts" never died as it seemed they ought to die, and gradually it has been admitted that Ibsen, in his queer, heavy, sometimes graceless, Northern way is some kind of a classic—partly because of his sheer dramatic effectiveness, more because his situations have more continuously interesting implications than the earlier Ibsenites realized.

Brian Downs's short but solid and impressive little book pretty much takes for granted what has just been said. It is not primarily an interpretation of Ibsen's modern meaning, but a scholarly investigation of a question which is made interesting by the assumption that Ibsen is now a classic: namely, what were the local circumstances surrounding the development of his style and his intentions? That this question has never been satisfactorily discussed before may seem strange, but I do not think that it has, even in Koht's standard two-volume biography, and there is an intelligible reason why it has not. Neither the literature nor the social and political history of Scandinavia had, in themselves, any great interest for the Europe which suddenly discovered, in Ibsen's plays, a breathless excitement. The very fact that the author seemed to spring full blown out of nowhere made him all the more impressive and all the more easily acceptable as an international prophet. Bernard Shaw, to take an example, had not the slightest interest in what Ibsen's origins were or, for that matter, in what Ibsen himself intended. He was interested only in what he could make Ibsen seem to mean, and, to some extent, that has been the attitude of most of those who have written about him either as prophet or as playwright. Now Mr. Downs, who is described on the title page as "Sometime Director of Scandinavian Studies" at Cambridge, comes along and brings to bear upon the subject an immense, detailed knowledge of the literary, social, and political background against which Ibsen's career developed. He provides Ibsen with a local habitation and a name which he has never before had.

It may be argued, of course, that much of what Mr. Downs has to say is irrelevant, so far as any understanding of what Ibsen, the classic, does and can mean. It is the European Ibsen, not the Norwegian Ibsen, who is really important. Hedda Gabler is now a myth, not a realistic character in a setting abundantly supplied with local color. With only a tolerable degree of exaggeration, it might be said that to point out, as Mr. Downs does, that most English productions of "Hedda Gabler" grossly misrepresent the heroine's social and economic status, is as irrelevant as a criticism of "Hamlet" based on a knowledge of what medieval Denmark was really like. But the facts about a first-rate writer have an interest in themselves; they often throw light, at unexpected moments, upon important questions of interpretation; and the author of the present work certainly makes no claims which his exposition does not abundantly justify.

As a matter of fact, almost every chapter of his book is both interesting in itself and, in one way or another, illuminating. If it did no more than dissipate the false Shavian image—which has so often confused English and American readers attempting the task, sufficiently difficult in itself, of penetrating Ibsen's deliberate ambiguities—it would be rendering a real service. Actually, it does that and a great deal more. It manages to distinguish clearly the limited, actual, local Ibsen, not only from the late nineteenth century liberal's image of what he hoped he was, but also from the potentially enduring classic which he has now become. Much of what Mr. Downs has to reveal about Ibsen's attitude toward sexual love, free will, "the claims of the ideal," the hero as man of will, and so forth, are extremely interesting. The present fashion

Under Cover

Put it away in that building; rust and dust
And rats are there, and spiders, and dry rot; —
But the roof is good, and so those two great robbers,
Rain and sun, will go and hunt elsewhere;
And so gravedigger time—old naked time
That moves without a shadow—he'll creep on
To things no hand has hidden. Lay it away,
For that is what men do. Time, sun, and rain
Would have all earth as one—look how they soak
And wither, and sink hugest hugest objects in.
Even dark buildings; but forget, forget.
Think only of the open, and how smooth
Time keeps it with his tools of wet and dry.
Even stout rooftrees; but repair them now.
The difference between late death and soon
Is inches, time will mumble; yet men know
How golden is that space, how not to be spared.

MARK VAN DOREN

being what it is, his chapter on Ibsen and Kierkegaard will probably be considered especially significant. It seems, if the necessary oversimplification is permissible, that while "Brand" is a protest against Kierkegaard's demand for Christian martyrdom, "Peer Gynt" is a protest against those who failed to recognize just how close to martyrdom one ought to be willing to come. And that is exactly what might be expected of a writer whose dying words are said to have been: "On the contrary."

Mr. Downs's book is only 182 pages long, and yet it is packed with fact and comment to the point where it requires the closest attention from the reader. That alone is probably sufficient to limit its audience very severely. But it is one of the indispensable books for anyone who seriously wants to understand its subject.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Appeasers Please Note

DESIGN FOR AGGRESSION. The

Inside Story of Hitler's War Plans.

By Peter de Mendelssohn. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

THERE is some talk that the evidence submitted at the Nürnberg trials will eventually be published in full, but no perceptible progress is being made in that direction. Meanwhile, the excellent summary prepared by Mr. de Mendelssohn is an invaluable demonstration of just what the Nazis were up to from 1937 to 1941, when they put "Operation Barbarossa," the invasion of the Soviet Union, into effect.

The crucial date was February 2, 1941, when Hitler and his army chiefs, disregarding the protests of Räder and the navy, decided to settle accounts with Stalin without waiting to knock Great Britain out of the war. This meant, as was conceded by the army high command, that "from now on 'Attila' [the seizure of French North Africa] can be carried out only under difficulties; 'Felix' [the march through Spain on Gibraltar] is now no longer possible because the artillery set aside for it is needed in Russia; and 'Sea-Lion' [the invasion of Britain] can no longer be carried out." Hitler asked if the army could spare an armored division to halt the British advance in Libya and was told that it could be supplied "most unwillingly" from "Marita" (name of the Yugoslav invasion), and that "Barbarossa" also was in need.

Only the documents and parts of documents that the prosecutors placed in evidence were available to Mr. de Mendelssohn; a definitive account of Hitler's designs will have to wait until the others are finally released. But it is possible here to follow in detail the shifts in Nazi policy: as an example, Hitler intended originally to polish off Czechoslovakia first and then take over Austria. His failure to invade England after the collapse of France appears to have been due to his belief that the new world primer

by Julien Cornell

A common sense book which will help you to straighten out your thinking about the complex problems of world organization and the United Nations.

"A clear and simple presentation of the problem, its inevitability and its historic background. Whoever has read this book attentively is enabled to form an independent judgment on basic questions of international politics on which everyone today must take a stand."

ALBERT EINSTEIN

"An able and remarkably lucid statement of the greatest problem before mankind today."

RAYMOND SWING

"Mr. Cornell puts his case effectively, with irrefutable logic."

DOROTHY CAMFIELD FISHER

A NEW DIRECTIONS BOOK • $2

500 Fifth Avenue, New York City

U-boat would do the job rather than to any real expectation that the British would ask for peace out of sheer desperation.

It is instructive to read the exact operational plan produced when it became apparent that there would have to be an invasion of England; there were to be two army groups, totaling eleven infantry and two mountain divisions, with six armored divisions, two motorized divisions, and one S. S. division to follow up the original landings in the south. But it is even more instructive to read the 1938 documents, in which we see that the Nazis had a mere handful of troops and planes to back up the unfinished West Wall in the days of Munich.

The German documents themselves are the final indictment of the appeasers. Thanks to Hitler's folly in invading Russia and the folly of the Japanese in attacking the United States that same year, the Allies won the war. But appeasement cost the world tens of millions of lives, and left a heritage of distrust between the Soviet Union and the Western democracies which has a good deal to do with the unquiet nights of the post-war era. Mr. de Mendelssohn, in fact, believes that, from Munich on, Stalin was convinced that he could not rely on the Western powers, and that Chamberlain and Daladier thus made the Soviet-Nazi deal of 1939 inevitable.

Since the author has restricted himself to the Nazis' own records, the reader has to supply most of the background information, but without this limitation the study would have reached unmanageable proportions.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON

Russia in Brief

RUSSIA. A Short History. By Helen Gay Pratt and Harriet L. Moore. The John Day Company. $4.

FIRST issued ten years ago under the auspices of the American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, this book now reappears with some revisions and two additional chapters by Miss Moore which bring it up to date. As the centuries prior to 1914 are disposed of in 101 of the book's 261 pages, its original title, "From Tsarist Empire to Socialism," was really more descriptive. For a history of Russia which is well rounded as well as short, the reader must look elsewhere. Within their self-imposed limitations, however, the authors have done an interesting job, making good use of documentary and literary material. Their approach to the Soviet Union is warmly sympathetic, so much so that they slide very gingerly over such thin ice as the German-Soviet Pact of 1939. On the other hand, they have not followed the party line by rewriting history to support the Stalinist myth. Thus Trotsky is given credit for his part in creating the Red Army and smashing the counter-revolution and not treated as the man who wasn't there in 1917.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Fiction in Review

THE STEEPER CLIFF by David Davidson (Random House, $3) is not the distinguished literary performance it is being said to be. Nevertheless, the enthusiastic reception it has received can be read as one of the happier signs of the times. It must mean that we are at last ready to be told that all Germans need not be either anti-Nazi angels or, on the other hand, Nazi devils; that a great many of them are only ordinary people like us Americans—now capable of a shining moment of heroism, now weak and frightened, for the most part torn between their ideals of decency and their natural instinct to easy survival. "The Steeper Cliff" is about an American officer obsessed with the problem of personal bravery who, assigned to find Germans to staff the new democratic newspapers in our occupied zone, begins to identify himself with a missing journalist whose conduct under fascism seems to parallel what his own would have been in similar circumstances. The research into the career of this unknown German provides the dramatic suspense of Mr. Davidson's story and leads his hero to several important conclusions. He learns that courage is not an absolute, as he had always believed, but that it is still a reality, and a good reality. He learns that even a brave person is not necessarily brave all the time. He eventually comes to understand that although it was far better to fight Nazism than to be passive under it, it is not always given to the individual to be as strong as he would wish to be; and that only to aid and approve Nazism was to be guilty of an absolute wickedness. He discovers, in other words, that we must judge Germans as human beings.

Nowadays, this is an unusually decent lesson for a novel to teach. "The Steeper Cliff" is also unusually interesting as a piece of reporting: here is a first-hand account, with a sharp ring of authenticity, of Germany under American occupation. Beyond this, except to say that the book sustains a nice narrative excitement, I cannot go. Mr. Davidson is obviously aware of the rich texturing of our lives but he is not yet able to recreate this richness in his writing.

"The Eagle on the Plain" by Victor Wolfson (Simon and Schuster, $2.75) is a novel on two levels. It is, first, a folk story of life in a poor little backroads community in the Catskills; as such, it has many of the charms of tall-tale telling but also many of the sentimentalities that seem inevitably to accompany our literary excursions into "simple" society. Then it is a fable of freedom, a fable at once truly touching and uncomfortably inflated. As symbol of the unfettered human spirit, Mr. Wolfson chooses a young Italian-American boy, son of a rural bootlegger, the fulfillment of whose dream of glory—to be a popular ballad singer—is interrupted by a brush with the law. Instead of submitting to imprisonment, this appealing youngster organizes his old neighbors and friends, all of them as touched with the genius of individualism as himself, to make a large if hopeless gesture against the restricting authorities of modern life: they blow up roads and a dam, rocking the Catskills with their call to freedom. Treated realistically, the story of Mr. Wolfson's young captive might have had considerable dramatic power. Handled as it is in "The Eagle on the Plain," half realistically and half as fantasy, it loses weight both as psychological drama and as a parable of social protest.

"The Other Room" by Worth Tuttle Hedden (Crown, $2.75) is an odd, rather inept novel about the Negro problem by the author of the lively "Wives of High Pasture" of a few seasons ago. Straining probability, a young Virginia girl accepts a job teaching in a New Orleans college without knowing that it is a colored school. Instead of running home, however, she stays to learn some basic truths about the colored people, and to fall in love with one of the Negro instructors. The worthiness of its purpose and especially the courage with which it handles the theme of miscegenation makes one wish "The Other Room" were a better book—a novel with more skill in narrative, less time out for instruction, and more depth of characterization. The subject of Negro-white relations would seem to have reached the point, so far as fiction is concerned, where good-will without art is almost as dismaying as art without good-will.

If, like myself, you have enjoyed Christine Weston's stories in the New Yorker, you will be glad to find them collected, with a few additions, in a volume "There Then" (Scribner, $2.50). None of these pieces reaches the standard set by Mrs. Weston's "Indigo"; inevitably, the brief form places its restrictions upon the kind of insight and breadth of feeling Mrs. Weston could show in that long novel. But even these short sketches—they are all of them about India—have a sympathy and a place-evoking quality that sets them quite apart from most New Yorker fiction.

DIANA TRILLING

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

TWO very good books by Francis Töye have been reissued: his "Rosini" (Knopf, $3.50) and his "Verdi" (Knopf, $5). I have the impression that they are reissued without any change in the original text; but "Verdi" comes this time with an introduction by Herbert Weinstock for which I believe the correct term is gratuitous. That is, it says little about the author and his book, and nothing about them that is illuminating, but says a great deal instead—pretentious in tone, wooden and confused in statement—about the ideas on biography which Mr. Weinstock misuses the occasion to intrude into the book.

He would have it that a composer's music can be neither rightly performed nor rightly understood without knowledge of his life. The printed score alone is not sufficient to give anyone real and complete understanding of a Mozart symphony—for example the great E-flat Symphony. "To become intimate with its inmost nature . . . he must also know under what circumstances, at what stage in its creator's development, and in what sort of emotional weather it was composed. The most fastidiously written-out score is no more than an outline: it must be filled in with the life-giving element called style. More about the style required for . . . performance of the E-flat Symphony is to be learned from . . . studies of Mozart than from . . . hours spent with a score of the symphony."

Actually a performer or listener comes to the score of Mozart's E-flat Symphony only after having heard it performed; it is from this experience of the work as realized from the score in performance that he has derived what enables him to fill in the outline of the printed score himself; it is from this experience also that he has derived, and continues to develop, his understanding of the symphony; and study of the score now enables him to enrich that understanding with appreciation of detail. I cannot see knowledge of the composer's life contributing much in all this; certainly it did not give Mr. Weinstock himself, in his "Men of Music," any understanding of Mozart's E-flat Symphony: I am unable, at the moment, to verify my recollection that he characterized it as "gay and inconsequential"; but if I'm wrong about the words I'm sure I'm not wrong about the idea. Nor did his biographical researches give him any greater understanding of Schubert's great C major Symphony.

At the end Mr. Weinstock asks us, the next time we hear the operas, to see whether our reading of Mr. Töye's account of Verdi's life doesn't give new meanings to Caro nome from "Rigoletto" and the Prelude to Act 3 of "La Traviata." Nothing seemed less probable; nevertheless I tried the experiment, and report failure. And Mr. Töye himself, I might add, makes no such connections between Verdi's life and his works.

I don't want to be misunderstood: the whole man certainly is involved in the composer's creation of his music; and nothing would be more fascinating than a pointing out in Mozart's E-flat or Schubert's C major Symphony of how the whole Mozart or Schubert is involved. But the fact is that Sullivan's "Beethoven" is the only successful thing of its kind; and the danger in attempts

3 exciting articles in the current issue of Commentary

Hollywood Fights Prejudice

Can the Movies Help Cure Anti-Semitism?

In "Letter to the Movie-Makers" Elliot E. Cohen analyzes the movie Crossfire and points out the possible dangers in its treatment of the problem of race prejudice, suggesting how such dangers might be avoided. An especially timely contribution to current thinking in view of the forthcoming production of Gentleman's Agreement and other anti-bias films.

Tired Radicals

Is There Something Worth Fighting For?

Yes, says Lewis Corey in "Economic Democracy Without Statism." Democracy can plan better than totalitarianism and bring a more abundant life without surrender of our liberties.

The Jews of Europe

How Do They View the Future?

A keen observer reports on a six-months' study of D. P.'s and repatriated Jews in "Europe's Jews: Summer 1947" by David Bernstein.

...also in this issue:

"The Aims of British Foreign Policy" by C. Hartley Grattan; "Scandal on an Island" or the "Strange Case of the Reverend Guildberg" by Solomon F. Bloom; "Racism and America's World Position" by Carl Dreher; "The Adventures of Ilya Ehrenburg" by Martin Thomas; "Heine's Religion" by Leo Lowenthal; "Diagnosing the German Malady" by Samuel J. Hurwitz; Pletion; Poetry; Book Reviews.

Use the coupon to take advantage of our Special Introductory Offer—6 months for $2.00 (A saving of $1.20 from regular single copy price.)

Commentary 425 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, NEW YORK

I want to take advantage of your special offer. Here is $2.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____

STATE _____

6-N

at the kind is illustrated by Edward Lockspeiser's chapter on Tchaikovsky the man in "The Music of Tchaikovsky" edited by Gerald Abraham (Norton, $3.75). It is a psychiatrically acute analysis of certain unpleasantly neurotic tendencies in Tchaikovsky, which are correlated with faults in his music; but it has nothing to say about what in Tchaikovsky the man must have had something to do with the likewise unmentioned strong points of his music.

The other chapters are written by a number of men, each discussing Tchaikovsky's methods and results in one of the categories of his works. Most of them are neither as good as Mr. Abraham's own chapter on the operas nor as bad as Erik Blom's on the concertos; and one difficulty with some of the good ones—for example, the Soviet Russian writer A. Alshvang's chapter on the songs—is that they offer pages and pages of detailed discussions of music one hasn't heard, which are therefore meaningless. (The Soviet censor's stamp, so to speak, is Alshvang's statement that Tchaikovsky, "never sank into somber abysses of despair in his creative work. He constantly strove toward an optimistic acceptance of life," and that his "tragic characters always adopt a positive attitude towards life.")

In "The Music of Schubert" (Norton; $3.75) Kathleen Lane's chapter on the piano music reveals a fantastic lack of understanding—as, for example, in this description of the hair-raising middle section of the slow movement of the posthumous A major Sonata: "... a lively episode, which, with its rushing scales, resonant tremolandos, and trills, belongs more correctly to a divertissement à la bongroise than to a sonata movement." J. A. Westrup's chapter on the chamber music isn't much better; but Alec Robertson's on the songs is more perceptive; and Mosco Carner's on the orchestral music is superb.

Letters to the Editors

A Free Translation

Dear Sirs: A long time ago, Hesiod wrote a book called "Works and Days," in which he excoriated the parasitism of his day. The following is a free translation of the theme with an eye to the present:

Once upon a time
There was a race of men
Living in the slime
Like pigs in a pen;
Today they're in penthouses
Drinking and drunk
Living like louses
In the pelt of a skunk.

MARTIN WOLFSON

Brooklyn, August 7

By His Own Words

Dear Sirs: In your July 26 issue, Maynard Kniskern takes J. M. Martinez to task for considering M. Jacques Maritain a reactionary. He respectfully refers Martinez to Maritain's "True Humanism." What, I wonder, is Mr. Kniskern's definition of a reactionary? Is it 'one who favors a movement towards a former political or social policy'? If so, has he read "True Humanism"?

In that book, as elsewhere, Maritain certainly displays a deep nostalgia for "a former social policy," namely that of the Middle Ages. He holds that "nowadays we can be terribly envious" of the medieval "consecration" polity, "the mighty and sublime, too great and too sublime, conception of the medieval papacy in the days of its plenitude" (pp. 141 f.). . . .

Maritain agrees that we cannot now reestablish such a happy, terribly enviable condition. But we could start out, he thinks, with a "true humanism," a state of affairs in which a new "Christian commonwealth" is set up, which "in order to avoid greater evils . . . could and should tolerate (to tolerate is not to approve) ways of worship more or less distant from the truth" [obviously, Catholicism] (p. 160). The state would collaborate with the church, as an agent of a higher order, and assist it "in the fulfilment of its rightful mission"—e.g., in education (pp. 172 f.). This state would "not in the least demand in its beginning a profession of faith in the whole of Christianity from each man" (p. 200; my italics), but out of it, it seems, there might one day arise a new "consecrated Christian" culture (p. 204). Would not the "evil" of toleration, in that day, be excised? Would it not again become "appropriate" (p. 172) to use force to "protect the faith and the community against disintegrating influences" and normal for crowds to lynch heretics by "natural impulse" (p. 173)? In other words, would not "the mighty and sub-

MOTION PICTURE

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
84th ST.
90th ST.
Bat. Loc. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
23rd ST.

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

RKO NOW

"BEAUTIFUL AND INSPIRING."—N. Y. Times
SAMUEL GOLDWYN'S

'THE BEST YEARS OF OUR LIVES'

Winner of Nine Academy Awards!

—starring—

MYRNA LOY • FREDRIC MARCH
DANA ANDREWS • TERESA WRIGHT
VIRGINIA MAYO • HOAGY CARMICHAEL
From MacKINLAY KANTOR'S Novel
Continuous Performances • Late Shows Every Night

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

QUEENS

ALDEN
Jamaica
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH. WILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MOTION PICTURE

★ THE ROOSEVELT
STORY ★

★ The Most Important Picture
★ of the Century!
★ Starts Friday, August 22nd ★

★ BRANT'S GLOBE ★
★ Cool
★ Broadway & 46th Street

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny
play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

—Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEAT., 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4255
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

Give to help fight CANCER!

lime conception of the medieval papacy in the days of its plenitude" be in a good way at last to be realized? In "Scholasticism and Politics" Maritain says that "new humanism" ought to "create something new in relation to these five centuries behind us," namely, "reassume in a purified climate all the work of the classical period"—the twelfth and thirteenth centuries (p. 9). Does this, or does it not give grounds for the belief that Maritain "favors a movement towards a former political or social policy"—and is, accordingly, a reactionary? AD. HAENTZSCHER

Valparaiso, Indiana, August 9

A Gratuitous Generalization?

Dear Sirs: In the review of my book, "Treason's Peace," Mr. C. A. Welsh makes the statement that my perspective is defective in that I incorrectly impute many disjunctive circumstances to an I. G. Farben influence or formula.

The reviewer thus alleges as a fact this disparagement which, as he does not cite any examples, discredits any or all of the entire series of pictures of the pattern of I. G. Farben's hidden influence inside this country. Obviously, he must have in mind numerous passages in the book which he believes justify his allegation. But he has not mentioned a single such passage.

In comment upon this gratuitous generalization, as an attack upon the integrity of my work, I suggest that Mr. Welsh appears not to have read my preface which states clearly that its chapters are not, as he incorrectly says, largely concerned with "Farben's influence in American industry," but cover the very much larger pattern of "the shadowy designs that repeatedly have come up through the fabric of our industrial, social, and political life—an interlocking design of espionage, sabotage, and corruption."

I hereby challenge Mr. Welsh to point out the specific examples which he alleges are incorrectly included by me to picture some aspect of those designs. HOWARD W. AMBRUSTER

Westfield, New Jersey, July 21

Gratuitous Irrelevancies?

Dear Sirs: Reaction which criticism evokes from authors who have submitted their wares for public inspection is rarely impartial. This particular response is no exception.

It is absurd, of course, for Mr. Ambruster to suggest that I have made "an

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 225 By MR. X.

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the third of six puzzles constructed by Mr. X in competition with Mr. Y. At the end of the competition, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

ACROSS

- 1 Indigestion for bolters
- 5 The elder M.D. was merely a kibitzer in the case
- 9 The kiln is set in red heat
- 10 Religious converts should have no vices
- 11 The senior makes a crooked grimace about his low mark
- 12 The war god out on a limb
- 13 Rustics befuddled on lotus
- 14 Slave's changed status makes him stare wildly in envy
- 16 Mr. Serge increases his corporation with these
- 18 Diffuse earthquake could make this orb melt
- 21 Put the head in upper case slanted type
- 24 Annual loss can destroy a marriage
- 26 Breathing space
- 27 A pigeon in the grass, alas
- 28 Though obviously normal, Miss Vague can be upset in a year
- 29 What the French write with clarité
- 30 They find mad peril among the SS
- 31 Wanderers of the wasteland

DOWN

- 1 S (this definition is liberal enough as a gift)
- 2 Dweller in the arbored home
- 3 Musical coach
- 4 Artie is beaming around a flustered Diana

- 5 The least Mrs. Mickey can do is proceed with silence
- 6 Underground chief
- 7 Reel cut disorganizes the speaker's show
- 8 Sister's under the skin
- 15 All that I live by is with the ---... — Julius Caesar
- 17 A wool sock
- 18 A liar is tumbled in a vat for his pains
- 19 ----- makyth man
- 20 Come croppers
- 21 Freebooter with the vulgar manner
- 22 Sweet in the morning becomes Electra
- 23 Slender purse stretchers
- 25 Comfort after fifty is in the contract
- 27 Lucifer match

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 224

ACROSS:—1 KALANDER PRINCE; 9 DECANES; 10 INDENSES; 11 AWNING; 12 POTATOES; 14 CRIBBED; 15 PUDAL; 17 DIARY; 19 READERS; 21 OPTICIAN; 23 WITHER; 25 BENGALI; 26 PIERROT; 27 GOOD INTENTIONS.

DOWN:—1 KIDNAPED; 2 LACONIC; 3 NONENTITY; 4 EAST; 5 PRIMORDIAL; 6 INDIA; 7 CONCORD; 8 ISIS; 13 ABERRATION; 15 PRESIDENT; 16 LACRIMATES; 18 ANTONIO; 20 SCHERZO; 21 ORBS; 22 CHARD; 24 APSE.

attack upon the integrity of [his] work." Had this been my purpose, I would have written a far different review.

Mr. Ambruster himself selected one of the points which seem to me to weaken the book. First, he is utterly monistic in analyzing the causes of what he describes as "the shadowy designs that have repeatedly come up through the fabric of our industrial, social, and political life." This is a tendency of the specialist, and accounts for the fore-shortened perspective noted. Moreover, it is questionable literary taste, at least for a book of this nature, to hinge in so many places upon the gratuitous "I told you so's" which, in many instances, are irrelevant to anything but personal history. At numerous points throughout the book, the author's own letters are introduced as evidence and, while they may be of autobiographical interest, they could scarcely be said to represent objective scientific data anent the problem with which the book deals. Inevitably, the clarity of perspective suffers from the confusion of personal and historical events, especially since scant differentiation in the relative importance of the two strata of material is made.

There are other elements which seem to me to weaken the book, but without detracting from it as a document of interest, such as the eschewal by the author of the most important problem which the book defines: how to counteract and forestall the influence without which Farben's plans could not have been feasible. The author, as I said in my review, may be credited with "direct and intimate acquaintance with nearly every phase of his subject"—but scarcely with omniscience, and hardly with analytical perspicacity or literary grace in evaluating so important a part of modern economic history. C. A. WELSH

Arlington, Virginia, August 5

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-3
598 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

HOME BUILDING INFORMATION

On your specific problems by qualified designer, builder and engineer, regarding PLAN DESIGN, STRUCTURE, MATERIALS COSTS, HEATING, AIR CONDITIONING, Etc.

Individual, detailed and unbiased answer to any single question $2; check, cash or money order to:

TECTON, P. O. Box 116
Station F, Milwaukee 5, Wis.

RESORTS

THE ONLY THING WE OVERLOOK IS THE SOUND

North Shore Lodge

RESERVE NOW!

A country setting for Sea Shore Pleasures. Swim, fish, golf, play tennis, ride, sail—do everything that makes a vacation paradise. Dance to the music of a well-known orchestra. American cuisine. Program for children by trained counsellors.

MT. SINAI, LONG ISLAND

65 miles from N. Y. Near Port Jefferson. N. Y. Off. AL 4-4666

Relax, Rejoice with Summer at

Lakecrest

On Munn's Lake Stanfordville, N. Y. 80 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N. Y. C. R. R. to Ardenia, N. Y. Open all year.

WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS
EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 2828

CHILDREN'S CAMP

WALTTEL HOUSE

ON FRANKEL FARM

MT. BETHEL, PA. Bangor 0273

VACATION FOR ALL THE FAMILY

Modern farm hotel combined with progressive children's camp. 75 miles from New York. All rooms with private bath. Meat, poultry, dairy products and vegetables from the farm.

Rates:— Adults $33 Week—Children $50 Week
N. Y.: Ella Frankel, 241 East 10th St. LE 2-5864

SCHOOL

CHERRY LAWN SCHOOL

DARIEN, CONNECTICUT

Co-educational, Boarding and Country Day School. 40 miles from New York City. Grades 2-8. High School 1-4. A few vacancies for boys in the Upper and Lower Schools . . . girls in the Lower School. Curriculum emphasizes world culture . . . Individual guidance . . . with wide range of academic subjects. Cultural and Practical Arts, and all Sports including Horseback riding.

Christina Steel v. H. Bogoslovsky, Ph.D.
Tel., Dar., 5-1425 Director

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

MILLIONS OF USED, RARE and out-of-print books stocked in 15 cities. Mention interests if catalogs are wanted. TAAB, 529 S. Melville St., Phila. 43.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

BUSINESS PROPOSITION of interest to physician, M.D. astrologer, under 50 years, must speak French. Box 1728, c/o The Nation.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 1 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order, ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Available under GI Bill of Rights. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20, N. Y.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocation, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

CURRIES

HOW TO MAKE GOOD CURRIES: Your request with a 3¢ stamp will bring you our Recipe Booklet of precise Indian recipes for making curries of chicken, lamb, shrimp and vegetables. Learn the simple principles of using this condiment; it changes ordinary foods into new and delightful dishes.

JAVA-INDIA CONDIMENT CO.

IMPORTERS

442 Hudson Street New York 14, N. Y.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

For chain store, branch department store or high-type home office building, we offer for long-term lease the magnificent, modern Stone Front fireproof former First National Bank Building at Boston Post Road and Mamaroneck Avenue, in Mamaroneck, 3 stories, basement and cellar. Impressive architecture and layout. 2 Elevators. L. N. Rosenbaum & Son, 565 Fifth Avenue, New York 17.

FARMS & ACREAGE

FAMOUS MEMBER of Metropolitan Opera wants quick sale of his 100 acre farm; easy distance of Tanglewood; 7-room salt box; bath; electric; fireplace; artesian well; view; one room studio; plantation overgreens; privacy; partly furnished; possession immediate. $7,000 total price, BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, N. Y.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peckskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515 M.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 30, 1947

NUMBER 9

The Shape of Things

THE SUSPENSION OF THE CONVERSION OF sterling has highlighted the frantic hunger for dollars which characterizes post-war trading relations. When the British loan agreement was made, it was assumed that free convertibility could safely be undertaken at this stage because the sterling balances in the hands of Britain's creditors were bound to be small. The rapidity with which Britain was forced to draw on the loan to meet current living requirements and the world-wide shortage of dollars led, however, to a run on Britain's dollar balances not unlike the run on a bank. And like a bank Britain was unable to meet all demands at one time. Suspension of convertibility, like the 1933 bank holiday, relieves the immediate pressure but leaves the problem unsolved. By increasing domestic food production and instituting various new belt-tightening devices Britain still hopes to stabilize its balance of payments without begging for an additional American loan. Modification of the anti-discrimination clause in the British loan would be of more lasting value toward this end than the suspension of convertibility. Far more fundamental would be tariff concessions which would enable American business men to purchase additional supplies from Britain and the sterling areas. Unless we are prepared to buy where we sell, we may soon find the markets of the world closed to our products.

✱

THE SUCCESS OF THE GENEVA CONFERENCE, after many setbacks, in drawing up a draft charter for the International Trade Organization is a hopeful step toward the creation of more stable conditions for world trade. No one should be deceived into thinking, however, that the compromise document worked out at Geneva provides an assured basis for world recovery. The preamble pays lip service to the principles which all agree must serve as the foundation for such a revival. It calls upon all countries to maintain "full and productive employment" at home, to permit the free spread of technology, to undertake a reduction of tariffs and preferences, and to eliminate such indefensible practices as export subsidies and quantitative restrictions on imports. But loopholes in the text rob these statements of any immediate significance. Existing preferential systems, for example, are to be allowed to remain, and all the protective devices are permitted during periods of emergency and during the present transitional period. A comparison of the new charter with the original proposals drafted in Washington in 1945 shows retrogression on a number of important points. While the establishment of a permanent trade organization to consider from an international rather than a national point of view the problems that arise in meeting balances of payments holds much promise, no solution of the fundamental problems is yet in sight. The unwillingness of the Republican-controlled Congress to permit significant tariff concessions by the United States means that the world's "dollar famine" is certain to continue. And until a permanent method of relieving the scarcity of dollars is devised, no real liberalization of trade relations is possible.

✱

PERHAPS WE SHOULD NOT COMPLAIN OF tactical blunders that make Republican success at the polls more problematical by the week. Yet there are limits beyond which even a hell-bent G. O. P. should not be allowed to go without challenge. A case in point is the bodily assault by counsel for a House subcommittee on the person of Joseph Padway, attorney for the American Federation of Labor, in the course of a Congressional hearing. When Irving McCann, taking exception to Mr. Padway's suggestion of "Gestapo tactics," grabbed the A. F. of L. man by the throat and threw him to the floor, one would have expected a shocked chairman to suspend the hearings at once and the counsel soon thereafter. Far from doing either, Representative Kearns merely pointed out that the committee's counsel was "under a great strain" and suggested that the hearing "proceed on a normal basis." What seemed normal to Mr. McCann, and evidently to Chairman Kearns as well, evoked "an astonished gasp from the audience," according to the correspondent of the New York Times. Requested by another Federation official to disqualify himself from further part in the hearing on the ground of prejudice, McCann sneered at his challenger as "a man who five years ago was a letter-carrier pretending to tell a Congressional committee how to run its affairs—a man with more brains in his feet than he has in his head." From a purely partisan point of view nothing could be more delightful than to see the Republicans outrage one group

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	193
Pick Up the Pieces	195
Vetoes and Other Tools by Freda Kirchwey	196

ARTICLES

Dollars or Socialism by Blair Bolles	197
Politics and Fish by Richard L. Neuberger	199
What's Our Game in Greece? by Constantine Poulos	200
Father Tompkins of Cape Breton by Leo Lania	202
Socialist House Divided by Del Vayo	204

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Co-ops on the March by Keith Hutchison	205
A Big Subject by Irving Howe	205
The Rural Problem by P. Alston Waring	206
Shop Talk by Joseph Wood Krutch	207
The Quest by René Blanc-Roos	207
A Reliable Mediator by Rolfe Humphries	208
That Atomic War by Benjamin Harrow	208
Films by James Agee	209
Music by B. H. Haggin	211

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 226 by Mr. X	211
--	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor

Literary Editor

J. King Gordon

Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Schultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1876, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

after another in this suicidal fashion—they are preparing next to alienate the farmers by an "investigation" of the cooperative movement, through which half the farmers of the country, most of them Republican, buy and sell in varying degree. But the partisan view is far too narrow. Coming so soon after the Brewster circus, the performance before the Kearns subcommittee emphasizes the dangerous extent to which the Republicans have degraded the whole process of legislative inquiry. This is contempt of Congress compared to which subpoena-dodging is reverence itself.

★

THE WAY OF THE COOPERATOR IS HARD IN these days of reaction. The Greenbelt Consumer Services has been adjudged a monopoly by a subcommittee of the House Small Business Committee, and a recommendation has gone to the full committee that the cooperative's contract with the FPHA be canceled. Some slight skulduggery behind this decision is suggested by the committee's advance release that it was "reliably informed" that "less than 2,000 of the 8,000 population in Greenbelt favor the cooperative movement" and that it was going to question "the advisability of locking up a whole community by act of the federal government." Inquiry might have brought out the fact that 4,500 of the 8,000 residents of Greenbelt are children and that more than two-thirds of the 1,850 families are members of the cooperative. True, the cooperative in Greenbelt Center operates under a lease clause which is common to many shopping centers in all parts of the country. The clause states that no competing business shall operate in the same shopping center. But this restriction does not apply in North Greenbelt, where most of Greenbelt's residents have their homes. The reason why no commercial venture has started up there seems to be, oddly enough, that the people are solidly sold on cooperation. A liquor store tried, but the community vote against it was 1,106 to 309. Greenbelters have cooperative services in the shape of two food stores, a drugstore, a variety store, a movie theater, a garage, a bus line, a traveling store, a laundry and dry-cleaning establishment, a tobacco and candy store, a barber shop, and a beauty parlor. Before reaching a final decision the House Committee on Small Business might do well to consult the findings of its predecessor in 1946, which concluded that "the cooperative movement operates as a very successful means of combating monopolistic concentrations."

With Sikh-Moslem fighting in the Punjab casting a pall over India in its first week of independence, we have asked Shiva Rao, our New Delhi correspondent, to cable us a full report of recent developments. It will appear in next week's issue.

EVEN IF WE WERE FOLLOWERS OF THE nil nisi bonum school of obituary writers—and we are not—we would be hard put to find a kinder word for Theodore G. Bilbo than the classic observation that he was not always as bad as he was sometimes. All that prevented the Mississippi Senator from becoming a national menace rather than a national nuisance was a personal corruption so flagrant that the Senate of his own state once pronounced him unfit "to sit with honest, upright men." A self-seeking opportunist of the most cynical variety, Bilbo was not even loyal to the degenerate code that he proclaimed. As rabidly anti-Catholic as any other member of the Ku Klux Klan—and he proudly flaunted his membership—he nevertheless campaigned for Al Smith in 1928 in the hope of political preference. So, too, he voted with the Administration in the early days of the New Deal, although the whole Roosevelt program must have been poison to a man who could seriously propose deporting every American Negro to Africa, who could address citizens by mail as "Dear Dago" and "Dear Kike," and who could call on "every red-blooded American" to get out on the night before election and "see that no nigger votes." With the Senate rid of Bilbo the country may at least hope that Mississippi will not give his seat to a demagogue far shrewder, less vulnerable, and quite as dangerous. We do mean John Rankin.

Pick Up the Pieces

UNDOUBTEDLY the most intelligent provision of the Taft-Hartley labor law is the clause establishing a Congressional committee to watch the law in operation and see if it works. Logically a committee should have been appointed to study the problem before any measure was passed, but such are the promptings of politics that the incoming Republicans thought it better to legislate in haste and correct at leisure. As a result they will find themselves, we predict, in a race with the country and the courts to make changes in a law which is in part unenforceable, in part ambiguous, and in part, we believe, unconstitutional. With the statute hardly dry on the books, both labor and management have already driven tanks through its loopholes, and union officials, itching for a test, have accorded some of its provisions the kind of reverence that was generally paid to the Volstead Act in the rambunctious twenties.

To the chagrin of Representative Hartley, at least, it is industry itself—coal and automobiles—that has set the pattern for the "avoidance" (not to be confused with "evasion," says the conservative commentator, David Lawrence) of the provision making unions liable to suit for breach of contract. Avoidance may be achieved simply by omitting the usual pledge not to strike during the life of an agreement, or by a clause like the one Lewis introduced providing that his miners would work only when "willing and able," or by explicit waivers of the right to bring suit. The International Typographical Union plans to avoid suits for breach of contract by dispensing with contracts altogether, relying instead on posted memoranda stipulating "conditions of employment." What the authors of the law failed to take into account was the inevitability of counter-suits by unions, since the grievance that brings on a strike may be a breach of contract as surely as the strike itself. The plain fact is that to many employers "the law's delay" is as unattractive a prospect as it is to the unions, and a blight on production while it lasts. Hartley will have to build camps in the capital if he carries out his threat to "bring management as well as labor to Washington" whenever a contract "violates the spirit" of the new law.

The ban on union expenditures for political purposes is already violated in more than spirit; it is loudly and publicly flouted, with Congress urgently invited to witness the process. The C. I. O. has expended funds to publish a "1947 Voting Guide," intended to advise its members on how to defeat Congressmen who "voted against the people." The A. F. of L. has promoted a similar project, and in Connecticut it recently paid for advertisements in the Hartford papers calling on the state's Republicans to blight the Presidential hopes of Senator Taft. The official C. I. O. paper is engaged in a campaign to put across a pro-labor candidate in a special Congressional election in Maryland, and both major trade-union bodies are working for Philip Storch, president of the Allentown, Pennsylvania, Newspaper Guild, who is running as the Democratic candidate for the seat left vacant by the death of Representative Gerlach. So far the Justice Department is merely "studying" these violations, and the strongest word from Capitol Hill is "impudent."

Innumerable ambiguities in the act have already cropped up, with court tests to come on a dozen technicalities, such as whether or not the data required of unions are to be made public or remain confidential, and whether the check-off is to be limited strictly to dues or include assessments. But probably the provision most likely to come under Supreme Court scrutiny, unless it is scrapped first, is the anti-Communist section. The interpretation of Robert Denham, general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, is that no union may enjoy the services of the board, which means that it cannot qualify in an election for a bargaining agent, if a single officer of the local, the international, or the parent body fails to sign an affidavit to the effect that he has no connection with the Communists. None of the top leaders of the C. I. O. will touch the affidavit, the anti-Communists on principle and the others for obvious reasons. Similarly John L. Lewis, on the executive board of the A. F. of L., scorns this device as much as he scorns the comrades. So if Mr. Denham persists in his strict interpretation, the 13,000,000 members of the two major labor bodies will have to dispense with the board altogether. Members of the Congressional "watch-dog" committee have already expressed the view that this is too much of a good thing, but we hope Mr. Denham sticks to his point. Some labor legislation was needed, but the Taft-Hartley law was demagoguery from the start, and the sooner it explodes the sooner a sober effort can be made. If political casualties attend the process, we shall know how to control our grief.

Vetoes and Other Tools

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THERE are more ways than one to skin a cat—or to knife the United Nations. Russia does the job with the veto, a clumsy, dull tool but the only one Gromyko seems to be able to lay his hand on. We use all sorts of methods and instruments. In the Indonesian affair we did it by intervening, directly and unilaterally, with an offer of mediation while the Security Council was considering various possibilities of international action, including a proposal to create a three- or five-nation commission to arbitrate the differences between the Netherlands and the Indonesian Republic. When the Indonesians suggested that they would accept our offer provided it would not prejudice the chance of arbitration, we pulled them up short. They could take it or leave it, we told them; if any conditions were attached, the deal was off. On these terms the Indonesians properly declined; we withdrew the offer.

Then Mr. Van Kleffens announced for the fourth or fifth time that he could not accept U. N. arbitration because the Indonesian dispute was a purely domestic matter and such action would infringe Dutch sovereignty. He did not bother to explain why the Security Council's cease-fire order had not infringed Dutch sovereignty or why American mediation would not do so; the astute Netherlands delegate is less interested in logic than in keeping an international commission out of Holland's colonial preserve. For their own obvious and similar reasons the French and British Council members sympathize with his reluctance and have steadfastly backed him in the Council. But why should the United States not only adopt the same position as the three colonial powers but even carry the ball for them? Why? In order to counter Russia's strong insistence on U. N. intervention? Or to keep Russia out of the negotiations for a settlement? Or just to show solidarity with our cherished Western allies?

Whatever our reasons, the result of our maneuver has been to weaken and hamstring the U. N. and to put the United States firmly on record as defending the "sovereignty" of a colonial power against the threat of collective action.

The question whether a veto is a wickeder weapon than a by-pass will interest hardly anyone.

THE Russians on their side had a good chance last week to accept a reasonable compromise and passed it up. Gromyko vetoed the Australian proposal on the Balkan border dispute with the same abrupt decision he used later in vetoing the extreme and provocative American resolution. The plan put forward by Australia carefully refrained from distributing blame. It took account of the "threat to peace" on the Greek frontier and called upon all four of the states involved to enter into negotiations to end their differences.

If Russia had accepted this proposal, it would have cut a lot of ground from under the crowd in Washington that are already preparing to send American troops over to Greece to help use up the twelve shiploads of guns and things that went this week. But Russia's story is that no help of any sort is going to the guerrillas from the Balkan states and that any form of international intervention is therefore unnecessary and an infringement of the sovereignty of Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and Albania. So Gromyko must vote no even on a decently impartial resolution.

THE new Greek government, still brewing as we go to press, may turn out to be a first small gesture toward placating American opinion in anticipation of larger favors still to come from this side. It would be hard, I suspect, to stir up much public enthusiasm over here for sending American troops to the rescue of the sort of Greek government that has just resigned. Mr. Poulos may well be justified in believing, as he reports on a later page, that the Truman Administration is deliberately angling for a showdown with Russia in Greece. But a sensible preparation for a policy so packed with danger at best would be a government shake-up in Athens which would dislodge at least the most flamboyant grafters and gangsters now in power.

The job of organizing a new Cabinet has been intrusted to Constantin Tsaldaris, Foreign Minister in the late Maximos government and its actual boss, who has just returned to Athens from secret policy conferences in Washington and London. It may be assumed that he took home with him a mild suggestion that a clean-up was due. But if Mr. Tsaldaris heads the next government, one may be sure that any changes made will be calculated with a nice eye for political necessity, and nothing else. So far the honest and experienced leader of the Liberal Party, Themistocles Sophoulis, has refused to come into a government he does not head; he knows all too well that he would be used as camouflage to deceive the untrained American eye.

IF ALL issues were issues of principle, the Soviet vetoes in the Security Council would merit all the excitement they have stirred up. But a fair-minded observer is bound to admit that the line-up is more often one of interest than of principle; it is a power line-up—four to one. Look over last week's votes on the admission of new members. It is an illuminating fact that the only two states elected, Yemen and Pakistan, are states at present outside the opposing big-power "teams"—in spite of Pakistan's dominion status.

In the division Britain and the United States inevitably voted against Albania and Outer Mongolia—both under direct Russian influence. Also inevitably, Russia voted against Transjordan, Eire, and Portugal. Its reasons were essentially the same, although less apparent at first glance. Transjordan, though in form an Arab state and a member of the Arab League, in fact is a British creation and puppet. Eire's pro-Axis "neutrality" in the war absolves it from the charge of dependency on Britain or the United States, but its government is Catholic reactionary, and in any contest with Russia it is sure to vote with the other Western powers. Portugal, of course, is intimately tied to Franco Spain and is bound to Britain by the oldest treaty of alliance in existence.

Pakistan's election was certain since India as a whole was already a member. But Yemen! The unanimous election of Yemen is the final ironic comment on the motives that determine votes. Yemen is a state sunk in pre-medieval ignorance and ruled by an absolute monarch who makes no pretense of allowing any political rights to any of his subjects. In Yemen Jews are treated more brutally than in any land on earth, not excepting Palestine; yet they are forbidden to leave the country on pain of death. But never mind, Yemen has the one essential qualification for membership: it is not in either big-power sphere of influence—not yet.

Dollars or Socialism

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Washington, August 22

IN THE Anglo-American talks on the United Kingdom's dollar crisis which opened here this week the issue is the future of socialism as well as the future of Britain. Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, the chief American negotiator, has implied that much of the $3,750,000,000 which America lent Britain in July, 1946, has been frittered away as a result of the economic experiments of the Labor government.

The hostility toward socialism shown by the United States representatives in these talks and in the concurrent talks on the Ruhr reveals a dangerous confusion in this country's thinking about the use of the dollar in foreign affairs. Snyder and his friends regard the dollar simply as a monetary unit to be invested for the purpose of making more dollars. The State Department, on the other hand, regards the dollar as a major political instrument of our foreign policy, to be used for the strengthening of an ally in the long contest with the Soviet Union.

The first effect of Snyderism would be to deprive the United States of British aid in its attempt to stop the spread of communism and of Russian influence. Two years ago British voters put the Labor government in office in the expectation that it would institute socialist planning. The surest method for driving British socialists, and socialists in other countries, to tolerate Communists is to insist that the socialists accept capitalism. Snyder's preoccupation with finance hides from him the whole phalanx of considerations that guide people in their political choices.

Snyder is not alone in his myopia. Ambassador Robert Murphy in Berlin has rebuffed those who advocate the nationalization of the Ruhr coal fields, which under private management and ownership contributed to the growth of Hitler's totalitarian state. Ambassador James Clement Dunn has tried to keep the Italian government free from socialist influences. In apparent agreement with Snyder that government controls delay recovery, Ambassador Jefferson Caffery in Paris a few days ago criticized the French, whose government applies economic controls, on the ground that they were not advancing their own recovery. As a result of these misguided pressures, Europe's Socialist parties are dividing like starfish. Washington makes it easy for Moscow.

In the face of the Treasury attitude, Sir Wilfrid Eady could not expect immediate substantial assistance when he arrived in Washington. The essentials of the problem could be simply stated. Britain had already drawn on the $3,750,000,000 in such large amounts that it would be exhausted by October, 1947, instead of lasting until 1950 as the United States had expected. Britain requires dollars to live. Almost a third of its imports—articles of first importance, including food—come from the United States. And it is one-way traffic. The United States in 1946 sold to Britain goods valued at £226,900,000 and bought from Britain goods valued at £35,400,000.

When Sir Wilfrid arrived in Washington, the amount of credit left to Britain had fallen to $850,000,000. While he was here, it went down another $150,000,000. The severity of the crisis was recognized well before July 15 of this year, but on that day, in accordance with the terms of the loan agreement, London made its sterling indebtedness abroad convertible into dollars, and the situation became immediately worse.

The relief that the United States gave Britain after two days of discussion in Washington simply restored the situation existing before July 15. Washington agreed that London could halt conversion. Throughout the conversations Britain took the attitude that it was merely setting forth its position without asking the United States to make any further concessions, but it managed to indicate that it would like to keep the privilege of preferential trading within the British Commonwealth and also to buy when possible from countries which did not demand dollars, even if the price of the goods should be higher. Although Under Secretary of State Clayton was little disposed to grant such boons, the British had some reason to think they might receive them, along with a reduction in their share of the expenses of running the Anglo-American occupation zone in Germany.

Under present Administration plans any real assistance to Britain would come through the Marshall program for financial aid to all the Western European countries. A special loan to Britain apart from the Marshall program is politically impossible, in the opinion of the State Department. Congress would not grant it. And according to intimations from Snyder, further relaxation of the requirements of the existing credit agreement can be granted only by Congress. If Congress approves a great appropriation for European recovery, Britain may be secure. If Congress refuses to go to Europe's help, Britain's situation will become desperate.

To assure Congress that the Truman Administration is a hard-boiled lender and to allay his own doubts about the efficiency of socialism and government planning, Snyder called on Britain to justify its quick exhaustion of the credits. The superficial explanation is the gap between exports and imports. During the first six months of 1947 the United Kingdom bought goods valued at $1,600,000,000 more than those it sold; at that rate it would be $3,200,000,000 in the hole by the end of the year—almost the full amount of the American credit. The foreign-trade gap reflected British failure to produce goods for export in the quantity needed, and this production failure indicated some vital flaw in the national economy. The question before the negotiators in Washington was whether the British failure to produce up to its needs was the result of the Labor government's program or of conditions beyond the control of that or any other government.

In a plea for free enterprise echoing the sentiments of Secretary Snyder, Winston Churchill on August 23 put the onus for Britain's plight on Prime Minister Attlee and his Cabinet. Since this issue of the efficiency of socialist governments is sure to be emphasized when Congressional consideration of the Marshall program gets under way, the justice of the Churchill charges and the Snyder hints should be examined.

SOME light on the question can be obtained by an analysis of Britain's basic production problem, coal, for Attlee has nationalized the coal mines.

England does not produce enough coal to keep the factories of its great industries running at full production. Steel and textile plants are getting from 33 to 75 per cent of the coal they need. The government has set the modest figure of 200,000,000 tons as its output goal for the "coal year" ending next March, but the mines are not meeting their quotas. The coal that is mined, moreover, contains a higher percentage of impurities than pre-war coal, so that the actual usable output is considerably less than the official figure.

The picture is drab, but is socialism to blame? Some American officials are disturbed because last spring the mines went on a five-day week. That reflected not socialism but free enterprise. The National Union of Mine Workers, acting with the freedom of a union in a country where labor is not regimented, bargained for the short week and got it. With one day's cutting eliminated, weekly coal production has kept pace with what it was before, and in some weeks it has bettered the record of previous years. Absenteeism has declined: it went down to 8.59 per cent in May with a five-day week from 14.46 in April before the change.

Criticism of British coal-mining methods as inefficient was common in Washington before Attlee became Prime Minister. But in those days British backwardness was blamed instead of socialist fumbling. British mines, it was complained, were not mechanized. As a matter of fact, 72 per cent of British coal is cut mechanically, and 69 per cent is conveyed by mechanical means, while 82 per cent of our coal is cut mechanically, but English methods make possible the recovery of almost 100 per cent of the coal, as compared with 80 per cent in the United States. British mechanization, however, leaves dirt, rock, and shale mixed with the coal that leaves the collieries. And new machinery for cleaning the coal is unobtainable because British steel production is not up to par. The problem of coal is rooted in conditions that long antedated Attlee.

American officials who think the economic salvation of other countries depends on free enterprise focus their attention on the need of an incentive for the operator. The British and other European governments focus their attention on the need of an incentive for the worker. "The condition of maximum production by the worker is determined by the environment in which he works, both physical and psychological," Sir Stafford Cripps, president of the British Board of Trade, told the House of Commons last March. "Without any mechanical change whatsoever in the present setup of our industries we could undoubtedly get a considerable increase in production if every worker were happy in and keen on his work." By trying to force Europe to shift its attention from concern for the worker to concern for the owner the United States might reduce, not raise, production.

The British government's errors in foreign affairs, serious as they may be, are not related to the steps it has taken toward establishing state control over economic life. One might even say that the British dollar crisis resulted from an absence of official control—in the United States. This country, in effect, has thrown away many of the dollars it lent to England by permitting American prices to rise without hindrance since England began to use its credit in July, 1946. If the United States had kept price control, Britain would have many more dollars at its command today.

The British problem now being studied by the Truman Administration has less to do with socialism than with a disastrous anachronism in international economic relations. Britain is on the verge of collapse not because it has no money but because it has not the right kind of money. The exchange used in foreign trading is essentially a bilateral mechanism; yet we live in a multilateral world. While Britain runs into debt to us, continental European countries are running into debt to Britain at the rate of about $40,000,000 a month. Until Britain, the United States, and the rest of the world are liberated from the cage of our antiquated exchange system, fiscal conferences can do no more than give temporary relief to any nation's economic ills.

Fish and Politics

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Wrangell, Alaska, August 15

EVERY schoolboy knows that Secretary of State Seward paid the Russian czar only $7,200,000 for all of Alaska, and that the Alaskan salmon pack yields seven times that sum every year. What the schoolboys don't know is that nearly all this money goes finally into wallets and bank accounts outside Alaska. This colonial exploitation is the cause of many of Alaska's troubles. British exploitation of the resources of the Straits Settlements or other colonies was less thorough and efficient than the looting of the Alaskan salmon industry by absentee interests.

When outsiders are relieving a country of its natural wealth, they usually give at least employment to the home folks. Alaskans do not even receive this benefit. More than half the men employed in catching and canning the salmon are non-residents. Of approximately $11,000,000 paid in wages in the salmon industry last year, only $3,729,000 went to Alaskans. When Philippine independence was celebrated in Seattle and Portland, few Filipinos were on hand for the occasion. Most of them were in Alaska canning Chinooks and Chums. They were living in barracks or on boats, and since they would not be paid their wages until they docked again in "the states," Alaska would not get even their chewing-gum and cigarette money, let alone any of the rest of their pay.

Alaska supplies 88 per cent of the American salmon pack and more than half of the world's output, but for the people living there it is almost as if the industry did not exist. Labor unions based in Seattle and packing companies with headquarters in Astoria and San Francisco have combined to keep the wealth created by it in the hands of people living outside the Territory. Bernard DeVoto, who has cited Anaconda Copper as the prime example of absentee exploitation in the United States, should cruise along the Alaskan coast. Butte miners are at least employed in the shafts of Skeleton Hill. In Alaska the unions, A. F. of L. or C. I. O., do not want to be troubled with the employment of Alaskans, particularly Alaskan Indians.

Half of all the salmon taken from Alaskan waters are snared in fish traps. These are huge wire cages sunk in the inlets and fiords through which the salmon must pass on their way to the rivers where they will spawn. The number that can be used is limited, since it pays to sink them only in places traversed by vast numbers of fish. Of 434 traps in Alaskan bays, only 38 belong to men who live in Alaska. More than half the traps belong to six large absentee companies. Two of these companies own 118 traps between them. Because very few men are employed in tending the traps Alaska's delegate in Congress, Edward L. Bartlett, has called them "an anti-social device."

One of the tragic shortcomings of the New Deal was its indifference to the absentee exploitation of Alaska. Although Harold Ickes as Secretary of the Interior was in charge of the Fish and Wildlife Service for more than a decade, he did nothing to return the salmon industry to Alaskans. Governor Gruening, an appointee of President Roosevelt, advocated a progressive tax on fish traps so that ownership of a large number might prove too costly, but with Ickes and Gruening at each other's throats, the suggestion never received the support of the Department of the Interior. For all his tirades against monopoly, Harold Ickes left office with monopoly more firmly entrenched in the canned-salmon industry than ever before. Gruening insisted that Alaskans should own the fish traps, but Ickes even forbade him to leave the Territory to press the question.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is an Oregon journalist who served in Alaska during the war. He has been revisiting the Territory this summer and is writing for The Nation on various phases of Alaskan life.

Politicians from the Pacific Coast states often engage in telephoned negotiations over fish traps. Senators from Washington and California can get trap licenses for influential constituents more easily than can Alaska's non-voting delegate. The situation would be different if Alaska achieved statehood. It would then have control of its fisheries and could impose regulations limiting trap ownership to residents. This would enable the large native population of the Territory to participate for the first time in the trapping operations.

The canned-salmon industry led the local opposition to the statehood referendum: the packers fear that a genuine tax will be levied on their product if Alaska becomes a state. George Sundborg, manager of the Alaska Development Board, recently revealed that the salmon industry paid to the Territory only $887,000 in taxes during the last biennium on a fish pack worth more than $100,000,000. Moreover, the Territory levies no income tax on the wages of its carportbaggers.

Warren Magnuson and Hugh Mitchell, state of Washington New Dealers, have pussyfooted on the issue of Alaskan statehood. So has Governor Wallgren, who said he could not indorse statehood because "some" people in Alaska seemed to be against it. However, practically all the witnesses at recent hearings of the House Committee on Public Lands favored statehood. One of the few opponents was an attorney who represents the salmon industry in Alaska.

Some opposition has come from conservationists who fear that the state of Alaska might not be as diligent as the federal government in protecting the fish runs. Yet under federal supervision the pack has been diminishing. In 1940 nearly 7,000,000 cases of salmon were canned in Alaska; last year the pack had dwindled to 3,871,000 cases. The fabulous pink-salmon runs of the southeastern "panhandle" are so reduced that the 1946 pack was only 1,454,000 cases as against 4,294,333 five years earlier. Higher prices have kept up the value of the pack.

Seton H. Thompson, chief of the Alaska branch of the federal Fish and Wildlife Service, frankly admits that "illegal fishing" is responsible for much of the diminution of the runs along Clarence Strait and Tongass Narrows. One game warden has been provided by a generous Congress to patrol 5,000 miles of Alaskan coastline. Only statehood, Alaskans are convinced, can restore to them the benefits of the salmon industry.

The entire world has a stake in the Alaskan salmon pack. Salmon has a greater nutritional value than almost any other food. An inspector in the Canadian Mounted Police told me he would rather eat a tin of Alaska King salmon while on patrol in 70-below-zero weather than a caribou steak or beef sirloin.

What's Our Game in Greece?

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

Washington, August 22

NEXT month it will be three years since German troops started withdrawing from Greece, but the war is still going on in that little land and seems likely to go on for a long time.

There is only one logical, apparent reason why the Soviet Union is going so far out on a limb on the Greek question. The Russians are probably not prepared to risk the break with the United States over Greece. Their interest in Greece is not strategic. The Soviet Union will take its hands off Greece when the United States and Great Britain take their hands off Eastern Europe. That was the agreement, wasn't it?

All the while that the British were going into Greece, destroying the left movement and setting up extreme right-wing regimes, Moscow didn't say a word. Not until we started "interfering" in the internal affairs of countries in the sphere allocated to Russia did it start to needle Greece.

Possibly Moscow thinks the United States is only bluffing. If so, it is making a serious mistake. Washington will not back down on "the Greek thing." Both the State and the War Department want a showdown; indeed, would welcome it.

It is becoming clear now that the Truman Doctrine was not so extravagantly anti-Communist and anti-Russian simply for the purpose of getting the Greek-Turkish aid bill through Congress. It correctly reflected the mood and intent of high Administration officials.

There is the Middle East oil, too. But Greece is the perfect place, in every way, to stand up to the Russians, and Washington is determined to do so, even if—.

It is all rather sinister, and very dishonest on both sides.

The United States dishonestly wants to place all the blame for the Greek situation on Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia. Not once in the debates at Lake Success did the United States delegation even hint that the internal situation had any bearing on the guerrilla warfare. Did Washington really expect the Russians to accept the crudely one-sided American resolution which gave the Greek government a 99 44/100 per cent clean bill of health?

But the delegation of the Soviet Union is not any less dishonest when it denies that the Greek guerrillas are getting any assistance from north of the border.

AT THE moment Washington is acting more adeptly in this bit of rotten power politics. Washington has Moscow in a corner and is pressing in. The establishment by the Greek guerrillas of a military government "preliminary to the formation of a Provisional Government" is obviously a Russian move.

The new Greek guerrillas, whose bands sprouted at first in retaliation against the terrorist attacks of monarchist bands encouraged and condoned by Constantin Tsaldaris's royalist government, had originally no thought of seizing power. They knew the odds against them were too great. They felt that they could force the fall of the royalist-fascist government and the induction of one which would offer them some measure of safety and a start toward the new life they had thought they were fighting for during the German occupation. They had almost succeeded in this purpose last spring when the United States stepped in.

The fact that the Greek guerrillas announced a military regime rather than the long-threatened Provisional Government, which would have been just as easy to set up, reveals a nervous but wily Moscow tactic. The military regime serves as a trial balloon. It tests the Americans and it feels out the sentiments of the Greek people.

It also serves as a bone which may later be thrown to the wolves. Abandonment of the plan for a provisional government and dissolution of the military regime may be Russian "concessions" later on. The Greek guerrillas will be left holding the bag, reduced to bitter, endless fighting, without a voice or a hand raised in their support.

Undoubtedly, this is to be the "satisfactory conclusion" of the Greek case which Acting Secretary Lovett referred to on the day after the Russian veto. Those who thought that when the United States took over British commitments in the Near East a more liberal policy would be introduced are now sadder, if not wiser. Had we tossed out the racketeers and monarchist murderers in Athens we might have alleviated the guerrilla problem. Had we insisted on a liberal government which would have offered a real amnesty and brought the army, gendarmerie, and state machinery under non-partisan direction, and had we insisted on various economic reforms, we would have obviated the immediate threat of communism in Greece and eradicated the "danger from the north."

But then if we had done that, what excuse would we have had to shake our fists under Russia's nose, not to speak of its satellites' noses? What excuse would there have been for our growing military missions and our omnipresent flotillas?

Washington is playing an acute game from its own point of view. If through the United Nations—which we want to patrol the frontier but which we do not want to "interfere" with our plans for Greece—we could get a permanent border commission, the Greek army could, we think, clean up the guerrillas once and for all, and there would be no more nonsense about a leftist movement in Greece.

If we can't get a permanent border commission, we can say to the world, "See? We tried. Now we have to send American troops to Greece to close that troublesome border." And when we send American troops to patrol our new frontier, as so many people in Washington are now anxious to do, we shall be playing our last card. American soldiers will be killed by Greek guerrillas, by the Yugoslavs, the Bulgars, and the Albanians. Then we start playing for keeps.

There is, of course, the possibility that the Russians will "come to their senses" and call off their satellites just before it is too late. In which case we shall have demonstrated to the world the superiority of our power over the Soviet Union's. And in any case we shall have made Greece safe for democracy, monarchy, and capitalism.

TO GET back to Lake Success. Would the American delegation to the United Nations and the other members of the Security Council who support it have understood the implication of the Greek government's broadcast last Saturday if they had heard it? It said:

The Greek situation has now entered the road of final solution, and everything suggests that Greece's demands will be met, which will mean not only that morality and justice will have prevailed but that the end of the disturbances in the Balkans will have been reached.

Because it is only when Greece is granted borders which are recognized historically and internationally that the Bulgarian Komitadjis, Yugoslav mercenaries, and Albanian thieves will lose all hope of success and cease the invasions which bring constant disturbances to the Balkan Peninsula.

The Greek people are now beginning to believe that

SEP 1 1947
Burlington

their rights will be recognized and that the hour is at hand when the Allies will fulfil their obligations toward Greece.

This is how the present Greek government interprets the Truman Doctrine. To the New York Times the Soviet Union's veto of the American resolution may mean that a "member power deliberately blocked the operation of the peace-making machinery"; to the present Greek government it means that heady dreams of a Byzantine "Greater Greece" are about to be realized.

Father Tompkins of Cape Breton

BY LEO LANIA

There are four sorts of men:

He who knows not and knows not that he knows not is a fool—shun him.

He who knows not and knows that he knows not is a child—teach him.

He who knows and knows not that he knows is asleep—wake him.

He who knows and knows that he knows is wise—follow him!

Sidney, Nova Scotia

THE little slim man, neatly dressed in a black suit with the turned white collar of a priest, is more than seventy-five years old, but he stepped briskly up on a chair in order to read these lines to me, cut in a board above the door of his study. He has the voice and accurate movements of a young man. You don't notice the deep wrinkles in his pale, clean-shaven face, but you cannot help noticing his eyes—sharp, eager, very intense, with the searching look of a hunter or fisherman. He smiles often, and then you see a little golden flame deep in his eyes, and you feel as if you had known him all your life. A man of energy and unusual will-power, and at the same time a dreamer, a poet.

That is Father Tompkins—teacher, former vice-president of St. Francis Xavier University, one of the leading figures in Canada's cooperative movement, the prophet and guiding spirit of a program of adult education which is changing the social and economic life of Nova Scotia. His name is known far beyond the borders of Canada. Some time ago Harvard bestowed an honorary degree upon him; famous universities have made him tempting offers. Father Tompkins, however, prefers to remain what he has been all his life—a village priest, the friend of the fishermen, miners, and farmers on Cape Breton Island.

Reserve is the name of the village halfway between Sidney and Glace Bay where Father Tompkins lives and works. Most of the 5,000 inhabitants are coal miners. Some of the mines in which they work are very deep and stretch out under the sea for several miles. Reserve has a few rows of modest houses, a Catholic and a Protestant church, and next to Father Tompkins's house a big modern school building which would do honor to any city. The school, the "people's library," and the cooperative across the street are the three cornerstones of Father Tompkins's achievements and plans.

What distinguishes Tompkins from other leaders of the cooperative movement is his approach to the economic problems of modern society. He does not attempt merely to organize the people; he wants to educate them. He has never been primarily concerned with building cooperative enterprises but rather with building a movement. The credit unions which he helped form have not remained mere loan agencies but have been expanding their activities into the sphere of actual economic regeneration. The marketing organizations of the fishermen and farmers of Cape Breton Island have developed into cultural centers. The educational impulse is the nucleus of Tompkins's movement.

Nova Scotia is a shocking example of the failure of "rugged individualism" to bring economic and cultural progress. Here is a province whose resources should have guaranteed sound economic conditions and even prosperity. With rich coal deposits, good farmland, vast forests, and the finest fishing grounds in this hemisphere, Nova Scotia offers its people abundant opportunities. These people are, in the main, of rugged Scotch or English stock and hard workers. And yet until a few years ago they lived in abject poverty and backwardness. The story of what Father Tompkins has done has a lesson that is important to all of us.*

When he went into action—a little over twenty years ago—most of the fishermen of Nova Scotia were but share-croppers of the sea. The opportunities and the profits were for the middle man, the promoter, the representative of powerful trusts. The individual fisherman was always in debt and thus completely at the mercy of the merchant, who could take his boat and gear if he refused to sell his catch at the merchant's price. The mortgaged farmer was in a similar plight.

LEO LANIA, writer and lecturer, is the author of "Today We Are Brothers."

*Bertram B. Fowler gives a dramatic account of Father Tompkins's work in "The Lord Helps Those—," published by Vanguard.

It was in Little Dover, an island village of 300 fishermen, that Tompkins started. He had resigned from the vice-presidency of St. Francis Xavier University at Antigonish because he had come to the conclusion that the university served only a small group of intellectuals who after graduation were interested merely in getting well-paid jobs. Tompkins had other aims. He has expressed his philosophy in these words: "No man really achieves true greatness any other way than by getting it from the people. Get close to the people with the desire to work for them and with them and they'll make you great. The people make giants."

The people of Little Dover had not even horses, to say nothing of cars, when Tompkins moved there; no roads connected the village with the mainland. There was one teacher; no newspaper reached the community; most people were illiterate. Little Dover was the laboratory of Father Tompkins's ideas; it became the cradle of his movement.

He did not start by telling the fishermen what they ought to do. He told them that they must discover for themselves the root of their troubles. He preached not political action but education. He taught the basic facts of economics and social science. His first victory was a small canning factory which the fishermen built with their own labor, hauling the logs from the woods by hand. Money was spent only for rails and hardware. They raised it by contributing pennies and nickels from their meager earnings. Tompkins lent $300, without interest, and another man $700, for the purchase of canning machinery.

At the end of the first season the fishermen paid back this $1,000. The first cooperative was established. Others followed.

In the ensuing years, as the movement grew, Father Tompkins fought with all his energy for one principle: the members of the different cooperatives must think, plan, work for themselves. They, not the officers, he insisted, were to run the organizations. He wanted people to understand that every attempt to increase their income must be at the same time an attempt to raise the social and cultural level of the whole community.

Whenever a fishermen, farmer, or merchant receives a loan from the credit union, it is given him not only to keep him out of the clutches of a money-shark; it is the beginning of close economic cooperation between the credit union and the individual. The credit union effectively plays the part of a local banking institution, advising and helping each member; all the other members participate in the experience of each.

Father Tompkins's educational program follows the general pattern of the Danish folk-school movement.

Some of its features recall the educational projects of the Austrian Social Democrats, the pre-Dollfuss Volkschulen and Volksbildungsvereine. The "Study Clubs" are his own idea. Education is spread not through mass organizations but through small groups linked together in true community spirit.

"The children teach their parents," Father Tompkins said when he proudly showed me the children's library. It is a large and at the same time very intimate room, modern in the best sense of the word, decorated with dolls and pictures, flowers and funny animals in gay and charming colors. In addition to the usual books and picture magazines for small children one finds here hundreds of the best textbooks for older ones. Mothers and fathers drop in regularly, and once a week Father Tompkins or one of the teachers gives a lecture; two days later the audience meets again for a discussion.

Father Tompkins spoke with high admiration of many miners who, though almost broken by hard work, have become enthusiastic book lovers. "There is one miner, father of nine children. A few years ago he came for the first time. He asked for 'something light.' To read a page of a children's book was a real effort for him. Today he reads the most difficult books in my library, mostly social and philosophical works. There is a woman in our little town, a simple housewife. She has read all the poetry books we have, all of them, moderns as well as classic."

Father Tompkins took a small book from the shelves. "This is one of our most requested books," he said. I read its title: "The Barefoot Abe." It was a pictorial story of Abraham Lincoln. "It gives them so much courage and hope," he said.

Later, in his study, Father Tompkins told me of his future plans, of the "rotating libraries" which he wants to expand so that he can send books into every little port of Nova Scotia. An auditorium with a stage for theatrical performances and concerts is now under construction.

On his desk lay a book, "one of the few really great books of our time," Father Tompkins called it. It was David Lilienthal's story of the TVA. Every page of the book was covered with his annotations. "This is the way to combat communism," he continued. "You cannot fight it by force, only by eliminating the causes that breed it—poverty and social injustice."

In his modest way Father Tompkins and his friends have done more to make the common people understand the meaning of democracy than most of our labor leaders and propagandists with their million-dollar funds and mass organizations. Yet I doubt whether many Americans would think it worth their while to look into Father Tompkins's work. After all, Nova Scotia is only a province of Canada and Tompkins only a poor village priest.

Del Vayo—Socialist House Divided

Paris, August 19

AFTER an absence of six months, my first impression of France was not unfavorable. The quality of the bread has deteriorated owing to the wheat shortage, and prices have risen still higher, but the shops are filled with all sorts of consumers' goods. The precautions I took on previous visits to bring along an ample supply of personal articles are no longer necessary. French production is climbing steadily despite recent strikes and the lack of coal. Even in these abnormally hot August days, when every Frenchman who can manage it has fled the capital, the streets and restaurants are crowded with English visitors who have crossed the Channel to recapture for a brief moment the joy of living. Paris still smiles while a cloud of anxieties and privations casts a lengthening shadow across the British Isles.

I reached France the day after the Thirty-ninth Congress of the French Socialist Party opened in Lyons. The congress was, in a sense, a microcosm of France's political situation, and thus I was able in a few days to bring myself up to date on the crisis now facing the country. Lyons is an important industrial city with a strong, unbroken Socialist tradition that dates back to the emergence of the French proletarian movement. The choice of Lyons as a meeting place and of the ultra-leftist Federation of the Rhône as the committee on arrangements was apparently dictated by the desire of the party leaders to show that although the Socialists have broken with the Communists and chosen the M. R. P. and Herriot's Radicals as their collaborators in the government, they have not become a conservative force. Actually, the left tendency carried the Congress, though by a narrow margin of 2,443 votes to 2,002. However, simply to record this fact without analyzing its significance in the light of the whole debate would give only a half-true picture.

The main problem before the Congress was this: should the Socialists, as members of the government, assume responsibility for a policy which contravenes the principles of their party? Specifically, must they bear the consequences for a policy of limiting wage increases, continuing old-time colonialism, and maintaining free enterprise when the Socialist program advocates defense of the workers' interests, active intervention of the state in the economic life of the country, and a colonial policy compatible with the humanitarian and internationalist concepts of socialism? Should they say to Premier Ramadier, "Follow any policy that will keep the Socialists in power," or "Support a Socialist policy even if it results in your leaving the government"? The Congress chose the second course. It voted to requisition wheat and even, if necessary, livestock; to control the market at every level; to initiate a sweeping series of "public-safety measures" in the economic field. In short, the Socialists voted for a renforcement du dirigisme—for increased state controls.

It was not only the close vote by which the left wing, headed by Guy Mollet, won over the "moderates," but the debate itself that revealed the extent of the ideological divisions in the party. Six different drafts of a party program, not including the letter Léon Blum addressed to the parliamentary group, were submitted to the delegates. Of these texts it is noteworthy that only one, prepared by "Bataille Socialiste," a minority faction of which Marcel Fourrier and Bloncourt are the best-known members, stressed the urgent necessity for unity of action of the working class. The others, including that of the Mollet group, were markedly anti-Communist. This trend can be explained in several ways—certainly the Marshall plan and the bloc politics of the West have had an influence—but the most important factor is undoubtedly the peculiar and extremely difficult situation in which the French Socialist Party finds itself today.

Though the voting strength of the Socialists has dropped in the past two years, their importance as a government party has been mounting. Despite its reverses at the last elections, the party saw itself accorded the key post of President of the Republic and chosen to head the two Cabinets formed since Auriol entered the Elysées. Thus the Socialists have taken over the role held before the war by the Radical Socialists, the most progressive element of the French bourgeoisie until Daladier passed to the side of reaction and tarred them with the brush of Munich.

In the present circumstances it is hard for the Socialists to square their importance as a government party with their aspiration to speak for the working class. This accounts for the uneasiness reflected by the majority of the delegates to the Congress. The main task at Lyons was to reconcile the irreconcilable. This miracle was not achieved; neither of the almost evenly matched opposing groups would budge an inch from the position it had taken at the outset of the convention. Obviously the only alternative was to reach a decision by majority vote; the majority accepted the principle that even defense of the Republic does not justify the participation of Socialists in a government whose policy is not theirs. The party's position on this issue has now emerged very clearly: the party has its program. If the other political parties agree to that program, Socialists may assume the direction of a coalition government. But they cannot accept leadership only to carry out the policy of the M. R. P. or the Radical Socialists.

This was the most important decision reached at the Lyons congress—one which may bring about an early ministerial crisis. For the victorious left wing is determined that Ramadier or any later Socialist Premier must govern as a Socialist or resign. However, once the Parliament has settled the question of the Algerian statute, it will adjourn until after the October municipal election. This interval will give Ramadier time to reconsider his views and try to repair his position in his own party.

Mr. del Vayo has just arrived in Paris; during the coming months he will send regular reports on European political developments.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Co-ops on the March

THE COOPERATIVE CHALLENGE.

By Bertram B. Fowler. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

ALTHOUGH consumer cooperation is now firmly established in this country and has begun to play an important part in economic life, there is still widespread ignorance about its achievements and the principles on which it operates. This is a book which will help to dispel that ignorance. It is an up-to-date report on the movement, stressing its extraordinary growth in the past decade.

Consumer cooperation is an import from Europe and for a long time was promoted mainly by foreign-language groups. Then it became a regional movement among the farmers of the Middle West. Now it is developing rapidly in urban as well as rural districts and can claim to be truly national. It has ceased to be an affair of dingy stores in back streets; today the Co-op sign is to be found on the fronts of gleaming super-markets on an increasing number of main thoroughfares. Moreover, the cooperatives have begun to move into production in a big way. The most dramatic example, described in detail in this book, is the development of an integrated oil industry covering every step from oil well to filling station. Very important service businesses, such as insurance, have also been built up by cooperatives, and recent experiments in housing and health centers hold great promise for the future.

As a useful compendium of facts on all such matters, this book can be thoroughly recommended except for the strange omission of an index. On questions of theory, however, I find myself rather disturbed by Mr. Fowler's doctrinaire approach. The trouble is that he treats the "Rochdale principles," established by the English pioneers of consumer cooperation, not as a set of time-tested, common-sense rules for cooperative enterprise but as fundamental economic dogmas. Mr. Fowler asserts vehemently that consumer cooperation is the only route by which democracy can escape from the toils of capitalist monopoly on the one hand and the totalitarian socialist state on the other. For he follows the now standard practice of capitalist champions of equating socialism and totalitarianism and assumes, practically without argument, that democratic socialism is a contradiction in terms.

In his chapter on cooperatives in the Canadian prairie provinces Mr. Fowler makes a gratuitous and offensive attack on the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—the C. C. F. He scolds the voters of Saskatchewan, who at the last provincial election gave the C. C. F. a large majority, for supporting a party which appeared liberal but actually represented "a political thesis that diametrically opposed the democratic philosophy of consumer cooperation." Although the present Saskatchewan government has given every support and encouragement to the cooperatives, he hints darkly that its ultimate purpose is to absorb them in the state apparatus. He also suggests, on the basis of what evidence heaven alone knows, that the British Labor government may "seize upon the co-ops as tools to bring into being the complete socialization of all industry."

Mr. Fowler is led into stupidities of this kind by doctrinaire fears of any form of state economic enterprise. Yet strangely enough he devotes a chapter to hailing the achievements of cooperatives in opposing the power monopoly in the Northwest—achievements that would not have been possible without the New Deal's great Bonneville project. This, of course, is but one example of complementary activity by the state and cooperatives in the United States and other countries. In the mixed economy toward which the British Labor Party, the C. C. F., and democratic Socialist organizations in many other lands are moving there will be abundant opportunities for cooperative enterprise. It is unfortunate, therefore, that writers like Mr. Fowler, and his obvious mentor, the veteran Dr. Warbasse, should attempt to build an impassable barrier between Socialists and cooperators. Such tactics can only play into the hands of the common enemy—monopoly capitalism. KEITH HUTCHISON

A Big Subject

DIRTY EDDIE. By Ludwig Bemelmans. The Viking Press. $2.75.

LUDWIG BEMELMANS has two distinct literary talents—a mildly inventive whimsy and a gift for describing food. The sensuous representation of the tastes and textures of food is, I venture to guess, one of the few subjects he tackles with genuine enthusiasm; in any case, it is the only phase of his work for which I feel genuine enthusiasm. One has to look elsewhere for the other satisfactions usually expected from novels, but I'll take my literary meals with Bemelmans.

Long years of writing neat, whimsical, ironic, nostalgic pieces have blunted Bemelmans's claws. Having, for so long, so charmingly blended Viennese Gemütlichkeit and New Yorkerish modulation into a constant awareness of the exigencies of good taste, he is faintly superior to anger, invective, or bitterness. Bemelmans has titillated his audience by convincing them of his and their superiority to the materials he has used; in that mild snobbishness is the core of his success at being amusing. Which may do for Bemelmans's little world, but does not do for a satiric novel about Hollywood.

Satire must grow from hatred or contempt. If successful, it transforms these rough emotions into rapier thrusts, but the emotion must be there. It is precisely the absence of this emotion which makes "Dirty Eddie" a failure. There are amusing bits in which whimsy hops, flutters, and perches on your nose. But the book is torn apart by an internal conflict of polar motivations: Bemelmans is not really sure how he feels about Hollywood; he is not sure whether he should hate and despise it, or poke fun at it in a mild and charming way.

"Dirty Eddie" therefore falls into all the traps which Hollywood, in its knowing calculations, sets for people like Bemelmans. There is a pattern of satire which is ready-made—it has even been given Hollywood's stamp of approval—and is not really satire at all. And like a baby going for the bottle, Bemelmans has slid into this pattern: the fabulous, malaprop Jewish producer with girls tumbling over him, the slightly mad Russian director, the wisely cynical French writer, the innocent, hard-boiled American beauty. Where, if not in Hollywood, have we seen all this before?

Since Bemelmans does not take himself seriously as a writer, he is unable to take his subject seriously. In his attempt to confine himself to a whimsy that does not disturb anyone, he co-sets his personality by remaining curiously passive toward the novel; he does not bear down; it is all too easy for him. I do not intend to make a plea for solemnity, but I do think that true satire can only spring from lightly serious perception and that Bemelmans does not have. His characters, therefore, seem, for all their brittle distinctiveness, merely odd functions of his whimsy. Though he himself is detached, he is not willing to grant them an objective development of their own. And so we end with a disjointed novel and some nicely observant and well-molded prose, but with no motivating intellectual commitment or passion, without which a satiric novel, especially one on Hollywood, cannot be written. Bemelmans simply is not equal to his subject. As other and better writers have discovered, Hollywood is a big subject.

IRVING HOWE

Doctors of Today and Tomorrow

By Dr. Michael A. Shadid

Some Things This Book Will Tell You:

- WHY we need to change the present doctor-patient relationship.
- WHAT the advantages could be for both sides.
- WHO opposes this change and why.
- HOW people have gotten together and done something about it.

Some Things This Book Can Teach You:

- HOW you could get medical care whenever you need it.
- WHAT you can do in your own community to see that you get it.
- HOW this program can be best put into action.
- WHAT the doctors of tomorrow could contribute to the community.

It is a book that does not claim to offer a panacea. But it does offer a workable plan that will safeguard for all of us—

The Right to Universal Health

Price, $2.25

Order from:

THE COOPERATIVE
LEAGUE OF THE U. S. A.
525 WEST 76th STREET
CHICAGO 20 ILLINOIS

The Rural Problem

THE AMERICAN FARMER. By Lee Fryer. Harper and Brothers. $3.

IS THERE a necessary correlation between progress in technique and progress in civilization? Americans had better come to grips with the question in relation to our modern rural society and establish a definite public policy in this field before it is too late. For the machine age is working a swifter change among our farm people than is generally realized.

This is the argument in Lee Fryer's forthright and really challenging book. Mr. Fryer knows at first hand that farming is moving in the direction of machine culture and industrial techniques, and he does not see this development as necessarily evil because it must replace the older, traditional ways of agriculture. He knows that we must have a more efficient system of food production, and he is very much concerned with the nature of this new efficiency.

Will increased production be gained at the expense of the rural people in the new agriculture? Will the new pattern of farming require a large force of wage labor hired on an impersonal basis? Will this reduce the chances of survival of large numbers of family farmers, driving them into the rural wage force, into the cities, or on to the relief rolls? Mr. Fryer is above all concerned with the social ends of the new technology on the land and the capitalist industrialism which goes with it. And his answer to the question whether or not technical progress will bring the good life in its train is that it will not unless the problem is widely understood and handled by means of intelligent planning.

The purpose of Mr. Fryer's book is to create awareness of the problem and suggest ways of meeting it. It makes a ringing demand for action on the part of the rural people themselves, as well as for a national plan for rural reconstruction. It is couched in vigorous language, and it is full of hard sense and statistical proof. Moreover, one feels upon reading it that this story and these conclusions have come out of a lifetime of first-hand experience. The author has worked with the Farm Security Administration on such varied problems as farm-land colonization, Western-land irrigation policy, and rural housing. His cooperative experience has been wide in his own state of Oregon, and he has learned much about the national problem of farm people through administrative work with the National Farmers' Union.

"The American Farmer" is a practical book with practical suggestions based upon accumulated data. It shows the present status of working farmers—their houses, their health, their incomes—and it appraises their chances of survival. It goes directly to the heart of the rural problem in the land, debt, and tenure situation, and comes up with the basic assumption that it is absolutely necessary for society "to control the ownership and distribution of farm land in accordance with a sound policy of employment and income." And it demonstrates with remarkable clarity that in a technological society in which all other groups are organized farm people must develop their own efficiency and must operate through organizations, both local and national, for their economic and social security. The author does not belittle the place of the national government in the reconstruction of rural life, but adopting the principle of grass-roots administration of federal functions, he stresses the importance of local action. The farming people of America must in the long run work out their own economic and social adjustments under the legal protection of government and thus lay the basis for the reconstruction of rural life in the United States.

We have had farm-relief programs. We have had conservation programs and programs for improving farm credit, not to speak of a vast program for scientific training and education. But we are today at a turning point in rural life, and our programs of the past will not be adequate for the future. They will help some of the people involved but not all. This is their essential weakness. "We need new principles and new practical policies which will work for people's welfare," says Mr. Fryer. We need not permit the industrial age to leave a trail of waste upon the land as it has within the cities. To achieve a greater production it is not necessary to destroy our soils and ravage our people. "Only by decentralizing and limiting the concentrated power of corporations, defending the security of individual families, raising the income of vast numbers of people, and enlarging their opportunities for productive employment, can the nation meet its crisis of the next decade. Unless action is taken along these lines, both the cities and the countryside are headed for prolonged depression and then disaster." Obviously we need to lift our sights in handling the rural situation. And "The American Farmer" does much to point the way.

P. ALSTON WARING

Shop Talk

OFF BROADWAY: ESSAYS ABOUT THE THEATER. By Maxwell Anderson. William Sloane Associates. $2.50.

VERY few dramatic writers have had as much drama in their careers as has Maxwell Anderson. He has written a number of sensational successes and an even larger number of sensational failures. On occasion he has been praised as highly as any contemporary playwright and on others has been the recipient of abuse more contemptuous than what any except a very few have ever been called to endure with patience. Taking the theater and himself with full seriousness, he has, nevertheless, written both well enough and badly enough to come somewhere near deserving both the good and the bad things which have been said about him; and he knows his trade very well indeed at the same time that he is sincerely determined to make it a good deal more than merely a trade. Moreover, as this exceedingly slim volume of very brief essays collected from here and there will serve to demonstrate, he can express himself in expository prose more sensibly, simply, and clearly than most playwrights can. Even among the ten little pieces there is a good deal of difference in weight and importance, but they are all interesting as the opinions of a man who is obviously entitled to opinions on their subjects. The one on "the critics" is as unsatisfactory as attempts at retaliation usually are. On the other hand, the little essay The Essence of Tragedy is one of the very few examples of the possibility of saying anything fresh on that subject.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Quest

THE WANDERER (LE GRAND MEAULNES). By Henri Alain-Fournier. Translated by Françoise Delisle. New Directions. $1.50.

MEAULNES, having lost his way after a wrong turning in the desolate winter countryside of the Sologne, comes upon a mysterious estate where a group of children are preparing a fête and fantastic masquerade for the wedding which is to take place the next day. The wedding has to be called off, for the bridegroom fails to appear, but Meaulnes has seen and has talked to a young girl, Yvonne de Galais. In the dark before dawn he sleeps while a peasant's cart takes him back to his village. He and his young friend Seurel attempt for years to find their way back to the mysterious manor. And it is Seurel one day who, no longer an adolescent, and while only half-listening to the talk of some of his companions about an old run-down manor house, recognizes it at once and with a startling lack of surprise, as though he had really always known.

Meaulnes has last been heard of in Paris, and Seurel at once sets out to find him.

This attempt at a résumé of "Le Grand Meaulnes" would be enough to keep anyone from reading the novel. It resembles too nearly the scenario of one of Maeterlinck's early plays or, for that matter, a Hollywood film. It is impossible to make a précis of it—a great many people have tried—without writing something as long as the book itself. The latest exhaustive study of it was published in 1944 by Alfred

Interesting and Informative Reading on CO-OPS—

Fundamentals of Consumers Cooperation —V. S. Allaine

Discussion of theory and practical application of principles of consumers cooperation. Price 50¢

History of Cooperation

—Emory S. Bogardus

The history of cooperation in sixteen countries by an outstanding cooperative authority. Price 25¢

The Discovery of the Consumer —Beatrice Webb

An important analysis of the cooperative movement. Price 15¢

Principles of Cooperative Medicine —Dr. Michael Shadid

An outline for operations of a successful cooperative hospital. Price 50¢

Other Interesting Pamphlets

Here Is Tomorrow "Cooperatives In America Today," W. J. Campbell. 10¢

Short Introduction to Consumers Cooperation, Ellis Cowling. 15¢

There Were Three Men, cartoon parable, Robert Stailey 25¢

Write for a FREE catalog of literature

Literature Department
NATIONAL COOPERATIVES
525 WEST 76th STREET
CHICAGO 20 ILLINOIS

Léonard. It is a monumental work, perfectly up to date, even utilizing De Rougemont's theory about the Cathars. It is all true, too. A sagacious young French critic, a few months ago, having been asked to consider an even more recent book about "Meaulnes" made the point I am trying to make here: that there isn't much to say, that the extraordinary effect is all to be found intrinsic in the novel, and that to try to render it extrinsic by critical writing only annoys the sort of reader who persists, in a crazy way, in believing that he wrote the novel himself.

✠ A BORZOI BOOK ✠

A vivid, dramatic story of conflict between antiquity's greatest sage and its greatest tyrant

PLATO AND DIONYSIUS

A Double Biography

by Ludwig
Marcuse

This fictionalized biography of Plato and of Dionysius II of Syracuse makes challenging and compelling reading on three levels of interest: as pure story, as brilliant historical re-creation, and as philosophic argument. In the struggle between tyrant and philosopher Ludwig Marcuse has seen and dramatically projected the eternal war between wisdom and selfish force.

On sale in all bookshops $3.50

✠ ALFRED A. KNOFF ✠

However, if you believe that reading Max Brod on Kafka helps you to experience "The Castle," nothing of what I have said here has much meaning. All I ask is that you make a mere postscript of Havelock Ellis's introduction, which, though competent, should have been buried with the old beard himself. "We may best approach 'Le Grand Meaulnes,'" he says, "by knowing something of the man who stands behind it." On the contrary, there never existed a book so self-contained.

French poetry can't be translated, but French prose can when someone has the inestimable talent of Françoise Delisle; you can't improve on perfection, and New Directions deserves praise for having reprinted from Houghton Mifflin's 1928 plates. But if there had to be an introduction, Edmund Wilson should have been asked to do it. He seems to me about the only one to convince you that "Le Grand Meaulnes" is unique and universal, like watching your own skin getting wrinkled over the years; the only man to make you tie up the experience of reading "Meaulnes" with that of being dropped, while stooping down to tie your shoelaces in the morning, among the fragments of last night's dream, while in self-defense you relate them even as they fade away with the pattern of the carpet under your eyes.

And without hurrying he went on his way. At the corner of the wood, in between two white posts, appeared a drive which Meaulnes entered. He walked up a few yards and stopped, startled, disturbed by inexplicable feelings. He walked with the same fatigue, the icy wind cut his lips and took his breath away, and yet a strange contentment urged him on, a perfect and almost intoxicating peace, the assurance that his goal had been reached and that he had now nothing but happiness to expect. . . . "So much joy," he said to himself, "just because I am coming to this old dovecot full of owls and drafts."

This passage was certainly not chosen at random, but if you find "Meaulnes" "romantic," there is this to remind you of Zola or Céline: "The funeral is for midday. The doctor fears the rapid decomposition which sometimes follows on an embolism. That's why the face—as well as the whole body for that matter—is wrapped by absorbent cotton soaked in phenol."

The story of "Le Grand Meaulnes" is that of a quest. In Robert Graves's words: "There is one story and one story only." RENÉ BLANG-ROOS

A Reliable Mediator

POETS AND PUNDITS. A Collection of Essays. By Hugh Fausset. Yale University Press. $3.50.

THESE are fine essays. In Mr. Fausset's pages the reader will find more poets than pundits, and, of the latter, none, in the pejorative sense of the word. Facing, humbly, the reviewer's first duty—"to act as a reliable mediator between an author and the public and to serve both as sensitively as he can"—Mr. Fausset proves himself sensitive to many kinds of sensitivity, not merely susceptible to his own; he enters into natures as various as those of Whitman and Rilke, Tolstoy and Tennyson, Dorothy Wordsworth and Donne, the Augustans and Edmund Blunden, Hopkins, and De la Mare. Moreover, he is acutely aware of the dilemmas, doubts, and dangers that assail the artist, or any man in our own time who is concerned with the values of the spirit. This awareness, and the sharing of this concern, unite these essays in a common theme and fully justify the author's hope that the theme gives "unity to the book's diversity and a significance beyond that of a mere collection of literary essays." To all but the arrant, or craven, materialist Mr. Fausset's book will afford pleasure, satisfaction, and cause for rejoicing—a heartening collection.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

That Atomic War

WORLD AFLAME. By Leonard Engel and Emanuel S. Piller. The Dial Press. $2.

THIS book is in a good cause. The authors are describing the state of the world in 1955. From 1950 to 1955 war had been in full swing between (can you guess?) the United States and Soviet Russia. The United States, in 1955, was planning for another five years of all-out war. Up to that time the give and take had been more or less equal. One hundred of our leading cities had been razed. Some 30,000,000 of our population had been killed, an equal number wounded, and so on. The Russian losses were proportionately of about the same order. The end was nowhere in sight. In fact, contrary to popular notions, this "Atomic War" looked as if it were going to outlast World Wars I and II.

This book deserves wide distribution, if only to remind us of what may be in store for us and for the world.

I suggest a companion volume, of equal if not greater importance—a volume also dealing with the period of 1950-55, but with a different theme: statesmen proved far-sighted enough to prevent war between the two nations, and intelligent enough to provide for the "common man." And now let's look at the world of 1955.

BENJAMIN HARROW

Films

JAMES
AGEE

A CHECKLIST on some new and recent movies:

"Life with Father." Rich, careful, rather heavily proficient. Fun, I suppose; but I can't really enjoy laughing at tyrants, least of all at tyrants who are forgiven because of their innocence. William Powell acts, rather than is, Father rather well, but it's strictly an impersonation. Irene Dunne is painfully miscast as Mother; she would probably keep her tongue in her cheek uttering the Seven Last Words.

"The Secret Life of Walter Mitty." By no means what it might have been if it had used what James Thurber's story offered it, but quite an entertaining movie. I am getting a little wan about Danny Kaye's tonsil-juggling numbers, but there are good bits of henpecking and office life, and at moments during the daydreams Kaye is wonderful. He is so good at his best that it is hard to forgive—or even believe—all that he mishandles. I am sorry that the dreams are set and dressed as fantastic musical-comedy numbers; they would have been much funnier if Mitty had dictated every square inch of his surroundings. The Goldwyn-Thurber correspondence in a recent issue of Life, by the way, makes very interesting reading.

"Down to Earth." And so far as I'm concerned, six feet under it. Mr. Jordan, dry-ice mist, and heaven too.

A Broadway musical called "Swinging the Muses." Terpsichore (Rita Hayworth) intervening to turn this rotten piece of commercial entertainment into still worse high art. There are, however, some prettier than average tunes, and a few glimpses of Miss Hayworth are also prettier than average.

"Black Narcissus." Several nuns get upset by the strange atmosphere of, and surrounding, their new convent, which was formerly a Himalayan harem. (Quite an idea for a musical, that. Take it away, Rita.) One (well played by Kathleen Byron) falls for a local Englishman (David Farrar) and fails to renew her vows. The head nun (Deborah Kerr) just makes Sisterly sheep's eyes at him as he lunges around the sanctuary in his shorts he is not, one gathers, a Believer). There is also a local Holy Man, staring at a peak, and a great deal of talk about the wind and the strangeness of it all. After a while the Sisters give it up as a bad job. It is all intended to be very "psychological," "atmospheric," "rueful," and "worldly-wise." I suspect that the worst faults lie in Rumer Godden's original novel; that Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger were badly mistaken in trying to make a movie of it at all. There is some unusually good color photography, and as movie making some of it is intelligent and powerful. But the pervasive attitude in and toward the picture makes it as a whole tedious and vulgar. P. S.: Barring perhaps one in any hundred who willingly practice it, I think celibacy is of itself faintly obscene; so I admire still less the dramatic exploitation of celibacy as an opportunity for titillation in the best of taste.

"Frieda." Are all Germans Guilty? This English film spends a long time

Sweden

THE MIDDLE WAY

Enlarged Third Edition

By MARQUIS W.
CHILDS

The book that since its publication in 1936 has come to be regarded as a classic of political writing. Now brought up-to-date with the addition of a new chapter and a new introduction. "Reads like the best political news in years . . . sounds gloriously like what we used to think of as American; a method of compromise and steady progress, each step tested by the sole criterion: Does it work?" LEWIS GANNETT, N. Y. Herald Tribune.

Illustrated, $3.00

At all bookstores

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
Publishers of The Yale Review

How a Half-Million Farmers Are Solving Their Economic Problems

The economic crisis of 1929 forced midwest farmers to take action to help themselves. No business can long survive by selling at wholesale and buying at retail. That's what these farmers were facing—prohibitive prices for petroleum products and distress prices for farm products.

A handful of co-ops, with a few hard-earned dollars, pooled buying power and efforts to buy petroleum products at lower prices.

The business began with six local co-ops. In one year there were 22 member associations. Business volume was above $300,000. Net savings, $5,221.44.

Fiscal year ending August 31, 1946, recorded more than 1,000 member associations. Business volume up to more than $26 million, net savings, $1,665,829.

Today a half-million midwest farmers are finding cooperation an answer to economic problems. As owners of CCA they are serving their needs in goods and services—at a saving!

For more information about co-ops write

CONSUMERS COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION
P. O. BOX NO. 2359
MONTICELLO CITY 13, MONTANA

'RENDEZVOUS WITH DESTINY'

The greatest dramatic story of all time told in the actual words and familiar voice of...

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

Two de luxe souvenir albums of 12 records containing excerpts of 23 of Roosevelt's most important radio addresses, from the first Inaugural, March 1933, to the Jefferson Day address, (posthumous), April 1945... "which punctuate the mighty march of events in which he played so great a part."

These history-making Documentary Recordings are dramatically reproduced with original musical score, and written narration by Cesar Saerchinger.

12 unbreakable, flexible Vinylite records in 2 handsome Albums.

$24.50 the set

A valuable possession for record collectors, libraries, historical archives, schools, colleges, classes in Current History, Government, Public Speaking and English.

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
203 RCA BUILDING • NEW YORK 20

Why Not Buy BOOKS Through a COOPERATIVE?

The Cooperative Book Club, Inc., is interested in bringing you BEST BOOKS rather than BEST SELLERS, particularly books of literary and social value.

We are incorporated as a Bookshare consumers cooperative, operating on a NON-PROFIT basis.

Members (shares are $5.00) buy a minimum of four books a year (ANY book appearing on ANY PUBLISHER'S list) participate in net savings.

Any individual may place his name on our mailing list; he will receive Club notices and book announcements. He may order books through the Club.

JOIN NOW, OR WRITE FOR DESCRIPTIVE LITERATURE

THE COOPERATIVE BOOK CLUB, Inc.
220 Broadway New York 7, N. Y.

earnestly telling you that some aren't, entirely, and some are, and that time heals, respectively, all wounds and none. It appears that the only thing open to a German who wants really to convince one of a willingness to be reeducated is a sincere attempt at suicide. Mai Zetterling, who was very good in the Swedish film "Torment," is still pretty good in this, but the face and the talent are freezing; unless she is smart and careful, Hollywood will finish her, directly or indirectly. David Farrar, who sets the nuns a-flutter in "Black Narcissus," is also in this one. He might easily become a matinee idol, and he might possibly become something better than that.

"The Long Night." A long, loud, ambitious film, Anatole Litvak's first since the war, about a simple man (Henry Fonda) who is driven to murder by the calculated confusions of a very corrupt man (Vincent Price). It would be interesting to see it on a double bill with its original version, the French "Daybreak." Both films obviously rate themselves as tragedies; both are merely intelligent trash. But the old one is much more discreet with its self-pity and much more sharply edged. The new one depends too heavily on crowd-commotion; noise (there are gruesome distortions of the slow movement of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony); huge, lugubrious close-ups of Fonda looking adenoidal; and class-angling. It is, however, much better than the run of contemporary movies.

"Thunderbolts." Made by William Wyler during the war too late for release released now as a recruiting incentive. A record of the bombing and strafing operation which cut off the Germans in Italy from their supplies. A good many incredibly fine air shots, well organized; by a long shot, the best of the movies reviewed above.

Some older movies that are worth seeing, or mentioning anyhow:

"The Macomber Affair." Best movie job on Hemingway, to date. I persist in believing that Zoltan Korda is one of the best directors in Hollywood. "The Woman on the Beach." An exceptionally evocative melodrama, directed by Jean Renoir. "Copacabana." Groucho Marx with a new mustache and a modified style. "The Red House." Back-country melodrama well written and directed by Delmer Daves, who makes good use of his location and of some adolescents. "Torment." The first half is a fine, ardent movie about a schoolboy, a deranged teacher, and a terrified working girl; thereafter it fritters out into pretty good horror melodrama and pale conclusions. "Miracle on 34th Street." Santa Claus (well played by Edmund Gwenn) comes to Herald Square and wraps up the millennium in one neat package. Clever, and pleased with itself, and liked by practically everybody; but since I have always despised the maxim "Honesty is the best policy," I enjoy even less a statement of the profits accruing through faith, loving kindness, etc. I expect next a "witty, tender little fantasy" presenting the Son of God (Sonny Tufts) as God's Customers' Man.

MOTION PICTURE

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
61st ST.
86th ST.
89th ST.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
23rd ST.

RKO NOW
CORNEL WILDE MAUREEN O'HARA
'THE HOMESTRETCH'
in TECHNICOLOR
— and —
'BORN TO KILL'
Lawrence TIERNEY • Claire TREVOR

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

SHIRLEY FRANCHOT GUY
TEMPLE • TONE • MADISON
'HONEYMOON'
Based on VICKI BAUM Story
— and —
'RIFF-RAFF'
Pat O'BRIEN
Walter SLEZAK
Anne JEFFREYS

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER

MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

MOTION PICTURE

"You have to see
'The Roosevelt Story' twice!"
—WALTER WINCHELL

THE ROOSEVELT STORY

The Most Important Picture of the Century!

NOW PLAYING
BRANDT'S COOL GLOBE

Broadway & 46th Street
Continuous performances—Popular prices!

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4256

Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

Give to help fight CANCER!

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 226 By MR. X.

MOSES SMITH'S "Koussevitzky" (Allen, Towne, and Heath, $4) is the biography that Koussevitzky tried to suppress. On the other hand the Harvard University Press announcement of Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt's "Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the New American Music" ($3) informed me that when the book was being considered Koussevitzky wrote: "I personally believe that Dr. Leichtentritt is one of the few outstanding musicologists of our day, and his book, based on long experience and direct contact with the musical life of this country, will prove of great interest. . . . It would give me much pleasure to see it published by you."

Actually the "long experience and direct contact with the musical life of this country" is that of a German who came here after 1933, and whose knowledge and opinions of much of the music played by Koussevitzky in his earlier years and by the Boston Symphony even before that—and also of what other orchestras and conductors had done for American composers—are only such as could be acquired from the volumes of Boston Symphony program-notes and press-clippings. Furthermore, the scholarship of this "outstanding musicologist" is as little worthy of respect in this book as it was in his article on criticism in the Harvard Dictionary of Music: there, for example, he had newspaper criticism of music beginning with Hanslick, here he has "modern conducting . . . stemming from Wagner"—omitting in each case the work of Berlioz. Moreover, he finds it as easy to invent whatever he needs for his purpose as some of his fellow-scholars do: for example—to show how logical the engagement of Koussevitzky was—the statements that "after the death of Nikisch he had a greater international prestige than any other contemporary conductor," that "the Great War had finished the era of German predominance in the best American orchestras," and that the eminent German conductors had no desire to come here—the truth being that less had been heard here of Koussevitzky than of Furtwängler and Bruno Walter (to say nothing of Toscanini), and that not only were Walter brought over by the New York Symphony in 1923 and Furtwängler by the New York Philharmonic

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the fourth of six puzzles constructed by Mr. X in competition with Mr. Y. At the end of the competition, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

ACROSS

- 1 Once loss is suffered, comforts are all awry
- 5 Mater's a regular babbling brook
- 10 According to the mode, style should conceal garishness
- 11 Electric fans
- 12 Blood-and-sandlot
- 13 Sauce for the goose
- 14 Cross-examine at the bar
- 16 Night lights
- 19 Despire nothing when interpreting special events
- 22 The Cork road to Dublin
- 24 A Latin manual
- 26 It's apparent the voter is confused
- 28 Keep cool first and last if you wish to govern
- 29 This makes a gun so much neater
- 30 Esthete set out tea to boil
- 31 "In Old -----," by Norman Douglas

DOWN

- 1 Map strategy to gain the bivouac
- 2 Gee! In the nude, but it has a light touch
- 3 The cob steals over the hurdles
- 4 Why Elaine's so delightful
- 6 Making a strait flush

- 7 Queer how Circe backed up about a penny
- 8 Merit's in the man
- 9 Rope washer
- 15 Some effrontery is to be expected from an imp and a dunce
- 17 Ha, Marconi never dreamed they'd put this instrument on the radio!
- 18 Gave Thais rye and provoked her frenzy
- 20 Oiled the sea to make it gentle
- 21 Arm us at the Netherlands East Indies
- 23 Civets disappear when he puts out the cats
- 25 Charm of the first spring moon
- 27 Egregious agent provocateur gets off with I. O. U.'s

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 225

ACROSS:—1 LOBSTER; 5 MEDDLER; 9 ROASTED; 10 NOVICES; 11 ELDER; 12 ARM; 13 LOOTS; 14 SERVANT; 16 MERRERS; 18 TEMBLOR; 21 CAPITAL; 24 ANNUL; 26 AIR; 27 STEIN; 28 AVERAGE; 29 ARTICLE; 30 LISPERS; 31 RANGERS.
DOWN:—1 LARGESS; 2 BOARDER; 3 TUTOR; 4 RADIANT; 5 MINIMUM; 6 DEVIL; 7 LECTURE; 8 RESISTS; 15 AWL; 17 RAP; 19 TRAVAIL; 10 MANNERS; 20 REAPERS; 21 CORSAIR; 22 TREACLE; 23 LENDERS; 25 LEASE; 27 SATAN.

during Koussevitzky's first season, but Mengelberg was with the Philharmonic, Reiner with the Cincinnati Symphony, and Klemperer was brought over by the New York Symphony.

In addition, when Leichtentritt writes about the music he does know from performance or from the score, it is with the lack of critical discernment and aesthetic good sense that is characteristic of these scholars, and that produces passages like this one about Copland's "Billy the Kid": "A naive foreigner . . . might ask whether this is a typically American story, and what music has to do with it. Evidently Copland asked himself the same questions, and evidently he did find something typically American in this tale and something fit for musical treatment. As a musician, Copland is concerned with Americanism in its various phases, but also with the dignity of the art of music. Yet in this particular case, one may suspect that commercial reasons prompted him to neglect the dignity of music, as he is otherwise not a specialist in stories appealing to the instincts of the prize ring."

And about Koussevitzky himself as artist and educator, finally, Leichtentritt writes with the factual accuracy and critical judgment of a corporation publicity director writing about the talents and achievements of the corporation's president: in whatever Koussevitzky has done as a musician he has been unflinching and brilliantly right, even where he has been found wrong, and for reasons and principles newly invented to meet the criticisms; in whatever he has said as an educator and propagandist in music he has been profound and prophetic.

Altogether the book is, in fact, what a corporation publicity director would turn out about the corporation and its president, dressed up in pretensions to scholarship. It is, then, a book one can understand a Koussevitzky getting pleasure from seeing published, but not a Harvard University Press publishing.

Smith's excellent book I will have to postpone to next week.

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-3
598 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

Say you saw it advertised
in The NATION!

To place an ad call BA 7-1066

RESORTS

THE ONLY THING WE OVERLOOK IS THE SOUND

North Shore Lodge

CATERING TO YOUNG FOLKS AND ADULTS ONLY

A country setting for Sea Shore Pleasures. Swim, fish, golf, play tennis, ride, sail—do everything that makes a vacation paradise. Dance to the music of a well-known orchestra. American cuisine.

Reserve Now For Labor Day
MT. SINAI, LONG ISLAND
65 miles from N. Y. Near Port Jefferson. N. Y. Off. AL 4-4668

Relax, Rejoice with Summer at

Lakecrest

On Hunn's Lake, Stanfordsville, N. Y.
80 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N. Y. C. R. R. to Amenia, N. Y. Open all year.
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS
EVA BERG, Director Stanfordsville 2328

MAUD'S SUMMER-RAY

North Branch Sullivan County, N. Y.
Telephone: Callicon 95 or 148
MUSIC, DRAMA, SPORTS, TENNIS, LAKE ORCHESTRA, COCKTAIL LOUNGE
Gala Labor Day Festivities
OPEN FOR THE JEWISH HOLIDAYS
For names information, rates and reservations
Call City Office:
Daily 6 Ramercy 7-3089 Sunday, 6 Ramercy 5-2473

SCHOOL

CHERRY LAWN SCHOOL DARIEN, CONNECTICUT

Co-educational, Boarding and Country Day School. 40 miles from New York City. Grades 3-8. High School 1-4. A few vacancies for boys in the Upper and Lower Schools . . . girls in the Lower School. Curriculum emphasizes world culture . . . Individual guidance . . . with wide range of academic subjects. Cultural and Practical Arts, and all Sports including Horse-back riding.

Christina Steel v. H. Bogoslovsky, Ph.D.
Tel., Dar. 5-1425 Director

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

BUSINESS PROPOSITION of interest to physician, M.D. astrologer, under 50 years, must speak French. Box 1728, c/o The Nation.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

TYPING SERVICE

MANUSCRIPTS EXPERTLY TYPED. Plays, stories, novels, criticisms, rewrite instructions; low rates, prompt delivery. "MANUSERVICE," 109 East 153rd St. Melrose 5-4993.

HELP WANTED

Teacher Wanted. THE MODERN SCHOOL at Stelton, N. J., seeks a recent graduate with a musical background. Being small, the school offers an excellent opportunity for a teacher to become an educator while working with small children. Alexis C. Fern, Principal.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

For chain store, branch department store or high-type home office building, we offer for long-term lease the magnificent, modern Stone Front fireproof former First National Bank Building at Boston Post Road and Mamaroneck Avenue, in Mamaroneck, 3 stories, basement and cellar. Impressive architecture and layout. 2 Elevators. L. N. Rosenbaum & Son, 565 Fifth Avenue, New York 17.

TWO MILES RIVER VIEW; 1/2-mile river frontage. 90-acre Gentleman's Estate, suitable for club, sanatorium, convalescent home, high-class boarding house; 22 miles south of Albany; 14-room modern house; tenant house; barn easily convertible; dormitory; beautiful lawns. $30,000; terms. NAUM, 82 State, Albany, N. Y.

FOR SALE OR LEASE

SAN FERNANDO VALLEY: Two brand new buildings, sale or lease. Offices—Retail—Warehouse—Lite Mfg.—on one lot. Patio between; INCLUDES 3 1/2-ROOM DWELLING. 5555 Cahuenga Blvd., North Hollywood, California.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, New York. Farms in the Mass.-New York Berkshires. Also consulting broker for organizations.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515M.

COUNTRY HOUSE TO SHARE

TWO PERSONS to share 5-room house, center Bear Mountain; good well; car necessary. Box 1729, c/o The Nation.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 6, 1947

NUMBER 10

The Shape of Things

HAD IT NOT BECOME INURED TO MASSACRE, the world would be horrified at what is going on these days in the Punjab. Reports from the region of Amritsar and Lahore estimate the weekly death toll of Moslems and Sikhs at about five thousand. Tens of thousands of helpless refugees are crowding the rain-sodden roads in a desperate attempt to find haven from gangs of fanatics bent on killing. The Prime Ministers of Independent India and Pakistan—Jawaharlal Nehru and Liaquat Ali Khan—are touring the areas where violence is most intense and appealing for an end to the communal war. So far, the appeals have had little effect. Some will say that this is the first bitter fruit of independence, the evil foretaste of greater trouble to come. Others, more accurately, will diagnose it as the logical outcome of a campaign of agitation and threats which was all too successful in making converts among extremists in the Moslem and Sikh communities. What must be recognized is that the Punjab is as yet an isolated instance of failure. The predicted general conflict between Hindus and Moslems has not materialized, and the two communities have shown a mutual toleration, and their cooperation has surprised even the optimists. The program of economic and political reform mapped out by Nehru, if challenged by the wealthy landlords, princes, and industrialists, is finding support among the masses of the people—Moslem and Hindu alike—in independent India. And, if we are to believe the words of Jinnah, Pakistan, perhaps by a less democratic road, is aiming at similar economic and political goals. The real struggle shaping up in India will not be one rooted in ancient feuds and superstitions but rather a struggle against reaction and toward a more decent life for the Indian people.

★

THREE MONTHS AGO, IN THESE PAGES, Leonard Engel predicted that atomic energy could be made available for peace-time uses within two or three years. Last week-end's announcement of the successful operation of an atomic-power plant that uses fast instead of slow neutrons, confirms this prediction. According to Dr. Norris E. Bradbury, director of the Los Alamos

Scientific Laboratory, the new process is "in a sense a controlled version of the bomb," the energy being released at a steady rate of flow instead of in one explosion. The size of the reactor is so reduced that the experts say it can be used to propel large ships and locomotives, in addition to bringing power to industries far removed from coal, oil, and hydroelectric installations. We are within sight of the second industrial revolution, the consequences of which will be scarcely less far-reaching than those of the first. All of which will, we trust, have some effect in weaning our age away from its present morbid obsession with atomic bombs. The scientists at the United Nations can hardly be blamed. They have just produced a series of reports that seem to provide an adequate basis for international accord on a system of control which, when established, will free peace-time atomic-energy development from its present shrouds of secrecy. Russia, which shows no signs of accepting the new proposals, would stand to gain perhaps even more than we from the vast flow of new power. For the life of us, we can't see what it would lose by becoming a party to a control which we now exercise as a monopoly.

★

NOT TOO SLYLY, THE NEW YORK DAILY NEWS suggests that the executives of I. G. Farben are on trial at Nürnberg "because the German army lost the war." There, but for the Grace of Allied arms, it concludes, go Knudsen, Ford, and the officials of General Motors, Chrysler, and du Pont. Had it mentioned Standard Oil of New Jersey, the Aluminum Corporation of America, and Dow Chemical, all of which had close dealings with Farben, its point might have been better taken, but even so it would have fallen wide of the mark. The real point of the trials is that the defendants are accused, not of maintaining the most suffocating cartel ever imposed on world trade, but of committing war crimes for which their accomplices in high office have already been jailed or hanged. We would feel better about the trials if they were, in fact, part of a coherent campaign to smash a national economic machine that twice made it possible for German governments to plunge the world in horror.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	213
America's Guilt in Britain's Crisis	215
The Palestine Report	216

ARTICLES

Politics and People by Robert Bendiner	218
Washington and the United Nations by Thomas J. Hamilton	219
Crisis for British Labor by Aylmer Vallance	221
Is the Constitution Un-American? by I. P. Stone	223
Cartoon: Loyalty Tests by Ezekiel Schloss	224
Poland Today. III. Foreign and Domestic Politics by Alexander Werth	226
The Death of Lyuh Woon-Hyung by Hugh Deane	228
Europe Is Skeptical by Del Vayo	230

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Shabby Götterdämmerung by Alfred Guérard	231
Baudelaire and Others by René Blanc-Roos	232
Hawks and Acorns by Joseph Wood Krutch	234
What Price Prejudice by Carey McWilliams	234
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	236
Music by B. H. Haggin	237

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 238

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 227 by Mr. X 239

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchway

Managing Editor

Literary Editor

J. King Gordon

Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Schultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

But while the Farben executives fight for their lives, no serious effort is being made to break up their cartel, or such other monster trusts as Siemens, Vereinigte Stahlwerke, or Mannesmann. In a remarkable speech in the House six weeks ago, Representative Sadowski of Michigan demonstrated in detail how "the leaders of German heavy industries and finance—staunch supporters of the Nazi regime—have retained full control of German economic life." And why not, with our Robert Murphy undermining the denazification program and all but repudiating the Potsdam agreement? With General Draper—a vice-president of Dillon, Read and Company, just appointed Under Secretary of War—openly working to rebuild the German steel trust which his firm had financed to the tune of $125,000,000?

★

YEAR AFTER YEAR, THE NEWSPAPERS AND officials of some chosen city go through the routine of welcoming the American Legion, putting up with its dreary horse play, and sighing with relief when the middle-aged children pack up their water pistols, whistles, and electric sticks and go home. Out of gratitude to those legionnaires who really fought for the country—thousands of them, of course, never smelled enemy powder, while thousands who did would not be caught dead in a Legion uniform—we can easily endure a few days of synthetic carnival. But while the rank-and-file members are inanely engaged in dropping bags of water from hotel windows, their officers and exploiters indulge in more dangerous mischief. Last week, the Legion bureaucrats outdid themselves. The oratory to which they exposed their gullible charges was of the hysterical, if not incendiary, war-with-Russia variety. The speeches by Louis Johnson and General Eisenhower were the only conspicuous exceptions, and cautious as they were, the retiring Legion commander had the effrontery to try to head off Johnson's or force him to modify it. The product of official incitement and membership ignorance was a set of reports and resolutions that included the following principles: The Marshall plan is worth while solely as a dam against the Russians. The Soviet Union is to be condemned for sabotaging the United Nations by its free use of the veto, and we should strengthen the U. N. by rejecting all international controls over atomic energy. The Communist Party should be outlawed and the Bill of Rights amended to make easier the suppressing of subversive elements. "Socialistic" is the word for the Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill, but government housing cannot be ignored entirely; we must see that it is barred to members of un-American organizations. After reviewing this "serious work" of the Legion's officials, we almost respect the wholesome intelligence of the humble legionnaire whose sole convention business was to chase blondes up the street at the point of a fake red paintbrush.

America's Guilt in Britain's Crisis

[Uncle Sam is not Uncle Shylock. But his lack of political sophistication, his small-town bankers' view of economics and finance, his belligerent conviction that he is beholden to nobody, and his incapacity, born of the smug knowledge that he is today the Croesus of the world, to realize the plight of less fortunate people or to understand how their misfortune can possibly affect him often make him act like Uncle Shylock. And American behavior in the matter of aid to Britain and Europe is a tragic case in point.]

[In the nature of the case, it is hard for Americans to realize how their behavior looks to the rest of the world. They should—and for that reason, we reprint below sections from an article in the London Economist of August 23, which seems to us both perceptive and just.]

IT WOULD be wrong to say that American opinion as a whole is uninformed about the plight of Europe or insensitive to it. The State Department, some Congressmen, and the more responsible newspapers are anxious, sympathetic, and eager to discover some method by which the inconvenient logicalities of the American Constitution can be circumvented and aid made available in time. It is a situation very similar to that of 1940-41. But, as at that time, it is the rest of American opinion that has to be reckoned with, and though there is less active hostility to Britain than at many times in the past—except among the Zionists, who probably do the British cause more good, on balance, than harm—there is equally less willingness to understand why any effort should be made to help.

Sir Wilfrid Eady has come up against a typical representative of this attitude in Mr. Snyder, the Missouri banker who found himself with some suddenness projected into the office of Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Snyder has declared himself to be sympathetic to the British case, but it has also been made clear that the sympathy is of the brand that a Missouri banker is accustomed to show to a borrower who has run through one loan and now requires both to be released from some of the conditions of that loan and granted a new one. The banker will sit and listen, but the onus of proof is on the borrower and the proof had better be a good one.

It would be a waste of time to try to explain to people with this psychological approach that the fault for the present crisis—if fault there must be—is far more America's than Britain's. The loan was far too small when it was made, as the British pointed out at the time. The conditions attached to it were unworkable, as was also pointed out at the time. The sharp reduction in the real value of the loan was due to the rise in American prices, following upon the abandonment of price control in America. The world-wide dollar crisis, which hurled the convertibility provision into a disaster, is due to the fact that the American balance of payments has got out of control. Nothing could have been done about any of these things by any British action or inaction. Contributory negligence there has certainly been from the British side, but it has been of smaller importance . . .

American opinion should be warned that over here, in Great Britain, one has the feeling of being driven into a corner by a complex of American actions and insistencies which, in combination, are quite intolerable. Not many people in this country believe the Communist thesis that it is the deliberate and conscious aim of American policy to ruin Britain and everything that Britain stands for in the world. But the evidence can certainly be read that way. And if, every time that aid is extended, conditions are attached which make it impossible for Britain ever to escape the necessity of going back for still more aid, obtained with still more self-abasement and on still more crippling terms, then the result will certainly be what the Communists predict, whether or not it is what the Americans intend. The crippling of the British export trades that was one of the conditions of Lend-Lease increased the dimensions of the aid that was required in 1945. And the famous Articles VII to X of the loan agreement, with their obligations of convertibility and non-discrimination, have brought the British back to Washington earlier and in worse plight than was necessary.

IS IT really the Americans' wish that this process should continue? They should be warned that, every time it is repeated, something more is subtracted from the British willingness to offer genuine cooperation in building the sort of world that Americans want. Do they really prefer a resentful dependency to a self-supporting and self-respecting friend? They should realize that the British government has made very great efforts, and has been willing to run great risks, in agreeing with American conceptions of international economic policy. The risks of convertibility have proved all too real. Non-discrimination, if it is applied in the months to come, will be the means of starving the British people. Yet even now, at Geneva, the British representatives are in process of committing this country, in the proposed charter of the International Trade Organization, to sweeping general principles which, however excellent they may be in theory, are likely to prove in practice to be equally dangerous. No government could have put more of its own interests in pawn to pledge its good-will; no other government has even tried to make a similar effort. Yet those who would search in Washington for the credit that Britain has earned thereby would need the patience of Diogenes.

For the present, the Americans still retain the power to make the British government jump through any hoop they choose. For it is the ultimate calamity that, for all the brave talk of standing on our own feet, the misfortunes that would fall upon the British people if there were no dollars at all are such that no British government could face them. But this dependence will not last forever. A time will come when, by a combination of external events and internal efforts, Britain will be able to do without dollars at a cost that will be bearable. Do the Americans, when that time comes, want the British to regard the cutting loose from America, the erection of barriers against America, as a boon so great that the highest bearable price will be cheerfully paid for it at the earliest possible moment? They can be assured that there are very many Englishmen who would regard anything of the sort as an unparalleled disaster, as the final and irremediable losing of the peace that so much common blood and treasure were spent to win. But they can also be assured that that is the way things are drifting at present.

Mr. Marshall, in his great speech at Harvard in June, called on the European nations for a great imaginative effort. They are responding, and in a more far-reaching way than might have been expected. In return, Europeans have the right to ask the Americans to make an equally great effort of imagination. Let them forget, for the moment, their own conviction that their present wealth and strength are the result of superior virtue and remember the Europeans' conviction that they are merely due to better luck. Let them worry less about what they can afford to give and more about what they cannot afford not to give. Let them above all try to realize what it feels like to be in other men's shoes.

The Palestine Report

FROM the moment it was appointed, the United Nations Special Commission on Palestine was condemned to do exactly what it did—produce recommendations none of the parties interested would willingly accept. The first reactions of Jews and Arabs are critical; those of the Jews in varying degree, those of the Arabs unanimously and without qualification. As we write, the British have said nothing, officially, but their objections are not hard to predict.

The Nation also differs with the report at several important points, particularly on the question of area and borders. Just the same, we believe both sets of recommendations prepared for the General Assembly are distinguished by a high degree of fairness and objectivity. Whether or not they are adopted by the Assembly, whether or not, if adopted, they are agreed to by the British and carried into effect, they represent an honest, intelligent attempt to find a way out of one of the nastiest dilemmas of our time. Above all, they show remarkable freedom from the constraints of power politics. Clearly, the problem was considered on its merits and not in terms of the special interests of one or another great power. That in itself is an achievement.

We favor the majority report, proposing two separate states linked by a common economic council, over that of the minority, which favors a bi-national federal union of Jewish and Arab states. Ideally, the second sounds more desirable; in a society where race and religion played a less destructive role, a bi-national Palestine would be an obvious democratic solution. But in a society divided by communal interests and sharply conflicting ways of life, a federal state such as the minority members suggest could not be trusted to protect the vital interests of Palestine's Jews. Under this scheme, the control of foreign relations and taxation and, above all, of immigration would be left to the central government. But the legislative, administrative, and judicial structure proposed would assure representatives of the Arab majority the final word on all federal matters. When one reflects on the solid, unbending opposition of every organized Arab faction to the admission to Palestine of a single additional Jew, and on the attitude of the Arab Higher Committee toward even the existing Jewish population, one can easily imagine the decisions a federal Palestine government would reach on questions of immigration and the protection and development of Jewish institutions. We do not doubt the good intention of Iran, India, and Yugoslavia, the creators of this plan, but we believe their recommendations should be rejected.

THE constitutional provisions proposed by the majority are interesting and, at first look, thoroughly realistic. They take account of the need and desire of both peoples for genuine sovereign powers, while recognizing the absolute necessity for common economic arrangements. Under the majority plan, drawn up by Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, the Netherlands, Peru, Sweden, and Uruguay, the two Palestinian states would be quite separate in structure and political powers, but they would subscribe in advance to a treaty creating an economic union. The functions of the union would be to establish a customs union, a common currency, operation of transportation and ports; also to promote "joint economic development especially in respect of irrigation, land reclamation, and soil conservation." The economic board to be set up under the plan would have as members three representatives each of the Jewish and Arab states and "three foreign members appointed by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations." In this provision lies the promise of a future prosperous Palestine, capable not only of absorbing many hundred thousands of homeless Jews but of providing a human standard of life for the Arab masses as well.

The political proposals in the majority plan are similar to many that have been made by earlier advocates of partition, including those in the memorandum submitted to the assembly last April by the Nation Associates. They provide for democratic procedures in the election of constituent assemblies in both states (including suffrage for women!) and insist upon democratic safeguards in the constitutions to be written. They take particular care of the citizenship rights of members of the minority group in each state, insuring them the chance to "opt" for citizenship in the other state if they prefer it. But the constitutional details of the plan are less important than its broad outlines, geographical as well as political.

Without question, the commission tried to fix boundaries that met the minimum requirements of both peoples. By and large, it succeeded pretty well; at certain critical points it failed. Arab leaders are not talking about what they like and what they dislike, since they are committed against the whole scheme. Just the same, the inclusion of Jaffa in the Jewish area must have been a particularly painful jolt, for Jaffa is, in effect, the Arab capital of Palestine, the center of Arab urban life. Under Jewish authority, it could well be a focus of trouble. Apart from this, the Arabs received all they could rationally claim in a divided state.

The Jews did not. They argued for the inclusion of western Galilee, partly because it contains many flourishing Jewish colonies and is geographically part of the coastal area assigned to the Jewish state; partly because it reaches up to and borders upon Lebanon. Close relations between Jewish Palestine and Christian Lebanon are most desirable. In spite of Lebanon's resistance to Zionist claims in the United States, its long-range interests unquestionably lie with the growth of a vigorous Jewish community, able to resist—and help Lebanon to resist—the pressure of the Moslem majority in the Levant. To establish an almost detached wedge of Arab Palestine between Lebanon and the Jewish state is, in our opinion, a serious mistake.

On the other hand, the commission showed independence as well as good sense in allotting the Negev to the Jews. This arid, almost empty area, forbidding to the ordinary settler, represents one of the pioneering dreams of Jewish Palestine. Several colonies have already been planted there, and others will come as fast as land is made available. But the large-scale development of the great sandy triangle as a productive area capable of sustaining a settled population will depend upon the building of a Jordan Valley project to provide power and water. If the Negev is finally included in a Jewish state, the British will have lost an important future base for military installations outside, but adjacent to, Egypt. For this reason, among several others, it is not likely that Britain's delegates at the Assembly will welcome the commission's majority recommendations.

THE other reasons are large and obvious. Whether or not Britain wants to find a way to withdraw from Palestine—and most close observers believe it does not—it can hardly enjoy being asked by an international commission to get out. Point 1 of the unanimous recommendations that open the report calls for the ending of the mandate at the earliest "practicable" moment. Point 4 would permit Britain to continue to administer Palestine "during the transitional period" under authority of the United Nations, a rather dubious privilege in view of Points 2 and 3, which call for independence for Palestine after a brief period of preparation, and of the majority suggestion that 150,000 Jewish immigrants be admitted to the proposed Jewish state at a regular monthly rate of 30,000—beginning right away. To administer Palces-tine on these terms would be like assisting at one's own wake, and Britain is not likely to jump at the chance. If Bevin feels forced to acquiesce in the general scheme of independence and partition, he will surely demand help, presumably from America, in liquidating his country's power under conditions of which he violently disapproves. The most one can expect is that he will live up to his promise to accept unanimous recommendations, which means at least accepting the end of the mandate; beyond this, one can only hope. To Bevin, Palestine is not India; it is a strategic area he wants to hold on to, in spite of past promises to a people he doesn't much like under any circumstances. Bevin's admitted anti-Semitism may yet be a factor to be reckoned with.

In any case, the idea of keeping Britain on the job as administering power while the new states are being defined and set up seems to us thoroughly impractical. British rule in Palestine is discredited in the eyes of the world and detested by both Arabs and Jews. A far better plan would be the one proposed in the Nation Associates memorandum: to withdraw the mandate from Britain and place Palestine under the direct authority of the United Nations with the protection of an international police force, perhaps on the Trieste model since no permanent United Nations force has been agreed upon.

The Arab position is settled. No bargaining or cajoling—far less, reasoning—is going to affect it. If either plan is adopted, it will have to be imposed upon the Arab leaders in Palestine and upon the Arab states which have made the Palestine case their own. Persons who shrink from an imposed decision should recall that no modification or compromise will produce agreement; the Arabs themselves have officially made that clear.

The Jewish position is uncertain. Moderate Zionists seem inclined to accept the majority proposals with certain specific qualifications. The more extreme elements, who have opposed partition right along, will undoubtedly raise many arguable objections. In the end, Jewish approval is likely, except among the terrorist fringe, if only because the alternative is a future of endless, destructive struggle—and further unthinkable misery for the refugees. The voyage of the Exodus will help rally Jews to the commission's plan.

What about the United States? The attitude of this country may be decisive in the U. N. even though it is not a primary "party in interest." For months, as Thomas J. Hamilton points out on page 219, the State Department has been pretending that we have no policy on Palestine—despite a generation of firm commitments. Oil and Russia have intervened to throw doubt on American honesty and steadfastness, but the commission's report will put the Administration's intentions to an early test. A strong voice from the country may help to crystallize them.

Politics and People

BY ROBERT BENDINER

[With this column we introduce a new feature by Robert Bendiner, intended to keep our readers posted on the ways and wiles of politicians as the country heads toward the quadrennial spasm of a Presidential election. People and Politics will appear at frequent intervals from now to November, 1948.]

SUCH are the palates of politicians that no words of their own are ever too bitter to swallow. Senator Pepper, who for at least a year has not been noticeably kinder than the Republican National Committee in his references to President Truman, now finds him not merely sincere, honest, and humane, but the very "salt of the earth." And A. F. Whitney, blandly supporting Truman for reelection, is in no visible way embarrassed by the fact that only last summer he pledged himself to raise a million dollars to defeat the President who had smashed the railroad strike, the man about whom he delighted in telling the kind of off-shade stories that Westchester commuters once told of Roosevelt as they rode to work on the "Assassination Special." But Pepper, as an associate of mine neatly puts it, is always to be taken with a grain of salt; and Whitney's ire, largely personal in its inspiration, faded out with the issues that roused it.

There are others, however, for whom an about-face will not be so simple, and some for whom it will hardly be possible. The Communists and many who follow them, even at a respectable distance, are guided exclusively by considerations of foreign policy. To them the man who promulgated the Truman Doctrine regained not an inch of stature by vetoing the Taft-Hartley bill. And in foreign policy there is no apparent prospect of a change that they can regard favorably. One of the more speculative aspects of the Presidential campaign, therefore, will be the course chosen by these anti-Trumanites, who are neither impelled to reverse themselves for reasons of domestic policy, as Whitney did, nor committed, like Pepper, to the Democratic Party, right or wrong, win or lose.

THAT these voters will find solace in a third party of national dimensions becomes every week less probable. Actually their hope was doomed when Philip Murray turned a deaf ear, thus depriving them of the use of the C. I. O.'s Political Action Committee as a spearhead. Murray's position has now been made clear beyond all doubt by David J. McDonald, his lieutenant in the Steel Workers' Union and secretary-treasurer of P. A. C. "The drive for labor goals," Mr. McDonald says flatly,

"will be made through the established parties." Without the C. I. O., without the A. F. of L., which was never counted on, and without the Railway Brotherhoods, which were, the campaigners for a third party in 1948 are left nursing an empty threat and pondering a nice dilemma. If they persist in following a mirage, they either isolate themselves from labor or divide its ranks; and if they abandon the idea, what choice have they but to back Truman against a probably worse opponent?

For the moment the course appears to be one of laying down the third-party issue and Presidential talk altogether. When the subject recently threatened to produce in New York's American Labor Party one of those amoeba-like divisions that characterize leftist politics, the Communists immediately relaxed their pressure. Reaction, the party's state secretary lamely explained in the Daily Worker, "is attempting to identify the third-party movement in New York and elsewhere solely with the prospects of a third Presidential ticket in 1948, and on this issue is attempting to divide and disintegrate the natural adherents and supporters of the third-party trend." The Communists, he indicated, were ready to subordinate the issue to the larger ones of preserving the unity of the A. L. P. and building nationally for the future. Even taking this explanation at its face value—always an unwarranted course in politics—it appears that the comrades are resigned to forgetting the notion of Wallace in '48. And if they have given up, it is not far-fetched to imagine that the Progressive Citizens' Committee, left to itself, will quietly drop the idea before long.

DOES this mean that disaffected Democrats will creep back to the Truman camp? Probably. But two other possibilities are still open. First, they might choose to ignore the Presidential campaign entirely and confine their activities to the Congressional races. In the event that Dewey or Taft is the Republican nominee, it would be understood, probably, that Truman was to be preferred and voted for, but enthusiasm for him would be kept to the level reserved in politics for Lesser Evils.

An alternative is one that the Republicans themselves ironically might provide, to wit, the nomination of General Eisenhower. It would be rash to anticipate the reaction of the left to such a move, and I make no predictions, but it would be foolish to ignore the possibilities. Eisenhower sentiment has not yet reached the boom stage, and it may never do so, but it is unquestionably growing, and all the faster because of the likelihood of a Dewey-Taft deadlock at the convention. Ike-for-President buttons have bobbed up in various parts of the country, and Wall Street money is reported to be quietly slipping away from Dewey and moving in the direction of the General, whose publicity grows steadily in volume.

A Gallup poll last week showed that 35 per cent of those questioned would like to see Eisenhower run, which is startling when one recalls that in earlier polls not more than 4 per cent of Republicans and 6 per cent of Democrats ever mentioned him when asked to make a choice for 1948.

THE pertinent aspect of the Eisenhower build-up is that it originated in labor circles. The inspiration was Sidney Hillman's, acquired in the course of his last trip to Europe, and the idea made headway at the 1946 convention of the C. I. O. Eisenhower, as guest of honor, made a notably favorable impression. Not only did he eulogize labor in general, which is standard operating procedure for men in public life, but he spoke warmly of the "benefits that have been brought to the American working people" specifically by the trade unions. He had already pleased the left by telling audiences here and in Europe that he was "convinced that no major nation in the world wants a global war," but this has probably been canceled out by the sharp references to Russia's free use of the veto which he made in the course of his speech to the American Legion. Many delegates at the C. I. O. convention read significance into Murray's carefully enunciated farewell to the General. "Every man and woman in this hall," he said, to great and prolonged applause, "is a friend of yours."

Of course that was before Truman had preempted the Democratic nomination and before the Republicans had revealed themselves to the country in all their legislative glory. As a Democratic nominee Eisenhower would sweep in the union vote, but to ask labor to support him as a Republican, with all the political baggage he would necessarily carry along with him, would admittedly put an appalling strain on the friendship proclaimed by Mr. Murray.

Washington and the United Nations

BY THOMAS J. HAMILTON

Lake Success, September 2

WHETHER it is because of the ineptness of Soviet diplomacy or for the more fundamental reason that Soviet aims are incompatible with a peaceful and orderly world, the United States will play an even more important role at the coming session of the United Nations General Assembly than heretofore. In particular, the Soviet attitude toward the Balkan problem, which is likely to be the most bitterly contested issue, has won friends and influenced people for the American side.

Considerations of Realpolitik are never overlooked in the most technical diplomatic conversation, and it would be unrealistic to disregard the fact that the United States is now not only the greatest military power but the only source of food and machinery for war-crippled countries. But new strength has been given to the American position by the succession of Soviet vetoes and by the general intransigence of Soviet officials at Lake Success and everywhere else that the Soviet Union is in contact with the outside world.

The United States is therefore able to raise a standard around which the wise and honest may rally. If it does so, it can completely dominate the meeting at Flushing Meadows. The permanent delegates are saying that this will be a critical session, that the future of the United Nations largely depends on it. The position taken by the United States on the principal issues therefore will be of fundamental importance in determining whether the basis of an enduring peace can be laid.

The United States hardly lived up to its opportunities or its responsibilities at previous sessions of the General Assembly. A year ago, when the Assembly held its first meeting in this country, Mr. Molotov was allowed to take the initiative with his disarmament proposal. It was largely because of the efforts of better-briefed delegations, particularly the Canadian, that the resulting storm blew itself out in a resolution that at least did not jeopardize the work already done by the Atomic Energy Commission. Other countries took the lead on such matters as the Franco regime in Spain and the discrimination against Indians in South Africa, and the American delegation found itself in a position where it could soften but not hold up the resolutions that gave mortal offense to Franco and Marshal Smuts.

On the other hand, although the Assembly was hard-put to keep up with the astonishing reversals of position by Warren R. Austin, the chief United States representative, it followed through to the end on the site question, and accepted Mr. Rockefeller's offer of the East River location. Even more inexorably the United States held fast on the matter of supplying international relief after the liquidation of UNRRA, and Secretary General Trygve Lie was authorized to ascertain the need without being given the slightest means of doing anything about it.

At the special session on Palestine the leadership of the United States was noticeable mainly in a series of procedural maneuvers which somehow or other created the impression that we were sympathetic with the Arabs. We said nothing about President Truman's reiterated demands for the admission of 100,000 Jews, though we did not say anything particularly friendly to the Arabs either. We were not showing our hand, and neither were the Russians; so the Assembly managed to set up a committee of inquiry with relatively little difficulty. A panel suggested by the United States contained most of the countries placed on the committee. We declared we had no policy on Palestine and would not have any until the committee submitted its report. That gave us a delay of four months, but this reprieve is now coming to an end, and sooner or later the walls of the skating rink at Flushing Meadows will echo with a statement that will give mortal offense either to the Arab countries and the American oil companies doing business with them or to the pro-Zionist Jewish vote in the United States, or to both.

THOMAS J. HAMILTON is chief of the New York Times bureau covering United Nations proceedings.

Partition now appears to be the best hope of settling the Palestine question, and Mr. Gromyko has already indicated that he would accept it as a last resort. It is apparently agreeable to the United States as well. If the committee of inquiry proposed the return of the twelve lost tribes to their former home, the General Assembly would acquiesce if both Washington and Moscow wanted it. No solution is conceivable unless the United States and the Soviet Union do agree.

Looking at the situation from the most hopeful point of view, the vital question now is what steps can be taken to carry out the General Assembly's recommendation. It is obvious that force must be used, and it is equally obvious that the United Nations has none at its command—even the long-talked-of "international police force" would be at the disposal of the Security Council, not of the Assembly. Judging from the recent fighting in Palestine, in which Arabs as well as Jews are now taking part, a major effort will be required.

The British have the only immediately available troops, and they are less and less inclined to carry the burdens of empire in the Mediterranean. In any case, they have made it clear that although they will accept any decision on Palestine by the General Assembly, they will not carry out any decision which does not square with their conscience and their means, or which is unacceptable to both sides. The British will certainly have an out if they choose to use it.

A FEW months ago, in the relatively halcyon days of the United Nations, it appeared that plans for the permanent headquarters would be the second outstanding problem. It is still a problem, although other and even more controversial issues have arisen. As for the site, it is obvious that the other members of the United Nations will find the greatest difficulty in supplying the dollars required for their share. Sixty-five million dollars, the latest revised estimate, is not much when it is divided among fifty-five countries, but the accentuated austerity program in England is a fair indication of the foreign-exchange situation in many countries.

It may be that the undignified device of mortgaging the new buildings to Massachusetts insurance companies is the only way, though hard-boiled insurance men cannot be expected to put up the full amount. This seems to be the opinion of some of the members of Mr. Lie's high command, who obviously hope that such an example of self-help, if not thrift, will wring the heart of Mr. Taber and thereby bring an appropriation from the United States Congress for the remainder. The other alternatives are to get the United States to put up its entire share at once and perhaps lend the balance; to require the fifty-five member nations to come across with United States dollars in time to pay the contractors; to postpone—or abandon—the whole idea of a "workshop for peace" among the topless towers of Manhattan.

It is to be feared that dollar-poor members will raise niggling objections to the magnificent design prepared by Wallace K. Harrison and his international committee unless the United States delegation is able to offer generous financial support. Undeniable difficulties stand in the way of such an offer, for Congress is not in session, Senator Vandenberg and Senator Connally will not serve as members of the delegation, and the State Department is justifiably cautious about committing the guardians of the nation's purse strings. On the other hand, the digging of foundations and the erection of steel girders for the permanent home of the United Nations would undoubtedly have a tonic effect on world opinion.

Already, of course, the less stout-hearted champions of collective security are beginning to say that they are afraid the United Nations will be mostly a debating society by the time the headquarters is built, if it is built.

THE last few weeks have certainly provided a field day for the pessimists. A succession of Soviet vetoes on the Balkan question and the related question of new members has left little of the principle of great-power unanimity. The fact that France invoked the veto on the Indonesian question was at least as damaging as any baker's dozen of Soviet vetoes, for it removed the notion prevalent among many that the veto is a diabolical Russian device which is eschewed by the four other right-thinking great powers. Until now these right-thinking countries have had the votes to block any resolution in the Security Council without having to rely on the veto. The French veto left many with the suspicion that even China, even Great Britain, and even the United States, might invoke it if things started getting tough for their side.

In any event, the veto question will be raised in various guises: in the report on the rejected applicants—ten this year, instead of the five of 1947; in the formal protest by the Perón regime against such an undemocratic device; and finally, and most serious of all, in the formal United States appeal to the General Assembly from the Soviet vetoes on the Balkan question. It is to be noted that the new United States proposals for defining the veto, if they mean anything at all, do not really limit its operation on important questions. They even confirm the use of the veto on all matters arising out of Chapter VI—matters that threaten peace—as well as out of Chapter VII, which applies to shooting wars. Nevertheless, the United States very clearly means business in the Balkan situation, even though the General Assembly, equally clearly, has the power to make recommendations only, not to give orders binding upon all members of the United Nations.

Some delegates think the United States will have trouble in getting the required two-thirds' majority for Assembly recommendations on the Balkans. But it is to be hoped that the State Department is giving the necessary consideration to the steps to be taken if the Assembly accepts the United States resolution, and the Soviet-dominated countries of Yugoslavia, Albania, and Bulgaria refuse to pay any attention to it. Mr. Johnson has already suggested that in such a case we would invoke Article 51 of the Charter, which authorizes both individual and collective action for self-defense pending action by the Security Council. It seems obvious that this is a dangerous policy, however necessary it may be to prevent the Communist coup which the State Department still anticipates as an answer to the Truman doctrine.

The threat seems to be part of a full-scale diplomatic offensive that the United States has launched in the United Nations in the past few weeks. We are now giving blow for blow, and every now and then Mr. Johnson lets Mr. Gromyko have one for old times even when the Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister is apparently just looking at his shoestrings. These tactics no doubt will be continued and stiffened when the interest shifts from Lake Success to Flushing Meadows. There is every reason to welcome more adequate statements of the American point of view, which certainly have been deficient in contrast with the arguments ad hominem of the Kremlin's representatives. But it seems worth reminding our delegation that the United Nations organization, imperfect though it certainly is, is based on the hope that prevailed at San Francisco for cooperation among the great powers, and specifically between the United States and the Soviet Union. If the other countries are forced to choose, an overwhelming majority will certainly take our side. With respect to the issue of the creation of a Balkan border commission, our side is obviously right. But it is to be hoped that the United States delegation will ponder the results of a series of victories that might leave the United Nations unalterably divided into two camps. If the United Nations can weather this meeting of the General Assembly without a marked loss in prestige, it can look forward to a healthy future, but it is still too young to survive a decisive contest. Perhaps if the showdown is postponed, and if the peace treaties can be written before the 1948 Assembly convenes, no showdown will be necessary.

Crisis for British Labor

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, August 20

TO PEOPLE who, like your correspondent, have lived through the past half-century there is something disquieting in fine weather over England. The sky was cloudless when a defeated British army reeled back from Mons; over London the days and nights were halcyon as Hitler's armored divisions drove across Poland; and this August a cloudless heaven has given England unbroken sunshine while a crisis has developed which threatens not only next winter's food rations but something much more important—the success of Mr. Attlee's government and the whole future of British Social Democracy. As the sunlit weeks have passed, the question to emerge has been not so much whether Britain's Ship of State has a compass as whether it has a rudder.

The story begins with the private meeting of the Parliamentary Labor Party on July 30. M. P.'s assembled for that meeting in considerable disquiet. It had become clear that the dollar loan would be exhausted earlier than the most pessimistic had predicted; it was not understood why Mr. Dalton—flying, it was said, in the face of United States Treasury advice to the contrary—had gone ahead with plans to make sterling on current account convertible as from July 15 in spite of the mounting drain on the dollar credit; and there had been a spate of rumors, sedulously fomented by the Tory press, that the Prime Minister intended to form a coalition government and appeal to the country on that basis for a mandate. From the meeting, however, sufficient news ran the gauntlet of parliamentary privilege and appeared in the press to make it clear that Ministers had assured their supporters that the crisis would be tackled resolutely and on Socialist lines. Mr. Attlee appears to have forestalled attacks from the "Keep Left" group by promising a drastic scaling down of the armed forces; and the keynote of his speech, forecasting the program to be laid before Parliament, was that there would be no whittling down of socialist policy and that Britain would seek at all costs greater economic independence from the United States.

AYLMER VALLANCE is The Nation's London correspondent.

A week passed, a week in which the Cabinet met and met again. The press gave the crisis a tremendous build-up: ruthless economies in imports were forecast; a real siege economy was to be enacted; there was to be no more temporizing with the problem of dollar scarcity; unparalleled sacrifices were to be demanded all around. Newspaper readers really sat up and took notice: there was something of the Dunkirk temper in the atmosphere. But when Mr. Attlee announced the government's crisis plan in Parliament on August 6, it became only too clear that the series of Cabinet meetings had witnessed not the final formulation of a logical, precise program for dealing with the emergency but the reassertion by Ernest Bevin of his fatal supremacy over his colleagues. Contrary to what the Parliamentary Labor Party had been led to believe, no radical modification in Britain's costly foreign policy or its commitments abroad was indicated: a derisory cut of 80,000 in the strength of the services was all that Mr. Attlee promised for the next six months, and it appeared that by the end of 1948 there would still be the economically intolerable total of 840,000 in "uniformed unemployment."

The shock administered to government supporters on the back benches was profound; and the rest of the government's program only increased the bewilderment. Faced with a deficit of at least £700,000,000 in Britain's balance of foreign payments, Mr. Attlee gave no sign that a serious attempt would be made to bridge the gap. There were to be, it is true, some fresh austerities—a 12 per cent cut in the number of points available for the purchase of certain non-rationed foods, a mild reduction in petrol allowances, and a stiff tax on imported films. By these cuts and by letting stocks of foodstuffs and raw materials run down during the next twelve months perhaps the foreign-payments' gap might be narrowed by £200,000,000. But what of the balance of £500,000,000? Mr. Attlee had no suggestions to offer beyond expressing the hope that the coal and steel industries would attain higher production and that by the end of next year we should be exporting half as much again as we are today. In key industries, he hoped, longer hours would be worked; and he spoke encouragingly if vaguely of the possibility of taking steps to correct the present maldistribution of labor as between essential and unessential occupations. Parliament was left with the impression that it had been presented with a hastily gathered bagful of improvisations.

The immediate consequence was a memorial to the Prime Minister from Labor M. P.'s of all shades of opinion demanding another meeting of the Parliamentary Labor Party before Parliament dispersed for the recess. That meeting was held on August 11, by which time the House of Commons—the Lords subsequently assenting—had given the government the widest possible powers to deal with the crisis by means of administrative decree. What Labor M. P.'s wanted to know was whether the government intended in fact to make use of the powers accorded it. Above all, had the Cabinet really said its last word about the possibility of service retrenchment, and were the patently ineffective measures so far announced for dealing with the economic crisis to be regarded simply as a piece of window-dressing paraded in the hope that the United States Treasury would be sufficiently impressed to provide further dollar credits in anticipation of Congressional approval? And, if so, did this mean that part of the price to be paid would be the shelving of the promised bill to nationalize the steel industry in Britain and the indorsement of American plans to revitalize the heavy industries of the Ruhr on the basis of private enterprise? The party appears to have got a dusty answer. They were told that the size of the armed forces would be kept constantly under review; that it was for the Cabinet to decide if and when the steel industry should be brought under social control; and that nothing could be said at present about coming negotiations in Washington with reference to the future of Germany. "Have we a policy?" one Labor M. P. asked another as they left the meeting. "Have we a government?" was the retort.

The crack is, in one sense, unfair: the government is functioning, and from a strictly departmental point of view is functioning efficiently enough. What is missing is a coordinated plan stated simply and intelligibly so as to evoke a positive response from the common people. That such a response would be given to an appeal couched in clear terms is beyond doubt. Even as it is, the miners have agreed in principle to work longer hours, and the General Council of the Trade Union Congress is raising no objection to the proposal that labor should be directed into undermanned key industries—a proposal which Mr. Churchill attacked with extravagant vehemence last week-end. The trouble is that too many people realize that the measures which the government proposes are at best a half-hearted compromise. For example, the plan for the direction of labor is apparently to apply only to men and women who become unemployed; that is, before essential industries can be provided with "directed" recruits from unessential industries, the latter will have to be gradually slowed down by being given smaller quotas of fuel and raw materials—a slow process which can do little to reduce employment in wasteful occupations, such as the betting industry and the host of middle-men transactions, in which raw materials are not a relevant factor.

Compromises are not a spur to individual effort, least of all when the ultimate objective is not clearly discerned, and complete uncertainty about where we are going is beginning to impair both the nation's will to work and the morale of the Labor Party. The impression is universal that a great opportunity to rouse the country in support of a dramatic five-year plan has been lost, and that a divided Cabinet cannot yet make up its mind whether Britain's economy is to be geared to Wall Street or whether we must abandon hopes of multilateral trade expansion and seek outside the dollar area countries whose specific needs we can supply in return for the food and raw materials we cannot do without. At the moment bewilderment at the government's apparent complacency, mixed with vague apprehension that every month the situation is going to get more and more out of control, is leading to a sense of frustration and to cynicism.

August 29, by Cable

THE developments of the past weeks have done nothing toward modifying the impression that the Cabinet is prisoner to adverse circumstances and hopelessly deficient in a positive policy. Stopping the convertibility of sterling was an inevitable reaction to the grossly underestimated drain on dollar resources after July 15. Significantly, Eady, according to Snyder, did not ask for an American waiver to Article 9, which suggests that the Cabinet is unable to face the implications of the breakdown of multilateralism and is reluctant to risk American displeasure by developing discriminatory but vitally essential new avenues for British trade with the dominions and Europe.

The ban on pleasure motoring and travel abroad, announced last night, adds only £30,000,000 to foreign-exchange savings as previously published, leaving a two-thirds' gap which still has to be bridged. Public opinion is increasingly disquieted by the likelihood that a negative policy on import restrictions will be continued and is reacting adversely to foreign ability to purchase British exports, such as motors. Both the left and the right press are universally hostile and deplore the absence of any constructive proposals to increase production.

This is particularly regrettable in the coal industry. The miners' offer to work every Saturday was rejected by the government on the unconvincing excuse of inability to afford payment for the overtime; it preferred to substitute eight hours for seven and a half on Monday and Friday. Rightly or wrongly the miners believe this proposal, which admittedly is less efficacious in terms of increased output, represents the first step, as dictated by the United States, toward the permanent abandonment of the seven-and-a-half-hour day and the subsequent enforcement of a forty-eight-hour week. The suspicion is causing bitterness in the coal fields and prejudicing the chances of a voluntary increase in effort.

Is the Constitution Un-American?

BY I. F. STONE

THE pro-fascist character of the Congressional Un-American Activities Committee was best displayed in the contempt proceedings against the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee. In other cases of this kind fundamental issues have been obscured by divisions of opinion about the nature of the Communist Party and of Communist activity; the pro-fascist bias of the Dies committee and its successors has generally been covert and implicit. In the action against the J. A. F. R. C., however, the motives, the purposes, and the philosophy of the Un-American Activities Committee have been explicitly affirmed by the committee itself.

The committee's attack on the J. A. F. R. C. began with its inquiry into the anti-Franco rally held at Madison Square Garden on September 24, 1945. The committee's report of June 7, 1946, the outgrowth of that inquiry, is largely devoted to exposing "the lies and deceptions used by the Spanish front organizations . . . to create in the minds of the people of America the impression that the streets of Spain are covered with blood." The report operates on a familiar non-sequitur: the Communists are against Franco; therefore to be against Franco is to be Communist. It equates opposition to Spanish fascism with un-Americanism. A Congressional committee presumably established to expose alien propaganda against American free government has succeeded thereby in jailing for contempt Americans accused of engaging in propaganda against a totalitarian regime in Spain! In the annals of American politics there is no clearer case of indecent exposure.

The attack the report made on Harold Laski may serve to indicate how far the committee has wandered. Laski, at that time chairman of the British Labor Party, was stigmatized for a broadcast address to the anti-Franco rally: the committee objected to his criticism of the Vatican and to his opposition to a monarchist restoration. Adopting the subtle language of Union Square controversialists, it said censoriously that Laski "poses as a Marxian Socialist." A person who reads this report for some guidance on what the Un-American Activities Committee regards as un-American may reasonably conclude that it is un-American to criticize the political activities of the Vatican or to pretend to be—presumably without being—"a Marxian Socialist." Here we find Dies's successors, Comrades Thomas, Rankin, and Adamson, deep in the heart of the dialectic.

THE sequence of events in this case is typical of the Un-American Committee's methods. On December 1, 1945, Ernie Adamson, counsel of the committee, asked the President's War Relief Control Board to cancel the license of the J. A. F. R. C. to collect and distribute funds for the relief of Spanish Republican refugees abroad—the committee's custom is to sentence first and investigate afterward. Seven days after making the demand, Adamson sent the J. A. F. R. C. a letter suggesting "that you permit one of our investigators to make a preliminary investigation of your organization to determine whether or not this committee is interested in your activities" (my italics). A few days later the committee, without benefit of this preliminary inquiry, issued a subpoena asking Miss Helen Bryan, executive secretary of the J. A. F. R. C., to bring all its books, records, papers, and documents to Washington; the list of contributors and the names of all receiving help from the committee were specifically requested. The J. A. F. R. C. objected to this on various practical and legal grounds: that the transfer would stop its work; that the disclosure of contributors would subject them to character assassination by the Un-American Activities Committee; that to give out communications from Spanish Republicans in exile might mean death for their families in Spain.

Miss Bryan is to be tried under a separate indictment. The other sixteen members of the board have been tried and convicted. Five have purged themselves of contempt; eleven have been sentenced to serve from three to six months in jail and to pay fines of from $500 to $1,000. The convicted include the distinguished novelist Howard Fast; Lyman R. Bradley, who has been removed as chairman of the German Department at New York University; and Edward K. Barsky, chairman of the J. A. F. R. C., whose work as a doctor on the Loyalist side during the Franco rebellion will be honorably remembered by a future free Spain. Former Assistant Attorney General O. John Rogge is counsel for the convicted, and the case is now on appeal. It is one of a number of cases headed for the United States Supreme Court which will test, in legal and constitutional terms, the authority of the Un-American Activities Committee. A court test of this kind has been long overdue, and success in defying the committee would be a major victory for civil liberties. The Un-American Activities Committee is the John the Baptist of American fascism, and it has already cowed a large section of Congress and of public opinion.

SENTENCES imposed for contempt on the directors of the J. A. F. R. C., as on Eugene Dennis and Gerhart Eisler, have increased the committee's power to terrorize. The nature of these cases has created fears and nourished illusions which enable the committee to enlarge its area of political persecution with a minimum of public protest. Because these and pending cases involve either Communists or organizations within the Communist sphere of influence most liberals have been (1) wistfully hopeful that only reds and fellow-travelers are endangered, and (2) unmistakably fearful of defending the accused lest this be taken as evidence of Communist sympathies. One need only recall the committee's attack on the non-Communist and anti-Communist Union for Democratic Action, predecessor of the equally chaste Americans for Democratic Action, to see that the hope is hollow and the fear dangerous.

Effective protest and action are further paralyzed by the notion that nothing can be done about the abuses of so important a function of government as Congressional investigation. This is not true. "We are concerned here," Rogge said in his brief on motion to dismiss, "with the basic democratic right to be free from intimidation with reference to one's personal beliefs." There are ways of protecting that right in the courts. The Congressional power of investigation is not unlimited. A Congressional investigating committee is limited by the terms of the resolution which created it. The terms of the resolution must be within the powers of Congress, and those powers must be exercised within the framework of constitutional injunction as to fair procedure. "Neither house," the Supreme Court said in 1927, "is invested with 'general' power to inquire into private affairs and compel disclosures . . . a witness rightfully may refuse to answer where the bounds of the power are exceeded." Subpoenas cannot be so sweeping as to provide for fishing expeditions. "It is contrary to the first principles of justice," Holmes once ruled, "to allow a search through all the respondent's records, relevant or irrelevant, in the hope that something will turn up." These quotations indicate the nature of some of the questions raised on appeal. Can a committee set up to investigate "un-American propaganda activities in the United States" fish in the private papers of an anti-fascist relief committee on the ground that aid to Franco's opponents and victims is un-American? The resolution setting up the Un-American Activities Committee is broad, far too broad for safety, but it is not that broad.

IF the J. A. F. R. C., was carrying on improper activities, the government had ample remedies at its disposal. The J. A. F. R. C.'s books and financial records were exhaustively examined by the Treasury last year; it was liable to loss of tax exemption if carrying on propaganda or otherwise misusing its funds. That the

J. A. F. R. C., retains its tax exemption indicates that nothing damaging was uncovered. If this did not satisfy the law-enforcement agencies of the government, they could summon a grand jury at any time and subpoena all the J. A. F. R. C.'s records. But in such a proceeding secrecy would protect the J. A. F. R. C.'s contributors and relief clients from unfair attack and unwarranted exposure. Grand-jury proceedings also protect the government from making a fool of itself as it did in the Eisler case, where an atom-bomb-spy scare fizzled out into conviction on tenuous passport technicalities.

One of the questions raised on appeal in both the J. A. F. R. C. and the Dennis case* is whether a Congressional investigating committee can properly assume the functions of a grand jury with a roving commission for the prosecution of crime. Wigmore's classic work on evidence says of the power of a legislative committee to compel testimony: "Not only does the logic of the legislative needs call for a strict limitation of this power, but also the policy of the situation; for the legislatures are not bound by, do not employ, the evidential rules that in judicial trials protect parties and witnesses and check abuses of power." Moreover, Wigmore continues, "legislative inquiries are sometimes conducted for partisan purposes and personal aggrandizement, and there is a particular temptation to pursue the inquiry beyond the necessities of contemplated legislation and to assume improperly the function of a grand jury." The impact of the committee's abuses in this respect may for the moment affect only a vulnerable faction of the left; the issue itself is basic and the abuses easily extensible.

THE J. A. F. R. C. was convicted under a statute which makes it a misdemeanor for a witness before a Congressional inquiry to refuse "to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry." But what is the "question under inquiry" by the Un-American Activities Committee? Un-American activities. But what are un-American activities? "The law," the New York Times once said editorially, "defines crime against the state and persons committing such crimes as admittedly un-American. But is it un-American to hold an unpopular opinion or take an attitude that is also held or taken by the Communists? . . . Had he [Dies] pushed his opinion to a logical end, more than one-half of the population of the United States might have been denounced." The resolution creating the committee sets up no ascertainable standard of guilt; after ten years no one yet knows just what the committee considers "un-American."

* The Dennis affair was a less than exemplary demonstration in the dignity and decorum of free government. The Un-American Activities Committee scheduled public hearings last March on two bills to outlaw the Communist Party, but at first declined to hear Eugene Dennis, the general secretary. When Dennis finally won the right to appear, he was not allowed to testify against the bills and was put off the witness stand after a twenty-minute wrangle over why he had changed his paternal name, Waldron, to his mother's name, Dennis. Later the committee subpoenaed Dennis, but this time he refused to appear, challenged the legal authority of the committee, and was cited for contempt. The trial elicited the embarrassing information that J. Parnell Thomas, chairman of the committee, had also changed his name in early manhood, taking his mother's name of Thomas; the chairman was born J. Parnell Feeney. This, in Ireland, might well be considered subversive, though it was difficult to see the relevance of either change to an American Congressional inquiry.

A study in the April, 1947, issue of the Columbia Law Review points out that one threatening letter by Ernie Adamson, counsel to the committee, "intimates that harping on 'democracy' may be considered suspicious behavior." The vanished minority of the Dies committee which protested against the attack on the U. D. A. contended unsuccessfully for "the right of loyal American citizens to disagree politically with a majority of the Dies committee without being branded as subversive and un-American." The resolution as applied provides a dragnet for the punishment by public obloquy and contempt proceedings of anyone who holds opinions with which the committee disagrees. In such a context investigation becomes a new form of inquisition, and thus a committee of Congress may substantially, if obliquely, restrict fundamental liberties of thought and expression. "The harassing effect on political dissidents of an inquisition like that undertaken by the committee," says the Columbia Law Review, "has been noted. Patently, if it is well known that expressing novel political ideas and advocating certain types of change in government frequently subject individuals to burdensome investigation and disparaging publicity, many persons might . . . refrain from such activity. . . . Since the First Amendment protects against the infringement of the rights of free speech and press by executive, judicial, or legislative action, any attempt to curb these rights in the guise of a Congressional investigation may also be illegal."

THE purpose of legislative inquiry is to provide the knowledge essential to legislation. But an inquiry into political ideas can have only a limited expression in legislation without running athwart the Bill of Rights. The point is clear if transplanted to a less controversial sphere. Congress is forbidden by the Constitution to set up an established church or to interfere with religious freedom. Could a Congressional investigating committee summon Baptists, Jews, or Catholics before it for theological examination? Could it use the excuse of the international character of the Vatican to harass Roman Catholics in their religious activities? How far can Congress go in exercising the power of investigation in a field where the power of legislation is severely limited? Can Congress use the power of investigation to restrict fundamental liberties guaranteed by the Constitution? The only parallel in Anglo-American legal history to the Un-American Activities Committee is the "high commission" established under Queen Elizabeth to look into "all errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offenses, contempts, and enormities whatsoever." The difference is that the purpose of the high commission was to coerce conformity in theological doctrine with the established church of England; the Un-American Activities Committee can coerce conformity with anything a few untutored bigots may consider "Americanism."

Poland Today

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

III. Foreign and Domestic Politics

Warsaw, August

IF CZECH opinion, with its essentially "Western" slant, was upset by the government's refusal to go to the Paris conference on the Marshall plan, Poles received the news that Poland would not go with resignation or cynical amusement. A Warsaw taxi driver remarked to me: "When Daddy doesn't want to go, his son can't go either." Since then the government press has constantly stressed a single aspect of "Paris"—the top priority which the Americans, it alleges, wish to give to Germany. This has not been without effect on Polish opinion. There was also some malicious gratification among government supporters when they learned that the American Congress would not consider the Marshall plan for another six months. That Poland would welcome dollar credits nobody denies, and one of the points made by Mr. Modzelewski, the Foreign Minister, when I saw him, was that if the Americans had not for political reasons held up their $90,000,000 credit to Poland, Polish coal production would now be much higher.

Many of the principal members of the Polish government, including the Communists, were in fact anxious to go to Paris. But it is significant that both Foreign Minister Modzelewski and Prime Minister Cierankiewicz, when I saw them, expressed the hope that some new, more acceptable offer would yet be made. Both also were emphatic in declaring that they did not wish to see Europe split into two blocs. But at the same time Mr. Cierankiewicz insisted that it was vitally important for Poland to "keep in" with Russia—because of the danger of a German military revival—and that Western Europe must recognize this necessity. Indicating that the Slav bloc did not now exist except as a safeguard against German aggression, Mr. Cierankiewicz said: "We need the alliance with Russia not for today but for the time when Germany may become a danger to Poland again."

Germany may not be dangerous while the occupation lasts, but what will happen afterward? Our first consideration must be our alliance with our neighbors and," he added significantly, "also with France. We want the alliance with Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union to become a Polish political tradition. In America there is too much talk of a "preventive war"; we know that war is neither in Poland's nor in America's interest. . . . American politicians can afford to have a day-to-day foreign policy, but we are bound by geopolitical and historical factors to find a long-term policy which will safeguard Poland's will to live." In reply to my question the Prime Minister said that he did not believe Poland's independence was threatened by the Soviet Union. "There is no 'Russian penetration,'" he declared. "What is penetrating Poland is socialism—socialism of our making."

I asked the Prime Minister whether the Polish government had any ideas on what to do with the sixty or seventy million Germans living next door on a territory little larger than Poland. To this he replied that he hoped something concrete would at last emerge during the November meeting of the Foreign Ministers. From talks with other Polish leaders I gathered that one of the current ideas on the subject is that Germany should become essentially a manufacturing country, chiefly of consumer goods, and depend on imports for raw materials and cheap food; Poland would willingly exchange its agricultural produce for German manufactured goods. The fact that Germany would have to import most of its food would be a safeguard of security. Mr. Modzelewski said that Poland, which wished Europe as a whole to be restored, might produce a general plan.

Naturally the German menace, to which every Pole is highly responsive, is an ever-recurring theme in the press. At an open-air meeting at Olsztyn (Allenstein) in East Prussia I heard a Polish officer declare, amid applause, that Poland "would fight any country that employed German troops as its mercenaries."

IT IS interesting that the policy of the present government is to "bring all the Poles back," thus reversing the emigration policy of 1919-39. Mr. Modzelewski told me that 80,000 Poles had come back from Britain and the British zone of Germany, 15,000 from each area in May and June, and that inducements were being offered to Polish emigrants of long standing in Yugoslavia and Rumania and also to Polish miners in France and western Germany to come back. "The political conception of an émigré Poland has fallen through," Mr. Modzelewski said. The Poles from Britain, I was told, have become absorbed in the general population, and I might add from personal observation that although many, in principle, are still hostile to the government, they are impressed by the improved conditions in Poland—several recalled to me with a touch of anger the horror stories about Poland they had read in the émigré press in Britain.

While there have been some arrests lately, though not among the repatriates, not even diplomats highly critical of the Polish government claim that they have been numerous. In principle a charge must be preferred within three months of a person's arrest, and there must be a trial. There is no evidence of anyone having "disappeared." Many here argue that in the course of a revolution like Poland's some repression is inevitable, but that it is held to an "absolute minimum" and that there is "very much less of it than in the Pilsudski days."

Lately a number of priests have been arrested for "subversive activity," but though the government is in no doubt about the hostility of the church hierarchy, these arrests may be said to be the first of their kind. Despite an outward semblance of unanimity, the lower ranks of the clergy are in fact divided in their attitude to the government; many are genuinely impressed by Poland's progress in the last two years. The church also considers it to its material interest not to antagonize the government unduly, for its important estates of some 300,000 hectares have not been affected by the land reform. But generally the church is thought to be the government's most dangerous opponent, with a large influence among the peasantry. Last January the government proposed to the Vatican the resumption of diplomatic relations but has received no reply. Some satisfaction has been derived from the comments on the freedom of the Catholic church in Poland recently made by Cardinal Griffin on his return to England.

MANY of the Poles who have returned from England have been greatly reassured by the fact that the Russians are not in evidence at all. I have traveled all over Poland and have seen extremely few Russians except on their own communication lines to Germany. It is true that there are still many Russian officers in the Polish army, but this is largely due to the shortage of trained Polish personnel; after the First World War, one is reminded, French officers remained in the Polish army till 1928. The Russians in general are not liked, and the "Russian occupation" of 1944-45 has left some bad memories; discipline among some of the Russian troops, especially after victory, went to pieces completely. A growing number of Poles, however, are beginning to realize that it was the Russians, after all, who drove the Germans out of Poland, and the fact that "they did not stay on" is also put to their credit.

It would take too long to discuss the complex relationship existing between the four government parties, and especially between the Socialists and Communists. The Communists as the tougher and more coherent party tend to capture many of the key positions such as the governorships of the provinces, but without the support of the Socialists and trade unions they could not do much.

I shall confine myself for the present to quoting the statement Mr. Cirankiewicz, the Socialist Premier, made to me on the subject:

We are two parties, each with its own particular "dynamics," and there are therefore inevitable difficulties; but the Communists cannot rule without the Socialists, and since there is no other practicable government formula, we are going to stick together, and relations are bound to improve. This collaboration is important not only for Poland; it is important as an example for the whole of Europe.

Mr. Cirankiewicz made it plain that while he was all in favor of the united front he was opposed to the formation of a Unity Party. The Communist leader, Mr.

Gomulka, has been advocating such a party, though not as an immediate goal.

The Communists, despite a fairly large "bread-and-butter" membership, feel that they are "all bone and no flesh" and that a Unity Party would give them greater physical substance. But the majority of the Socialists will not hear of it for the present. In compensation they tend to condone the repression of the old-line Social Democrats who refuse to cooperate with the Communists at any price, and who frequently display a dangerous sympathy with the right. The coming trial of twenty-three such Socialists should be revealing.

[The fourth article of Mr. Werth's series will discuss the new lands Poland has acquired from Germany.]

The Death of Lyuh Woon-Hyung

BY HUGH DEANE

Seoul, Korea, August

IN A dispatch from Seoul reporting the assassination on July 19 of Lyuh Woon-Hyung, the outstanding liberal leader in South Korea, the New York Times hinted that perhaps the crime was committed by the Communists, from whose clutches Lyuh was trying to escape. On July 23 the police arrested a nineteen-year-old youth—captured in three different places according to three different police announcements—and a high police official declared that the alleged assassin "had been sent from North Korea." But almost nobody here, except of course the extreme rightists led by Rhee Syngman and Kim Koo, professes to believe that Lyuh was killed by Communists, northern or southern.

Not even the Americans, whose misinformation about South Korea is a main prop of the right, really believe it. A fair indication was General John R. Hodge's statement—read by a lieutenant—at Lyuh's funeral on August 3 that the "implications and motivations . . . are still unsolved." The Americans are rarely clear about the actions and intentions of the right; they are usually coldly certain about the malevolence of the left.

To most of the thousands of people standing in the hot sun in Seoul Stadium on August 3 the implications of Lyuh's assassination were much clearer than they were to General Hodge. Lyuh had been struck down while trying to build a broad political front to oppose the extreme right, which was using every method, including terror, to disrupt the Soviet-American negotiations and to establish a separate government in South Korea. Lyuh's discussions with Kim Kiu-sic and other leaders of the moderate right were watched with some misgivings by the left, which feared that the price of an agreement might be its isolation; they were watched with dismay and violent hatred by the anti-trusteeship right, which regarded centrists, moderate rightists, and even the Americans as tools of the reds. Kim Kiu-sic, like Lyuh, was called a national traitor and threatened with the "hammer of justice."

To believe that Lyuh was killed by the left was like believing that the German Communists had set fire to the Reichstag. Lyuh's younger brother, Lyuh Woon-hong, who heads the small, middle-of-the-road Social Democratic Party, was asked bluntly by this writer whether he thought the leftists or the rightists were guilty. Lyuh Woon-hong broke with his more illustrious brother last fall, charging that the latter was being led by the nose by the Communists, and presumably has no love for the left. He replied: "Absolutely, without hesitation, I say the rightists."

A few days after Lyuh was killed it seemed for a moment that he might achieve in death what he had sought while alive. A National Salvation Committee, embracing the left, the center, and part of the moderate right, was born in the first hot abhorrence of the act of terrorism. The police, acting with alacrity, outlawed it on the grounds that it had not registered and that it would "agitate the people" and provoke terrorism. (A left-wing intellectual commented bitterly, "Are people who carry watches to blame for pickpocketing?")

If Lyuh was killed by the right, he was buried by the left. For a fortnight his body lay in state in the headquarters of the Laboring People's Party, which Lyuh established last May. Tens of thousands of people came to stand before the casket, paying their last respects: white-clad women chanting and wailing, intellectuals, students, workers, and farmers. Democratic organizations from all over South Korea wrote messages on the walls in blood, pledging to continue the struggle for the people's republic, condemning the terror, echoing the fervent hope expressed by Lyuh in his last radio address that the Joint Commission would reach an agreement.

HUGH DEANE is Far Eastern correspondent for the Allied Labor News.

August 3, the day of the funeral, was one of the most peaceful days of the summer. Police, on foot, mounted, and in jeeps, were stationed every fifty feet along the two-mile route to Seoul Stadium, but they had little to do. Except for a few young men caught singing leftist songs, which were prohibited for the day, no one was arrested; the terrorists in Seoul took a holiday. The long procession moved gravely between the lines of white-clad, silently watching people.

The police sought to minimize the significance of the funeral. They prohibited the closing of stores, the suspension of music and dancing, and the hoisting of mourning flags "as would befit the death of the highest administrator." They banned the display of political slogans and party flags, save the flags of Lyuh's own party. But they could not ban politics. The solid ranks of the People's Democratic Front were a plain political statement. For the few hours of the service the left, the small center, and the moderate right stood united, as Lyuh would have wished. The extreme right did not participate. The Independence Party, headed by Kim Koo, who is popularly regarded as the chief of the hatchet men, disdained to offer even perfunctory regrets. A number of leaders of Rhee's Democratic Party, politer ally of Kim Koo's group, sent a thousand yen each to the funeral committee—which the committee refused to accept.

LYUH has a secure place in the history of Korea's struggle for independence. In 1919 he joined the provisional government-in-exile in Shanghai. In the early twenties he went twice to Moscow and talked with Lenin; he is said to have played a part in bringing about the entente between Sun Yat-sen and the Soviets. He later broke with the conservative provisional government and worked with the leftists. In 1929 he was seized by the Japanese consular police in Shanghai and taken back to Korea; he never again left Korea. After getting out of prison in 1933 he became president of the Korean-language Central Daily News and an active sponsor of Korean athletics, which he regarded as indirect resistance to Japanization.

In 1943 Lyuh saw what was happening and plunged into illegal politics. In August, 1944, he organized the underground Emancipation League, with branches in Manchuria and China and contact with Koreans in Yenan. After the liberation this group, with the released political prisoners, led the almost magical upsurge of the People's Republic movement.

For the first month or so after the liberation Lyuh was the unchallenged leader in South Korea. He was the de facto head of the People's Republic; even part of the right, momentarily frightened, yielded to him, and for a time it seemed that he would establish himself as the Korean Sun Yat-sen. When the Americans came in, they broke him, insultingly, clumsily, but effectively. Few Koreans have forgotten a fatuous statement by General A. V. Arnold, military governor, on October 10, 1945, in which he implied that Lyuh and other leaders of the People's Republic were "foolish or venal men."

Thereafter Lyuh was never quite sure of himself. He kept thinking that perhaps the errors of the Americans were due to misinformation, that perhaps the United States was really interested in democratizing South Korea, that perhaps with patience he could influence American policy. He veered away from the left. When last December the majority of his People's Party, together with the Communist Party and the New People's Party, formed the Labor Party, Lyuh refused to go along, charging Communist domination. In May he joined a number of ex-Communists and others in forming the Laboring People's Party.

Yet at every crisis Lyuh stood with the left against the extreme right. He refused General Hodge's appointment to the Democratic Council, which was packed with rightists; he refused to be a minority figurehead in an abortive "political unification" committee selected by Rhee Syngman. He abstained from the phony elections of last November; he never had any dealings with the anti-trusteeship crowd. To his death he remained on the praesidium of the People's Democratic Front, though it was dominated by the Labor Party. So weak was the center, so compelling was the pull to the left, that even his Laboring People's Party, designed as a non-Communist organ, began negotiations to enter the People's Front shortly after it was formed.

Already some people are saying that Lyuh, like Sun Yat-sen, died at the right time. Lyuh was a man of the middle class, temperamentally a moderate, and it was hard for him to see his friends going to the right or left. Faced with the same choice himself, Lyuh sometimes leaned one way, sometimes the other, not because he was an opportunist but because his only principles were broad ones and because he was a peace-loving man with a catholic capacity for friendship. Noryuk Ilmin (Toiling People), organ of the Labor Party, wrote of Lyuh's death, "The tragedy of Lyuh is the tragedy of the people." Much can be read into this. Lyuh's personal tragedy was that he was a moderate in a society in which what little center existed is melting away.

Del Vayo—Europe Is Skeptical

Paris, August 27

THE United States is already more or less aware of Europe's growing skepticism about the Marshall plan. But it is here in Paris that one realizes how grave are the doubts of its success. "That Marshall plan is a good idea," most people say. And they say it in the same melancholy tone they use to discuss the plan for world government now under consideration "somewhere in Europe" at a congress that has aroused the interest of no one except the delegates themselves. The immediate reason for this skepticism is the contradiction between the urgency of preparing for a winter so critical that people dare not even think about it and the slowness with which the idea behind the Harvard speech is being translated into action.

For Europeans, American aid held the attraction of speed; they had a deep faith in the dynamism and aggressiveness of the United States, in its ability to accomplish quickly anything it set out to do. Now comes the news that Congressional approval is not expected before next February—which means that at best the Marshall plan will not begin to show results until several months after that date. Unfamiliar with American politics and the peculiar relations between the White House and Congress, the people of Europe are shocked by what to them is an inexplicable delay and are beginning to say, "By then we shall either have starved to death or found a solution among ourselves."

And with that disillusionment has come the growing suspicion that American credits will prove no universal panacea. Last week's agreement ending the conversion of British sterling into dollars had an electrifying effect on French opinion, which is quick to grasp the significance of international events, and it will also have repercussions in the other countries of Europe. The inability of American capitalism to establish a healthy, stable equilibrium of world exchange and commerce, together with the slowness of American aid, has shattered European confidence in the magical restorative powers of the dollar.

There are other reasons for skepticism which have existed since the Marshall plan was first formulated and which I discussed on this page some weeks ago. Perhaps the decisive one is that a Europe split into blocs cannot be reconstructed. The division conceived by partisans of a new cordon sanitaire against Russia can serve the politics of war, not those of peace.

East and West complement each other, and need each other. This was true before World War II; it is even more true today when European industry has in large part been destroyed, when England and France have lost most of their foreign markets, when France has reduced its daily bread ration to 200 grams per person, and when lack of coal is the great obstacle to the rebuilding of Western Europe.

France, for example, is more interested in obtaining coal from Poland now than in all the long-term-credit aid it may receive when the Marshall plan eventually goes into effect. The reception accorded Hilary Minc, Polish Minister of Industry and Commerce, who arrived in Paris a few weeks ago to negotiate a new Franco-Polish commercial agreement, shows that France is far from considering itself part of an exclusive Western bloc. Polish coal output in 1938 was only 30,000,000 tons; by 1949 it will have reached the impressive figure of 80,000,000 tons a year. In increased trade with Poland, France sees a partial solution for the coal-hunger of its industry, one that may release M. Bidault from the necessity of accepting a decision on the Ruhr that goes contrary to the French conception of national security. Anxiety about future security has cropped up time and again in the discussions of the past month; Hervé Alphand, French delegate to the three-power conference which opened in London on August 22, is reported to have said to a closed session: "Never again do we want our mineral shipments to Germany to come back to us in the form of shells and rocket planes." This anxiety is aggravated by the fear that all the fascist forces possible of regeneration will be used to implement an anti-Russian policy based on Germany; Albert Bayet, president of the French Press Association, recently observed, "Between fascism maintained in Spain and magnates reinstalled in the Ruhr, France will not be able to breathe in peace."

But it is not France alone, with its problem—or what some call its obsession—of security, that is involved. One after another the countries of Europe, realizing that their national interests are incompatible with the policy of blocs, are directly negotiating bilateral accords between East and West. Today reliable London sources report that new feelers may soon go out to Moscow in the hope that Britain may receive 500,000 tons of badly needed grain this year; Russia would be glad to have British machinery and seems ready to promise early grain deliveries. All the Western countries are seeking to conclude trade agreements with Czechoslovakia, whose economic recovery continues to amaze those who have visited it. In short, the European nations are convinced that they must hang together or assuredly they will hang separately. That is why, despite the strong current of opinion which favors risking everything in a test of strength against Russia, the immense majority still hope that the principle of peaceful collaboration will be reestablished.

No one here is foolish enough to believe in the possibility of a return to the entente that existed before San Francisco; on the other hand, no responsible person with whom I have talked is ready to concede the absolute impossibility of reaching an agreement that will end the present tensions.

In general it is thought that at some moment or other relations between the United States and Russia—for this is the key—will reach the point where the only alternative is war or negotiation. And because most people simply cannot conceive of another war, they feel that the two countries will begin to negotiate. That will be the moment to utilize the constructive aspects of the Marshall plan and to integrate them into a serious effort for the reconstruction of a united Europe.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Shabby Goetterdaemmerung
NUREMBERG DIARY. By G. M. Gilbert. Farrar, Straus and Company. $5.

AS "PRISON psychologist" Dr. G. M. Gilbert was given free access to the prisoners on trial at Nürnberg, and this book is the informal record of his observations. The accused were evidently glad to chat with a man who was neither a lawyer, a jailer, nor a journalist. They were delighted to find at last an American who could understand their language: the scarcity of German-speaking officers in the American army is one of the minor mysteries of the war. Dr. Gilbert seems to have struck the right attitude—human, but not effusively friendly. Although he was a mere captain, the prisoners respected him as a Fachmann; they even played with alacrity his little game of psychological tests. The report, although edited, does not seem to have been doctored. Untechnical, unofficial, vivid but not lurid, it inspires confidence.

The strongest impression we receive from these pages is that the Nazi gang was not homogeneous. Göring tried to impose upon his associates a single line of defense—a defiant blustering attitude which might, in a surprisingly short time, have revived the Nazi legend. But they all hated and despised "the Fat One," and went their own way. The military glared scorn at the politicians, who glared more fiercely still in return. The opportunists of the old school, Schacht and von Papen, poured contempt on the upstart and crude Nazis—whom they once had praised and served. Everybody shunned Streicher as a skunk. Hess was a grotesque and tragic figure, never able to remember for long whether his amnesia was faked or genuine. They had lived through glorious and dramatic hours; they had wielded unlimited power; yet all of them were average clever men who in normal days would have been decently successful in humdrum occupations. The Nürnberg trial was a Hamlet drama played without the prince. But the composite picture of Hitler we get from his henchmen is not that of a genius or hero. There was a legend of the Last Girondists, fostered by Larmartine; no legend of the Last Nazis would survive the Nürnberg report. Their Goetterdaemmerung was shabby.

Göring, at any rate, had substance and color. But cross-examination, and the concurrent opinion of his fellow party members, made it plain that the Fat Knight was a phony. He had two lines of reasoning which were incompatible. One was the highest idealism, deutsche Treue, personal loyalty to a liege, right or wrong, through good fortune or bad. From these Wagnerian heights Göring tumbled down to the most cynical realism. He spoke at times with almost as harsh a voice as Professor William L. Langer. "Democracy, justice, humanity? All hypocritical nonsense. There is nothing solid in this world but the coarsest immediate interests; and for these, in spite of all dogooders, men will keep fighting world without end. "Of course," Göring adds wisely, "not the common people: there is nothing in it for them. But under whatever regime it is the leaders of a country who determine the policy."

Göring thus tried to shape his own figure in history: a bluff professional soldier, of a good family, with the strictest code of his caste; a German patriot to the end; above all, a pattern of old Germanic loyalty. His companions shrugged at his heroic pose. They knew that the Odinic fighter was a profiteer on the grandest scale, fond of a soft life and of vulgar luxuries, a dope addict and a moral coward. The Wagnerian trappings would not fit. In private conversation Göring assumed the tone of a Kiplingesque sergeant. His thoughts, in the various lines he chose, were rudimentary. Yet he had some skills. Next to Schacht and Seyss-Inquart, he had the highest I. Q. of the band—138—a superior man, a near-genius. But Gilbert is sensible enough to have little faith in I. Q.'s. "The day-to-day record of the conversations and reactions of the Nazi leaders proved to be more revealing than the sum of all the tests could be." Are psychologists learning wisdom at last?

The high point in the report is the testimony of Colonel Rudolf Hoess, commandant of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, who calmly explained how he had performed the incredible feat of exterminating two and a half million people in three years. Hoess's defense was perfectly simple: Orders are orders; his not to reason why. "From our entire training the thought of refusing an order just didn't enter our heads. . . . Guess you cannot understand our world." Brought up strictly, in an austere Catholic family, he had transferred from the church to the Nazi hierarchy the principle of passive obedience, perinde ac cadaver.

Hoess's factual report and a film of atrocities seem to have struck the Nazi leaders with genuine bewilderment. They swore they did not know. This strains credibility: yet how few people, even in high stations, knew of our atomic secret? The underlings, like Hoess himself, obeyed without question; those who had ordered, Hitler and Himmler, were dead. On an enormously larger scale it is the same story as in the First World War. The leaders sternly preach Schrecklichkeit: no humanitarian nonsense about them. But when terroristic methods are actually applied, the tough supermen turn soft and swear they meant nothing of the kind: "You know us! We Germans are cultured and Christian gentlemen!"

Only Hans Frank, Governor General of Poland, drew the full consequence from these revelations. He had experienced a religious conversion; he had abjured his criminal errors; now he accepted, and almost welcomed, full responsibility for them. But his Dostoevski attitude, self-abjection, abysmal repentance, flights into mysticism, struck Dr. Gilbert as somewhat hysterical.

All the Nazi leaders, except perhaps Streicher, confessed that before the end they had realized the monstrous imbecility of the whole scheme. Yet they kept serving what they knew to be moronic fanaticism. Blame them we can, and must: not, however, without a homeward look. When war is declared, patriotism commands passive

AMERICA'S "THOUGHT POLICE" ARE ON THE PROWL!

You know who these "thought police" are:
J. Parnell Thomas, John Rankin, and others of the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

DON'T SEE!

Already they're shut up many liberal radio commentators. They're forcing Hollywood to picture life their way. They have threatened government workers and others to stop Wallace rallies. They have interfered in elections and union affairs. They have fought everyone but fascists to get at you.

DON'T LISTEN!

Stop them now, while you still can. You can't reason with them; you can't talk to them; there's no shelter from them. There's only one way—ABOLISH THEM.

DON'T SPEAK!

THE CIVIL RIGHTS CONGRESS CAN DO THIS JOB WITH YOUR HELP. As a basic safeguard for the rights of all Americans, the Civil Rights Congress has undertaken the legal defense of many of the victims, charged with contempt of the Thomas-Rankin Committee.

What Is Your Liberty Worth to You?

The "Un-American" Committee spends taxpayers' money to do its job. CRC must depend on voluntary contributions to defend American liberties. At least $150,000 is needed, fast, to pay legal action costs for Thomas-Rankin victims and to combat the "thought police" propaganda.

CIVIL RIGHTS CONGRESS

205 East 42nd St., New York 17, N. Y.

Your contribution today is insurance for freedom from the "thought police" tomorrow.

CIVIL RIGHTS CONGRESS

NA-1

205 East 42nd Street, New York 17, N. Y.

☐ Enclosed is my contribution of to help in the campaign to abolish the Thomas-Rankin Un-American Activities Committee.

☐ Let me know how else I can help in my community to further the campaign of CRC.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... Zone.....

Please make checks payable to RAYMOND C. INGERSOLL, Treasurer

obedience: even Niemöller offered to kill for the greater glory of Hitler. There was no lawful way of removing Hitler, any more than Darlan—or today Franco. But it is not easy for a man, especially for an officer, to decide that he should murder his commander-in-chief. The Jews were in Germany what the Communists are with us today: the enemies of mankind. "Here, but for the grace of God, goes John Doe." Hans did not want to be "purged" as disloyal; neither does John. John too has a career to make, a family to support; martyrdom is a sorry trade, especially if you have to suffer for the sake of people you don't like. I have faith in the common sense of the Common Man; I never believed in his mental courage.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Baudelaire and Others

ONE HUNDRED POEMS FROM LES FLEURS DU MAL. By Charles Baudelaire. Translated by C. F. MacIntyre. University of California Press. $5.

BAUDELAIRE, RIMBAUD, VERLAINE (Selected Verse and Prose Poems). Edited, with an Introduction, by Joseph M. Bernstein. The Citadel Press. $3.

MR. MACINTYRE worked very hard at his volume of translations, and Mr. Bernstein did hardly any work at all, merely reprinting by permission of different copyright holders; yet Mr. Bernstein's is the better book.

In order to justify the task he set himself—an almost complete translation of Baudelaire—Mr. MacIntyre is forced to insist on something which no one has yet been able to prove: the architectural structure of "Les Fleurs du Mal"; incapable of making a perfect translation of a single poem, he strategically spreads out his mediocrity over the whole. It may be valuable, for the sake of completeness, to include piece after piece like "Le-Soleil"; Baudelaire often made the mistake of writing verse about poetry.

He was terribly frightened, filled with panic, knowing himself the only one of his time with the terrible gift of seeing reality after the fashion of primitive man—he called it the "sense of correspondences"—and the only one capable of using language as it had been used thousands of years ago by the early priest-poets who controlled the god through incantation, through sounds produced by the things deeply hidden in man's mind, having nothing to do with the harmony of the syllogism and giving to words their own reality, only scarcely connected with the objects they represent. It is Rimbaud who gave us the exact truth about Baudelaire: "But since to inspect the Invisible and to hear the Unheard is something else than recapturing the spirit of dead things, Baudelaire is the first seer, king of poets, a real god. Nevertheless, he lived in too artistic surroundings, and the form for which he is so praised is paltry. Inventions of the Unknown require new forms." However, in the great poems like "Un Voyage à Cythère" some amazing explosions occur precisely because new wine is poured into old bottles. Not that the reader would ever gather this from reading Mr. MacIntyre's translations, which are flat and pompous, and cheat all over the place.

To prove this I have a flock of notes which I am herding into the wastebasket; a few examples should be enough. "J'aime le souvenir de ces époques nues, Dont Phoebus se plaisait à dorer les statues" means, simply enough: "I like remembering that naked time whose statues Phoebus delighted in gilding," and not, because Mr. MacIntyre wants to rime with gold: "I love to think of epochs naked and old, Statues smiling Phoebus touched with gold," where the word old is the very contrary of the intent of the whole poem, which has to do with the youth of the race in contrast with what Baudelaire considers the effeteness and decadence of our time. In "Recueillement," one of the perfect sonnets, whose setting is Paris and the river Seine, "smiling Regret arises from the deep," because the next line ends in sleeps, but deep can only refer to the sea and fails to make sense or even a decent prose gloss to the original. As he tells us in his preface, "This effect cannot be rendered by the clever alternating of pat feminine with masculine rhymes. Nor can its disturbing, haunting quality be imitated by coyly seductive strip-tease effects, Victorian half-evasions, or explanatory padding—often in search of rhymes." Nor by Mr. MacIntyre, who here conveniently has classified his own deficiencies. "Played without falsehood, without anxiety," if it doesn't strip-tease, more than half-evades meaning when it tries to translate "Jouissaient sans mensonge et sans anxiété," where jouissaient in this context means coitus and has nothing to do with Friedrich Froebel. I have read MacIntyre carefully, and in the last two months have gone back to his book in different moods to be sure I was being fair to him. He has worked so hard that it is sad to find his labor of no value. He is oddly inept. How can one write—as he does in his preface, seeming to think it necessary to praise one great poet by damning another: "Rimbaud, by his sensationalism, sold damaged goods to the Dadaists, the Gagaists (!), and the Surrealists"; and, "One can only regret that French literature, in this final stage of décadence, should have forgotten its old love for the lucid and the logical and have preferred to follow the crazed meanderings of a precocious boy rather than the serene classicism of Baudelaire's legitimate heirs"?

The most interesting part of the book consists of sixty-three pages of finely printed notes, translated and rewritten from the standard Crépet and Dantec editions, and interspersed with anecdotes and cute personal remarks ("I am not very pleased with my version of this poem") and an athletic Harris-tweed donnishness mixed with low wit: "Lot, whom wine made both careless and enterprising . . ."; "This brother-sister business, used so often in the book, fuddles up the later poets, too, notably Verlaine. . . ." Mr. MacIntyre's imposing bibliography omits René Laforgue's indispensable study of Baudelaire, and a reading of it might jolt him out of a priggishly purient adolescence which threatens to become static.

Mr. Bernstein's "Baudelaire, Rimbaud, Verlaine" has a good many fine translations, though the worth-while editorial job would have been to gather the best individual translations of individual poems. What is the good of having the uniformity of Arthur Symons's poetic style when it is uniformly bad. On the other hand, Symons's rendering of Baudelaire's Prose Poems is excellent. Gertrude

HERE ARE THE LATEST AND BEST BOOKS ON SEXOLOGY

Here is the greatest library of Sex Books ever written. False modesty is forgotten and the most important facts of life are made plain. Learn the laws of sex and life by reading these books, which are written for young men and women, fathers and mothers—not for children.

Go through the list now, pick out the ones you want, and rush your order. Just send us the amount stated below and you'll get your books, carriage charges prepaid.

CONFESSIONS

Book of Amazing Confessions. 75¢
Confessions of a Ghost-Writer. 25¢
Confessions of a Bachelor. 25¢
Confessions of an Ex-Altar Boy. 35¢

HEALTH

The Case for Voluntary Euthanasia. Arguments in favor of merciful release from incurable suffering. Wolbarst. 35¢
What Can a Sick Person Believe? What is valid in new medical magic. Cauldwell. 25¢
500 Medical Terms Explained. 25¢
Truth About Narcotic Drugs. How to avoid being a dope fiend. Shackelford. 25¢
Your Body and its Functions. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
What Vitamins and Diet Do for You. McCabe. 25¢
Our Wonderful Glands. Jos. McCabe. 25¢
Human Body, and How it Works. McCabe. 25¢

MARRIAGE AND COURTSHIP

Do You Want to Save Your Marriage? Answers to plain-the-heart questions about marriage. Cauldwell. 35¢
Psychology of Harmonious Marriage. Guide to husbands, wives, sweethearts and lovers. Cauldwell. 35¢
Vindication of the Rights of Women (Condensed). Mary Wolstenclraft. 25¢
Husbands and Wives Can Be Satisfactory Lovers. Ethics of marriage how to get along. Cauldwell. 35¢
Feminine Hygiene in Marriage. Illustrated. Informative. E. A. Niemoeller. $1.50.
The Encyclopaedia of Birth Control. With comments by E. Haldeman-Julius. 25¢
Rhythm Method of Birth Control. McCabe. 25¢
Marriage and Courtship Customs among Primitive. John B. Burma. P.H.D. 25¢
Funny Side of Divorce. Ridiculous reasons presented as gospel. Niemoeller. 25¢
Strange Customs of Human Race. Survey of sexual and other forms of behavior. Barrett. 25¢
Before the Honey-moon Begins. The groom's dilemma—his bride a virgin? The bride's perplexity—will he know? A book about the hymen, and strains in both sexes. Dr. O. O. Cauldwell. 35¢
Woman and Marriage. Jos. McCabe. 35¢

PROSTITUTION

Business Side of World's Oldest Business. Organization, management, and earnings of prostitution. Niemoeller. 35¢
Sexual Slavery in America. A history of illicit sex relations (including prostitution and white slavery) in Colonial times, in the Slave South, and in Modern Times. A. F. Niemoeller. 35¢
Fleshpots of Antiquity. Lives and loves of ancient courtesans. Henry Friest. $1.50.
The World's Oldest Profession. History of Prostitution. Jos. McCabe. 75¢

PSYCHO-ANALYSIS & PSYCHIATRY

Sexual Problems and Their Psychology. Sociological method of solving perplexing questions and answers, and glossary. Cauldwell. 35¢
Studies in Psychosexuality. Revealing, strange and unusual sex complexes, revealed. McCabe. Cauldwell. 35¢
Sexual Perversions as a Scientific Problem. Wolbarst. 35¢
Sexual Fear Fixation—What to Do About It. How to banish personal fears and thus overcome their damaging effects. Cauldwell. 35¢
Should You Be a Eunuch? Treatment possibilities for those who feel too keenly the emotional strains of living. Dr. O. O. Cauldwell. 35¢
Practical Psychiatry for Everyone. How to be your own mind doctor and solve mental problems for yourself and others. Dr. O. O. Cauldwell. 35¢
Art of Thinking. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
How You Can Become a Practical Psychoanalyst. Applications of Freud and others made easy. Principles you can use in business and in life. Cauldwell. 35¢
All About Psycho-Analysis. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
Mystical Mysteries of the Mind. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
Easy Lessons in Practical Psychoanalysis. Amateurs who want to understand themselves better and thereby be happier. Cauldwell. 35¢
So You Worried an Alcoholic! Facts about alcoholics, Neurosis and Neurotics. Cauldwell. 35¢
Inferiority Complex Explained. Jos. McCabe. 75¢
What Makes the Neurotic Personality Behave That Way? Reactions to the strain of modern living. Cauldwell. 35¢
Schizophrenia and Mental Danger Signs. What do you do when schizophrenic tendencies—a study of behavior. Cauldwell. 35¢

SEX

Dogging Fathers—Psychological and Biological Pervinity. Can science prove who is whose father? Dr. O. O. Cauldwell. M.D. 35¢
Sex and Smell. Sexual aphrodisiacs, or the part played by odors in sexual attraction and stimulation. Niemoeller. 35¢
What Should Be Taught About Sex? McCabe. 35¢
Panorama of Life. Dr. Guedes. 75¢
Women and the Creative Urge. McCabe. 35¢
What is "Mystery" of Woman? McCabe. 35¢
Key to Love and Sex. On questions of the sexual life. Eight volumes. McCabe. $2.35.
Three Books in One. Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes. 50¢
Contains: (1) Lusts of Sex; (2) Beginnings of Modern Civilization; (3) How Power of Catholicism Was Undetermined.
Same for Sale. All about artificial insemination—how it's done. Test-tube babies—latest facts. Husbands for hire. Fathers by proxy. Cauldwell. 35¢
When Sex Books. Seven sections. Fascinating information. Phases of sex. 75¢

SEX, ABNORMAL ASPECTS OF

Why Sex Offenders Act That Way. Psychiatry shows that sex delinquents are not sick people. Cauldwell. 35¢
The Truth About Homosexuality in Man and Woman. Facts clearly presented to help improve individual and sociological concepts. Carroll. 35¢
Essays of an Erotologist. Some observations on little discussed aspects of sex. Niemoeller. 35¢
Sex Crimes and Sex Crimes. A study of various delinquencies. Dr. O. O. Cauldwell. 35¢
Perverse Haters of Sex. There are persons who hate sex walking along in every day. A candid study of a strange perversion. Cauldwell. 35¢

Why Males Wear Female Attire. Strange stories, weird confessions, historical data, and scientific explanations of transvestism. Dr. O. O. Cauldwell. 35¢
Bestiality in Ancient and Modern Times. A study of the sexual relations of man and animals in all times and countries. A. F. Niemoeller. 35¢
Bestiality and the Law. Punishment for bestiality with typical cases from 15th century to present. Niemoeller. 35¢
Antagonism Between the Sexes. Niemoeller. 35¢
Women Who Became Men. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
Abnormal Aspects of Sex. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
Artificial Impregnation. History and methods of conception without cohabitation. Niemoeller. 35¢
What is a Hermaphrodite? Persons of either sex whose genital organs embrace characteristics of both sexes. Cauldwell. 35¢

SEX CLASSICS

De Sade on Virtue and Vice. Selections from writings of Marquis De Sade (after whom practice of Sadism was named). 35¢
The Secret Laws of Sex. El Kitab, or the Khodja Omer Haleby—An Arabic scholar's interpretation of Koranic law as it pertains to sexual relations. 35¢
The Coming of Age. A study on problems of homosexuality. Edward Carpenter. 75¢
Bending—its Origin, Progress and Decline in America. Heretofore Hard Study in sexual morality. Introduction by Niemoeller. 75¢

SEXUAL DISEASES

Prostate Gland Diseases and Treatment. Cauldwell. 35¢
The Latest So-Called Miracle Cure for Venereal Diseases. Facts about penicillin, facts about syphilis, its complications and treatment. Cauldwell. 35¢
The Latest So-Called Miracle Cures for Gonorrhea. The Salvarsan and Penicillin Miracle Drugs? Is Prophylaxis Effective? Dr. O. O. Cauldwell. 35¢
How Campaign Against Venereal Diseases Failed. How moralists and social hygiene reformers missed up situation because of unscientific approach. Wolbarst. 35¢
The Psychology of Psycho-Somatic Medicine to sexuality and sexual disorders. Cauldwell. 35¢
Dr. Treatment of Impotence in Man and Woman. Kinds of impotence in both sexes; treatment of frigidity in woman; the psychology of impotence. Cauldwell. 35¢
Sterility in Men and Women. A study of causes and treatment possibilities for those who are denied parenthood. Cauldwell. 35¢
The Red Plague. Every phase of syphilis. 35¢
Facts About Venereal Diseases. Harding. 35¢

SEXUAL HEALTH

What We Know About Penicillin and Streptomycin. How the new drugs are used in venereal and other diseases. Wolbarst. 35¢
The Relation of the Endocrines and Heredity to Development and Intelligence. Facts concerning stature of mind and body; some diseases of the endocrine glands. Cauldwell. 35¢
What We Know About Sperm—The Seed of Fertility. Dr. A. L. Wolbarst. 35¢
Universal Circumcision As a Hygienic Measure. From primitive days to present. Wolbarst. 35¢
Is Sexual Sterilization Easy? Facts about sterilization. Including legal status. Cauldwell. 35¢
What Women Should Know About the Menopause. The prevention of suffering through an understanding of the hygiene of life's natural changes. Carver. 35¢
Effects of Castration on Men and Women. Accidental, voluntary and involuntary castration. Eunuchism. Dr. O. O. Cauldwell. 35¢
Hypersexuality—Is Anyone Oversexed? Physiologists, psychiatrists, and sociologists on precocious sexuality and nymphomania. Cauldwell. 35¢
What to Know and Do About the Male Climacteric. Advice which can help to keep men from going off the down hill, including a generous citation of answer section. Cauldwell. 35¢
Sex Problems in Modern Civilization. Yarrow. 75¢
Aphrodisiacs and Anti-Aphrodisiacs. What science has learned about increasing average man's capacity for fuller sex life. 60¢
Sexual Life of Man, Woman, Gaidberg. 55¢
Quest for Sexual Happiness. Jos. McCabe. 35¢

SEXUAL MORALS

Problem of Unwed Fathers. With sidelights on unmarried mothers and illegitimate children. Cauldwell. 35¢
When Are Girls Promiscuous? Life's physiology, for the virgin and her sister, with questions and answers. Cauldwell. 35¢
Charity Safeguards. Mechanical means of preventing sexual indulgence, in both men and women, employed in different times and countries. McCabe. 35¢
A Young Man's Morals. H. L. Cribb. 25¢
Why Eat Morals? How to decide what is right and what is wrong without invoking a supernatural law-giver. L. H. Layton. 25¢
Morals in the Renaissance. Jos. McCabe. 50¢
Morals in Medieval Europe. Jos. McCabe. 50¢
Morals of the Savage. Jos. McCabe. 50¢
Morals of the Ancient World. Jos. McCabe. 50¢
Morals Among Greeks and Romans. McCabe. 50¢
Morals in Arab-Persian Civilization. Jos. McCabe. 50¢
Moral Life of China and India. Jos. McCabe. 50¢
Life in Europe in Later Middle Ages. Jos. McCabe. 50¢
Human Morality. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
Morality in 19th Century. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
Life Modern Analysis of Biblical Sex Scandals. Cauldwell. 25¢
Changing Morals of Today. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
Effect of the Reformation on Morals. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
A History of Sexual Morals. 12 vols. A complete study of the moral laws and practices of man, medieval, modern, 300,000 words. Jos. McCabe. $3.80.
Phallic Ancient Civilization and Cult of Love. Jos. McCabe. 35¢
What Sex Really Is. Jos. McCabe. 35¢

SPECIAL PRICE FOR ENTIRE SET

If you were to order all titles listed on this page in small quantities they would cost you $51.65, but if you order the complete list we will allow you the special bargain price of $46.65—prepaid.

HALDEMAN-JULIUS PUBLICATIONS • Box 1923 • Girard, Kansas

D-day set for finish fight against 11,000,000
Americans!

Drive to Curb
Co-operatives
Slated in House

Small Business Committee to Open Hearing Aug. 15;

New book alerts public to attack

Powerful forces are girded for a showdown fight against the economic strength of 11,000,000 members of co-operatives in the United States. The continued spectacular growth of the movement is said to be a subversive threat to the American system of free enterprise. In this book of the hour the outstanding authority on co-operatives presents a threefold challenge to consumers, producers and monopolists and tells what the real issues are, what the real stakes are, and how co-operatives can capitalize on their unprecedented opportunity for expansion.

The CO-OPERATIVE CHALLENGE

by Bertram B. Fowler

$2.75 at all bookstores

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY BOSTON

Hall's versions of Verlaine do not include his great poems (guess why!), and for the reader wholly devoid of French it is hard to tell whether Miss Hall or Verlaine is bad.

The really wonderful surprise in Bernstein's book is J. Norman Cameron's translations of Rimbaud's verse poems; Cameron rhymes, incredibly keeps twelve syllables to the Alexandrine line without padding, and at any rate brings Rimbaud as close to English as seems possible. The satisfaction you have in reading Cameron is that of coming across a great new poet in English.

RENE BLANC-ROOS

Hawks and Acorns

FOOTNOTES ON NATURE. By John Kieran. With Wood Engravings by Nora S. Unwin. Doubleday and Company. $3.

DURING his heyday on the Times Mr. Kieran was not the only sports writer who could quote Tennyson and Shakespeare. As a matter of fact, poetry was rather a weakness of the tribe, as in the case, for instance, of the late Grantland Rice. But Mr. Kieran certainly was the only one who ever looked for an unusual sort of acorn during a Worlds Series or could tell one kind of warbler from another even without his binoculars. In a word, he not only knew a hawk from a handsaw but also one species of hawk from another. The present book, the second in his nature series, has nothing to say about batting averages but a good deal about walking in the New York region and what is to be found there in the way of plants, animals, and birds—the latter being his specialty. Mr. Kieran is evidently an amateur ornithologist of the very first rank, and he tells something of the boyhood and young manhood during which the interest developed. Most of the book, however, is given over to accounts of rambles taken in the company of various friends whose professions were as different as that of drama critic and entomologist. It is unpretentious, informal, and factual rather than philosophical, but it does manage in some way to communicate a good deal of the author's keen pleasure. Both Tennyson and Shakespeare do, besides, frequently raise their pretty heads.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

What Price Prejudice?

THE HIGH COST OF PREJUDICE.

By Bucklin Moon. Julian Messner. $2.50.

WITH enviable courage Bucklin Moon has attempted an impossible task, namely, to estimate the high cost of prejudice in the United States. While he has outlined the areas that would have to be investigated in preparing such an estimate, he has not been able to prepare either a profit-and-loss statement or a balance sheet. So many

Which Magazine D'ya Read?

'CHARLES BAUDELAIRE: One Hundred Poems from 'Les Fleurs du Mal,' translated by C. F. MacIntyre (University of California Press). Here, at last, is a good modern version of this important book. Mr. MacIntyre, by the use of off-rhymes and a loose rhythm, does a remarkably successful job of keeping Baudelaire's form reasonably intact while retaining his force and meaning. He commendably adopts the arrangement of the second edition of 1861, the last overseen by the poet, but he has restored the six poems suppressed by a French court and dropped from that edition. The French texts, two portraits, interesting and unconventional notes, and an excellent bibliography are included."

New Yorker, July 19, 1947

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS

Berkeley 4

of the high costs of prejudice are hidden in statistics of crime, juvenile delinquency, and social services that they can never, perhaps, be disengaged from other factors. Moreover, how can one estimate the "cost," in social or individual terms, of a system that deprives millions of American citizens of normal incentives for self-improvement? Difficulties of this sort, of which Mr. Moon is well aware, can be traced to our system of cost accounting, which reckons "costs" and "profits" not in social but in individual terms.

Nevertheless, more intensive research might have provided a few more specific estimates of the cost of prejudice. For example, Mordecai Ezekiel once estimated that merely by giving Negroes equal wages for equal work the national income would be enlarged by $6,000,000,000 annually, of which $1,000,000,000 would go to the Treasury in taxes. It should have been possible, also, to analyze the costs of dual or segregated public institutions in a single Southern state. While specifications of this kind are lacking, Mr. Moon has certainly "blocked in" the major areas of cost in a most competent and intelligent manner.

Of particular value is the chapter on what Jim Crow has cost the South politically. By saddling the region with incompetent representatives and a one-party system that stifles political progress racial demagoguery has robbed the South of the means by which it might long ago have solved certain of its basic problems. In the absence of effective opposition Southern Representatives usually have a long tenure of office and through seniority consistently capture the key committee chairmanships when their party is in power. Thus the denial of democracy in one region is felt in every other. If Jim Crow is a burden to the South, the South is a burden to the nation. In dealing with the argument that we must proceed gradually in correcting this situation for fear of provoking a violent reaction in the South Mr. Moon has put his finger on one of the underlying fallacies. "True," he writes, "we can go on slowly improving the lot of the Negro at the same time we are rapidly bettering our own," but, at this rate, "the Negro problem" would be with us always.

At one point in his effort to prove that prejudice does not pay, however, Mr. Moon unwittingly glosses over an important aspect of the problem. While prejudice does not pay, it can be highly profitable for certain groups. There is an oblique recognition of this fact in the statement that "perhaps" prejudice may be profitable to "a handful of persons"; but this is somewhat naive. It has been "demonstrated" ad nauseam that in the long run economic exploitation is not in the interest of the exploiting classes, but this demonstration has never worked a revolution in attitudes. For by the nature of the situation these classes are not permitted to take a long-range view of the issue. They are compelled to make immediate decisions on a day-to-day basis, often with the competitive factor uppermost in their thinking. Hence the immediate profit, the short-range advantage, necessarily governs their thinking. Unfortunately it is not "a handful of persons" who profit from the techniques of racial dominance in the South but a social class entrenched in power, with numerous satellite groups, powerful "silent" partners in the North, and a firm grasp on the institutions and economy of the region. Numerically the ultimate beneficiaries may be a fraction of the total population, but the power they represent and the influence they exert cannot be minimized.

Prejudice is the cement which holds together a structure of power. Admittedly wasteful and costly, it is profitable on a short-range basis to particular groups in the sense that it insures their dominance over the great mass of poor Southerners, white and Negro. Hence it is difficult to imagine that the beneficiaries of this dispensation could ever be made to yield the reins of power by arguments that by so doing they would be acting in the long-range interest of their class. The exercise of power is habit-forming and can often blind individuals and classes to their real interests.

The publication of this volume is further proof of how an understanding of the factors involved in what we used to call "the race problem" has increased since 1940. Merely to compare Mr. Moon's clear, calm-mannered, realistic analysis with some of the frightened, myth-ridden analyses that appeared in the twenties gives proof of the progress that has been made. While we have not "solved" the race problem, we at least know that it is solvable and have a strategy for its solution. Now the question is, do we want really to solve it or merely to ease the tensions which are its outer manifestations? The issues cut very deep, for as Mr. Moon writes, "so long as our false concepts of racial superiority continue, the Negro can never be an American, but more than that, Americans can never be free men."

CAREY MC WILLIAMS

"By far the best general survey of American policy
as it develops
from year to year."

—N. Y. Herald Tribune

The United States in World Affairs

1945-47

By John C. Campbell

with an introduction by John Foster Dulles

The Council on Foreign Relations' annual survey of American foreign policy is resumed with this important account of the postwar years, a carefully documented survey showing how our government and our people are meeting the multiple challenges of world leadership. 480 pages of text; plus selected bibliography, chronology of world events, index. Illustrated with maps. $5.00

At all bookstores

HARPER & BROTHERS
New York 18

"A 'must book' for those who direct our foreign relations."

—FREDERIC G. MELCHER,
Editor, Publishers Weekly

"Required reading for every congressman."
—RAYMOND SWING

THE CULTURAL APPROACH
Another Way in International Relations

By BETH McMURRY and MUNA LEE

"For the same investment of mind and money, nothing has proved more successful in maintaining a nation's prestige abroad than a cultural relations program." This book brings together within one volume the records of the cultural programs in foreign relations, of ten countries: France, Germany, Great Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union, Japan, Chile, Argentina, Brazil and Mexico.

Timely because of its light on the present controversy over the State Department's broadcasts to Russia, this book will also commend itself to those who see in such a program a new "bridge to peace" through understanding among the nations.

At all bookstores

$3.50

THE UNIVERSITY OF
NORTH CAROLINA PRESS

Chapel Hill

USED, RARE & OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

Over 100 Cooperating Booksellers Throughout the World with Several Million Books Invite Your Inquiries. Mention Interests if Catalogues Are Desired.

THE AMERICAN ANTIQUARIAN BOOKSELLERS
(INTERNATIONAL)
127 S. Melville St. Phila. 43, Pa.

Fiction in Review

BUDD SCHULBERG'S "The Harder They Fall" (Random House, $3), the new novel by the author of the highly regarded "What Makes Sammy Run?" is full of so much interesting information about the prize-ring—how fighters are made and unmade, how the promotion rackets work—that one could wish it had narrative powers to match its powers of exposition. I do not mean that, technically speaking, Mr. Schulberg tells his story less well than he needs to; on the contrary, he is technically very gifted. But his novel is uncomfortably thin in the realm of the moral imagination, that sphere from which we derive the fresh and meaningful insights of fiction. In the sense of being fervently opposed to the greed and corruption that have reduced boxing to a saturnalia of brutality "The Harder They Fall" is an undeniably moral book. But like so many moral novelists of our day, especially those who concern themselves with the lower depths of our civilization, Mr. Schulberg is much more fervent than perceptive, much "wiser" to the methods of human degradation than wise about what would constitute a better way to act and be. He never even raises the question of why people choose to earn their livings by and off fighting. His imagination deals wholly in the soft, ready-to-hand oppositions—loyalty versus treachery, innocence versus venality, pure sexuality versus lust, art versus mammon—which we recognize as the familiar moral baggage of the boys in the back-room.

The characters in "The Harder They Fall" immediately announce themselves as the established "types" of error or virtue. There is Nick, slum boy turned gangster, with the usual paraphernalia of expensive cigars, toilet waters, body-guard, and son in a good prep school. There is Nick's wife, an ex-Pollies beauty, secret tippler and betrayer of a husband blind to anything but the "class" symbolized by her addiction to best-selling novels. There is Eddie, narrator of the story, one-time Princeton student and now Nick's press agent, who waters his drinks with tears for the Pulitzer prize play he will never write. There is Beth of the ladylike ardor, who is Eddie's dream of decent womanhood; and Shirley, maternal madame of a house on Eighth Avenue, Eddie's dream of womanhood without a college education. There is Danny, who anaesthetizes himself with alcohol against the spectacle of the degeneration of the manly art of self-defense. And finally there is Toro Molina, a peaceable Argentinian peasant become fall-guy for the fight racketeers.

Mr. Schulberg is telling Toro's story. Toro cannot box and doesn't want to learn, but because he is enormously tall he has been brought to America as the

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st St.
59th St.
58th St.
8th, 9th & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th St.
REGENT
23rd St.

RKO NOW
"FORCEFUL MOVING DRAMA."—N. Y. Sun
ANN SHERIDAN
LEW AYRES • ZACHARY SCOTT
'THE UNFAITHFUL'
—and—
'A LIKELY STORY' Bill Williams Barbara Hale

BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WM. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYON
Coney Island

CORNEL
WILDE O'HARA
'THE HOMESTRETCH'
In TECHNICOLOR
—and—
'BORN TO KILL'
Lawrence TIERNEY • Claire TREVOR

QUEENS
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way. CH 4-4256
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

Memo to: NATION READERS

From: THE NATION ADVERTISING DEPT.

Those of you who have a class product to sell would do well to consider using The Nation's advertising columns. Why not call us today so that we can further discuss this profitable possibility with you.

BARclay 7-1066

WHY NOT SUBSCRIBE TO
The NATION!
FILL OUT COUPON ON SECOND COVER

new challenger from the Andes; before the story ends, this giant version of the "little man" has made a million crooked dollars for his backers and has himself been annihilated. There is a touching dignity about this sad and unheroic hero—Mr. Schulberg's communicated feeling for Toro is, I think, the best achievement of his book—and a scarcely-to-be-questioned truth in his author's conviction that money is no respecter of such persons. On the other hand, one is disconcerted by Mr. Schulberg's large reliance upon the money motivation of his characters, which gives his novel a curiously old-fashioned flavor considerably at odds with the strictly contemporary quality of its language and pictorial detail. For if the last fifteen years have taught us nothing else, surely they have taught us the insufficiency of the idea that money is the root of all evil; we have had not only psychology and anthropology to show us the degree to which money is simply a social expression of far more primitive needs, but also the lesson of the dictator countries to prove how much more fierce than the pure money drive is the complex power drive. That we no longer believe in economic determinism as we once did seems to me to be clearly demonstrated by the change that has taken place on the Communist-liberal front, where the appeal to our sense of economic insecurity has been almost entirely displaced by an appeal to dimmer and deeper emotions of fear and anger; thus the English Labor government pursues its social program with virtually no encouragement from our left-wing journals, because here was economic revolution without the terror and bloodshed which truly excite our political emotions, while Palestine, all terror and battle, excites a fierce partisanship. Mr. Schulberg's proposition that less blood would flow were there less greed is, I am afraid, a sweet throwback to an earlier day than ours.

But if Mr. Schulberg is a bit behind the times in still subscribing to the money myth, he is, as I have said, precisely on the contemporary line in the account his language and actions take of our present-day appetite for violence. "The Harder They Fall" not only has a full complement of battered heads and smashed bodies; it is also written in the walloping, slugging, jabbing vernacular of a society in love with its own destruction. I suppose Hemingway was the last of our novelists who, assimilating the language of bar and prize-ring to a traditional cultivated idiom, gave evidence of the hope that modern and established values could work out an existence together. His followers, all too eager to throw their heritage of language into the nearest sewer, would seem to have passed beyond any such optimism.

DIANA TRILLING

[The title of Christine Weston's book of stories, "There & Then," was incorrectly given in the issue of August 23 as "There Then."]

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IF Koussevitzky could be pleased by publication of the sickening stuff that Dr. Leichtentritt wrote about him, he would be displeased by publication of Moses Smith's accurate history and discriminating appraisal of his career and achievements.* The Koussevitzky sycophants, presumably echoing Koussevitzky himself, accused Smith of malicious slanders. Actually there is a detail here and there in which malice can be detected; but it is the occasional slight malice of someone who is essentially friendly—the irresistible revenge

* "Koussevitzky," Allen, Towne, and Heath. $4.

for the long-endured attitudes and behavior exemplified by Koussevitzky's court action to suppress a book that was critical as well as appreciative. Also it shows itself only in a minor detail, never in a large matter. Also it never expresses itself in falsehood—and I won't complain of ill-will that uses only truth for its purpose.

If Smith describes weaknesses in the man, limitations in the conductor, flaws in the musician, they are enormously outweighed by all that he finds to admire and praise. And if, after all that Smith says about Koussevitzky's service to composers of his and our own time, both in Europe and here, he adds that the record is not perfect—that the choices of new music to play have often been arbitrary and impulsive, with many instances of undeserved neglect, and that in the case of Americans it gradually became clear that "his principal interest was in youth, on whose behalf he tended to neglect youth's elders," that "he was interested also in newness for its own sake and for the attention novelty would attract to him," so that "a second performance of the . . . work might never materialize, unless it was by one of his favorite coterie"—Smith is not being malicious, for he points out that in all this "Koussevitzky was hardly exceptional among conductors in America"; he is merely stating what must be stated to complete the factual record.

But in the words of Virgil Thomson, whose article on the subject was one of his most brilliant performances, "all

Useful Information

For us the living it is important to remember how five million died at Auschwitz and Birkenau. It may be of even more practical importance to learn and remember how a few thousand survived. Both kinds of information are available in Smoke Over Birkenau. It is the explicit story of death in various forms: the gas chamber, typhus, starvation. It is also the story of life: of those who, "the body naked, the hands empty, kept locked within them some inner substance, a strength increasing as the need for it increased, a freedom created through the effort of their imagination, the strain of their will, and the work of their intellect."

The author was a prisoner in Birkenau from 1942 until 1945.

SMOKE OVER BIRKENAU

by Seweryna Szmagłowska

Translated by Jadwiga Rynas

$3.50

great artists loathe criticism. They do; they really do. What they want, what they need, what they live on, as Gertrude Stein so rightly said, is praise. They can never get enough of it. And sometimes, when they have come to be really powerful in the world, they take the attitude that anything else is libel and should be suppressed." Koussevitzky had complained of possible "irreparable injury"—which led Thomson to comment that "it is the big boys, the great big boys whom nothing could harm, that squawk the loudest." Actually, "his unique position in a world full of excellent conductors, many of them devoted to contemporary music, is that he has played more of it, launched more of it, published more of it, and paid for more of it than anybody else living. That is the clear message of Mr. Smith's biography. Everything else, a petulant gesture here and there, a musical or family quarrel, a pretentious remark, a vainglorious interview, the present court action, all these things serve the picture; they bring him more vividly to life. How can anyone mind knowing them? Only he himself, apparently, hasting fearfully toward Parnassus, though his throne there has long been reserved, and involved, no doubt, in a publicity apotheosis that has already begun, would see any value in posing before an already worshipping universe without the customary habillage of one human weakness. His lawsuit, of course, adds to the tableau that he has essayed to compose so carefully just that."

One final point: From Smith's book one learns how the fortune of Koussevitzky's second wife made possible for him not only the career of conductor but the life of a grand seigneur. Those are the facts; what follows is possible interpretation of those facts. That is, I am led to wonder whether one could say that his wife's fortune made it possible for a man who had suffered poverty, rebuffs, humiliations to compensate himself emotionally for those experiences by bestowing largesse on composers, conductors, instrumentalists, singers, critics, and all the rest. And whether one could say that his theory of the conductor's function, which makes it his right and duty to alter the scores of dead composers and to do the same even with those of living composers, is an extension of that pretentious behavior for emotional compensation. And that the spouting of portentous balderdash at Tanglewood is another such extension.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

No Contradiction

Dear Sirs: I want to congratulate you for the excellent articles by Daniel James on the A. V. C., and his account of the Communist intrigue by which our Russia Firsters try to infiltrate and control progressive organizations. But I would like to ask how you square this policy of opposition to Communist penetration and domination of progressive organizations with the attitude of Mr. del Vayo in his articles on the political situation in European countries. Mr. del Vayo, it seems to me, has excused every attempt made by the Communists to "coordinate" the Socialist parties in Europe with their own made-in-Moscow policies, and has criticized those Socialists who wished to maintain an independent and critical attitude toward the Communists because they believe that the welfare of the European workers does not coincide with the demands of Moscow's foreign policy. This might well be so, for example, because Russia's foreign policy might at times call for weakening a nation which was opposed to Russian aggression by creating economic chaos in that nation through strikes which were not justified by the true interests of the workers.

It seems to me that the same principle of preventing domination of labor or progressive organizations by those who always put the interests of Russia first applies in the case of the European Social Democrats as it does in the case of the A. V. C. Yet your articles support the Communist position in one case and oppose it in the other.

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

New York, August 15

[It is true, as Mr. Lewis says, that Mr. del Vayo believes European Socialists and leftists generally should cooperate with Communists. He sees in the divisions of Europe's left a wide-open opportunity for reactionary and fascist revival, particularly in the present period of political instability. On the other hand, he has never excused the attempts of Communists to "coordinate" or control the Socialist parties in Europe. On the contrary, he has criticized such attempts as destructive of the strategy of working-class unity the Communists so insistently advocate. A few quotations from recent articles by Mr. del Vayo will perhaps disabuse Mr.

Lewis of the ideas expressed in his letter.

Discussing the decisions of the Mont-ronge congress of the French Socialist Party in March, 1946, Mr. del Vayo wrote in The Nation:

The Communists must make the main effort to dispel the suspicion shared by many Socialists . . . that when a Communist talks unity, he means unity on his terms, with the Communist Party running the whole show for its exclusive benefit. It is too much to expect that any Socialist, however convinced of the need of working with the Communists, will let himself and his party be treated almost as intruders in the labor movement. It makes no sense to talk unity and then denounce a Socialist as a reactionary or a semi-fascist the moment he disagrees with the Communist line.

. . . Either the Communists feel strong enough to rule alone, or they need the collaboration of other progressive forces and especially of the Socialists. In the latter case, they must change their methods.

More recently, on June 28, 1947, Mr. del Vayo devoted his regular page to the problem of Socialist-Communist relations as it emerged at the recent Zürich conference of the Socialist parties of Europe. He ended his analysis with these words:

It is hoped that somehow the Socialist parties will succeed in overcoming their present difficulties. Europe needs them. There is a great mass of Socialist opinion, traditionally educated in freedom and radicalism, which does not fit in any other party. Its loss as an effective political force would be a great one, even for the Communists, although they often prefer to ignore this and do everything in their power to weaken the Socialist position. Only the reaction would benefit by their success.

—EDITORS THE NATION.]

A Future, if Permitted

Dear Sirs: Roger Baldwin's article on Korea, in your issue of August 2, commands my greatest respect. His knowledge of the country, gained in a fortnight, is deeper and clearer than that of many army officials who have been there nearly two years.

Mr. Baldwin's description of the Korean police state, supported by the Miltary Government, is true. The police use tactics familiar to survivors of war-time Japanese prison camps. Beatings are routine. Our responsibility for the dangerous position of liberal and honest Koreans cannot be denied either. An example: last March students of Korean universities walked out in protest when the Military Government seized control of their studies and classes. Many were imprisoned. They were released four months later.

One point Mr. Baldwin does not make clear: in Korea leftist and Communist are not synonyms for Soviet-supporter and Stalinist. Many Koreans believe in political and cultural democracy with economic leftism, although their position is increasingly difficult, pressed, as they are, between Russian influence and the Military Government. At least 60 per cent of all Koreans support some branch of the left, Stalinist, anti-Stalinist, or other. This at first shocked, then deeply impressed me. I grew increasingly aware, toward the end of my sixteen months in Korea, of the great political awareness of the people; of their strong and deep desire for freedom and its responsibilities; and of their honest faith in their country's future—if we and Russia permit it a future.

DELL HYMES

Portland, Oregon, August 24

For Action on Spain

Dear Sir: The September session of the General Assembly of the U. N. will certainly be confronted with the necessity to decide on further action on the Spanish question.

In its Resolution on Spain of December 12, 1946, the General Assembly not only condemned the Franco regime and recommended the recall of envoys from Madrid, but declared that "if within a reasonable time" a government meeting democratic standards was not established in Spain, "the Security Council [should] consider the adequate measures to be taken in order to remedy the situation."

It is evident that a "reasonable time" has elapsed since December, 1946, and that no change has occurred in Spain. Political repression continues; men and women, continue to be jailed for "crimes" which in other countries are considered the simple exercise of the rights of free speech and assembly.

The Assembly resolution recalled also that "incontrovertible documentary evidence establishes that Franco was a guilty party with Hitler and Mussolini in the conspiracy to wage

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 227 By MR. X.

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the fifth of six puzzles constructed by Mr. X in competition with Mr. Y. At the end of the competition, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

ACROSS

- 1 Pons makes French gold for the angel
- 5 Arles? No, Joan came from elsewhere
- 9 In my role as a French Jeeves, I am befuddled with porter
- 10 Is it profane or is it a love match?
- 11 One raid covers the ranges
- 12 Compact to ease garment workers
- 14 Queen Bee
- 15 You can incur real ire if you provoke a Sooner
- 18 Small edition
- 20 This island is part of the Dodecanese
- 21 Thought can never be compared with action, but when it ----- in us the image of truth — Madame de Staël
- 23 Ethics of a coed
- 26 Tea vitiates when it gets too fancy
- 28 Mom has always been a matchmaker
- 29 Grow to be a general
- 30 Overlooks the seignor in the confusion
- 31 Damsels in distress
- 32 Leavens the lot of those put in bondage

DOWN

- 1 The Repubs have grown rich
- 2 Five in the wild rodeo show signs of strain
- 3 Sortie on one leg is sheer sorcery

- 4 The religious ceremonies ended with spirituals
- 5 Observe the back of the head
- 6 Fast company
- 7 Ida made a theoretical pilgrimage to Mecca
- 8 Voices that thunder in the index
- 13 Violinist's last stand
- 16 The little ones receive a dime when they make their first steps
- 17 Made one for eternity
- 18 It's rude to tease about the scales
- 19 Salt came to taunt the classic thirster
- 22 Dogs roam the streets
- 23 I live in a castle in Spain
- 24 Breastbones—easy, isn't it?
- 25 Sitter finds it rather dull
- 27 Grieve when I go out over the border

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 226

ACROSS:—1 CONSOLES; 5 STREAM; 10 MODESTY; 11 ADDICTS; 12 ARENA; 13 INSOLENCE; 14 GRILL; 16 NORTHERN; 19 EPISODES; 22 ROCKY; 24 VAIN; 26 MECUM; 28 OVERT; 30 CONTROL; 29 TRIGGER; 30 SEETHE; 31 CALABRIA.

DOWN:—1 CAMPAIGN; 2 NUDGE; 3 OBSTACLES; 4 ELYSIAN; 6 TIDAL; 7 ECCENTRIC; 8 MISTER; 9 HAWSER; 15 IMPUDENCE; 17 HARMONICA; 18 HYSTERIA; 20 DOCILE; 21 SUMATRA; 23 EVICTS; 25 MARCH; 27 EGGER.

war against . . . the United Nations." Finally, it should not be forgotten that the Department of State declared in May, 1946, that Franco Spain had "fomented foci of Nazi-Fascist influence in the Western Hemisphere" and that "Spanish diplomatic officials and persons in Spanish quasi-official organizations have for years been encouraging groups in the other American republics which opposed inter-American unity against the Axis during the war and which still strive to perpetuate the principles of the Axis system in the New World."

It is clear therefore that fulfillment of U. N. principles and the stability of the United States demand that further action against the Franco regime be taken by the world organization. What measures would be effective? It is the general opinion of the friends of the Spanish people that to deny Franco gasoline and oil would weaken his motorized armed forces and ruin his economy; to deny him industrial machinery, coal, cotton, and other raw materials would cause his economic collapse and accelerate his political collapse; to cease buying Spanish products would deny him the foreign exchange he needs.

It is to be hoped that the recently appointed United States delegation to the General Assembly and the United States representative on the Security Council have been instructed in this sense and that they will lead energetic action to help the Spanish people rid themselves of Franco and establish, "free from force and intimidation," a government of their own choosing.

LUIS MONGUIO

Mills College, Cal., August 26

Life of Franz Boas

Dear Sirs: I am gathering material toward a life of the scientist Franz Boas, and I shall be glad to hear from any of your readers who knew him or have any writings of his.

Please address any information you may have for me care of Doubleday and Company, 14 West Forty-ninth Street, New York 20, N. Y. Thank you.

MURIEL RUKEYSER

New York, August 18

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. H-3
233 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

MILLIONS OF USED, RARE and out-of-print books stocked in 15 cities. Mention interests if catalogues are wanted. TAAB, 529 S. Melville St., Phila. 43.

TYPING SERVICE

MANUSCRIPTS EXPERTLY TYPED. Plays, stories, novels, criticisms, rewrite instructions: low rates, prompt delivery. "MANUSERVICE," 120 East 59th Street, PLaza 3-4789.

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Available under GI Bill of Rights. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 RGA Bldg. New York 20, N. Y.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocation, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

CURRIES

HOW TO MAKE GOOD CURRIES: Your request with a 3¢ stamp will bring you our Recipe Booklet of precise Indian recipes for making curries of chicken, lamb, shrimp and vegetables. Learn the simple principles of using this condiment; it changes ordinary foods into new and delightful dishes.

JAVA-INDIA CONDIMENT CO.
IMPORTERS

442 Hudson Street New York 14, N. Y.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, EAST CHATHAM, New York. Farms in the Mass.-New York Berkshires. Also consulting broker for organizations.

GOOD NEIGHBORS WANTED, choice acres are offered much below developers prices. Write Chester Rick, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515M

RESORT

1½ Hours from New York City

White Gates

WAPPINGERS FALLS, NEW YORK

For the Easy Informality of a Country Home
Sports — Recordings — Library
Open Dining and Outdoor Dancing Pavilions

Outstanding Cuisine

Weekly $45.00 to $50.00

Weekends $9.00 to $9.50 per day

Telephone Wappingers Falls 469

SCHOOL

CHERRY LAWN SCHOOL

DARIEN, CONNECTICUT

Co-educational, Boarding and Country Day School. 40 miles from New York City. Grades 3-8. High School 1-4. A few vacancies for boys in the Upper and Lower Schools . . . girls in the Lower School. Curriculum emphasizes world culture . . . Individual guidance . . . with wide range of academic subjects. Cultural and Practical Arts, and all Sports including Horseback riding.

Christina Stael v. H. Bogoslovsky, Ph.D.
Tel., Dar. 5-1425 Director

PHOTOGRAPHY COURSE

CREATIVE PHOTOGRAPHY — private course for 4-5 students. Pictorial, commercial, portrait. Practical dark-room work, round-table discussions. Joseph Breitenbach, A. R. P. S., ASMP, 210 Central Park South, N. Y. 19, Columbus 5-0468.

APARTMENT WANTED

ATTRACTIVE couple desperately need apartment, 2-3 rooms, Manhattan, furnished — unfurnished, to $100. Highest references. McComas. PLaza 3-1309.

ROOM FOR RENT

SINGLE ROOM, pleasant, private, available to business, professional person. No kitchen privileges, near transportation. References required. NA 8-3786.

MISCELLANEOUS

LIVING QUARTERS in White Plains area available for couple in exchange for watching property. Box 1730, c/o The Nation.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

For chain store, branch department store or high-type home office building, we offer for long-term lease the magnificent, modern Stone Front fireproof former First National Bank Building at Boston Post Road and Mamaroneck Avenue, in Mamaroneck, 3 stories, basement and cellar. Impressive architecture and layout. 2 Elevators. L. N. Rosenbaum & Son, 565 Fifth Avenue, New York 17.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES — Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

74¢ A LINE (SIX WORDS)

Minimum Three Lines

Box number counted as three words

Classified Display $7.39 per inch

Attractive Discounts for Multiple Insertions

THE NATION • 20 Vesey Street • New York City 7 • Barclay 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 13, 1947

NUMBER 11

The Shape of Things

DEMOCRATIC PARTY TACTICIANS PROBABLY need no urging from us to study the political fever charts periodically issued by the Gallup Poll, the Fortune Survey, and other scientific seers. There is always the chance, however, that, carried away by enthusiasm over current trends, they will blind themselves to the underlying realities. The latest Roper survey shows that President Truman is now running even with Dewey and ahead of four other leading Republican candidates, any one of whom stood to beat him only five months ago. Gallup readings indicate that the percentage of voters who expect a Republican victory in 1948 has fallen from 79 per cent as of last December to 46 per cent today. It should not be assumed, however, that the remaining 54 per cent are ready to award the palm to Truman. His stock on this index has risen from a low of 9 per cent to an encouraging but inconclusive level of 30. The key lies in the remaining 24 per cent of voters, those who venture no opinion. The number in this category has doubled, indicating not only that more people are uncertain than was the case in December but that the Democratic chances of success lie precisely in this doubtful sector of the population. Presumably, they have been driven from a certainty of Republican success to their present position on the fence by the dismal record of the G. O. P. in Congress and by Truman's vetoes of the tax and labor bills. In other words, the Administration has been moving in the right direction, but it hasn't moved far enough. It should be perfectly clear to the President by now that the hope of the party lies in the Hannegan strategy of hewing to the New Deal line. That way lie the independent votes. The others are as good as cast already.

✱

INEVITABLY, THE LIMITED, CAUTIOUSLY administered "direction" of British labor into essential industries is being compared to Soviet regimentation, denounced as the inherent consequence of socialism, and mourned as the beginning of the end of British freedom. It is true, of course, that Englishmen in peace time do not relish being told where to work on pain of fine or imprisonment, but it is equally true that delegates to the annual Trades Union Congress last week voted six to one to support precisely that policy. There was some irate debate over failure to apply the law to "spivs," or slackers, but there was no self-deception as to the dire crisis through which the country is passing, a crisis as great as any in time of war. Two overriding desires appear to have conquered the natural repugnance of British labor to the program of "direction," mild as it is and hedged about with safeguards: first, the survival of the nation as a power independent of both Russian and American domination; and, second, the success of the Labor Party. Foreign Minister Bevin drew his loudest cheers when he said to the delegates: "I am here this morning to appeal to you to fight for our independence, in the workshops, in the mines, in the fields. . . . Who can accuse me of wanting to be subservient to the East or the West? I want Britain to stand self-reliant and to come back, and I can only do that if you come forward." The response was an eloquent demonstration of the government's hold on the nation. Let those who venture comparisons with the surrender of individual liberty in certain other countries recall that in England there is no secret police to force enthusiasm, no one-party press to stimulate it, no limitation on the power of the voters to sweep men out of office and scrap their whole program.

✱

ERNEST BEVIN MUST HAVE SPOKEN WITHOUT benefit of expert advice when he told the Trades Union Congress that redistribution of the Fort Knox gold would help to eliminate world economic chaos. Certainly, he failed to make his reasoning clear. Had he referred to the American hoard of bullion as a symbol of economic futility, we would be the first to applaud. When all the world is suffering from shortages of useful goods, it is clearly insane to employ hundreds of thousands of men to dig this "hard food for Midas" from the earth so that it may be reburied in another place. But the Fort Knox pile is a symptom rather than a cause of economic disaster. It has been accumulated, partly as the result of our persistent reluctance to buy abroad as much as we sell, partly because this country has long seemed, to possessors of liquid funds, the safest haven in an insecure world. Redistribution of the gold would not of itself change these conditions unless it was accomplished by using the metal to finance an excess of

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	241
The One World of Science	243
The General Assembly	244
Realism for Survival	244

ARTICLES

Socialism, Communism, and the West by Margaret Marshall	246
Chicago Has One More Chance by Homer A. Jack	250
Letter from Italy by Mario Rossi	252
Fight for Freedom in the Arctic by Richard L. Neuberger	254
A Backward Glance in History by Waldo R. Browne	256
Hay Fever, Arthritis, Longevity by Martin Gumpert	258
The Temper of the French by Del Vayo	259

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

A Slender Reed by Ruth Benedict	260
Radio's Responsibility by Jerome Spingarn	260
For Sages and Philistines by Anthony Bower	261
New Angle by Henry Popkin	262
Prophet of Doom by Albert Guérard	262
Books in Brief by Benjamin Harrow	263
Films by James Agee	264
Music by B. H. Haggin	264

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 228 by Mr. X	267
--	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchway

Managing Editor J. King Gordon Literary Editor Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:

Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Schultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.
Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

imports. And, apart from tariff barriers, that is hardly possible at this time, since few countries have surpluses to sell us. If gifts and loans to foreign countries were the methods of redistribution, the gold would speedily return here, for it is not gold that Europe and Asia need but American wheat, coal, steel, and machinery. Redistribution of gold would, of course, temporarily provide our foreign customers with purchasing power for the procurement of such goods, but no more than would the loan of an equivalent amount of paper dollars. Presumably, that is what Mr. Bevin really desires. It is a great pity he did not say so plainly instead of dragging a gold fish across an already confused trail.

★

THE CURIOUS CONTINUITY OF REPRESSION and reaction that sets Britain's foreign policy in uncomfortable opposition to its domestic shift toward socialism—discussed by Margaret Marshall in her article on page 246—has nowhere been more strikingly dramatized than in the odyssey of the Exodus. To ship 4300 escaped Jewish survivors of Nazism back to Germany is an act which will cancel out politically, in millions of minds, the arduous and creditable struggle of the Bevin government to solve its economic difficulties. That the whole ugly performance was unnecessary, even in the context of British police rule in Palestine, was perfectly clear even before the High Commissioner fruitlessly protested against it during his recent visit to London. That it was also stupid is obvious, unless Mr. Bevin is trying to provide arguments in support of the proposals to be submitted to the U. N. Assembly by its special Palestine commission. Nothing could serve better to fortify the commission's unanimous recommendation that the mandate be ended forthwith than the spectacle of thousands of Jews forced by British clubs into German concentration camps. Against this bit of symbolic injustice, no Cadogan logic will prevail. As our issue goes to press, the refugees are still on board the three British prison ships in Hamburg harbor. Only the unlikely chance that they may decide to move docilely into the waiting camps can save the Labor government from the penalty of its folly. That, or an even less likely decision by the government to retrieve its reputation by allowing the Exodus passengers to enter Palestine as the first contingent of the 150,000 whose admission within two years was also recommended by the commission.

★

WE PREDICT EARLY DISILLUSIONMENT WITH the new government in Greece in spite of the good intentions and honesty of Themistocles Sophoulis, its venerable head. We even predict that Sophoulis himself will be disillusioned, for the shrewd and hard-boiled Tsalدارis bargained him out of several of the demands on which he had conditioned his acceptance of the premiership. Tsaldaris controls 141 votes in Parliament to Sophoulis's 48; besides which, his party, the Populist, has the backing of the army and the crown. As a result, Tsaldaris, as Vice-Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs, will be boss, as he was in the late Maximos government. Sophoulis wanted a majority of the Cabinet posts so that he could direct policy; he did not get them. He wanted the Ministry of War and the Interior, as well as that of Public Order—the three key posts in the operations against the guerrillas and the opposition in general; Tsaldaris put his men in the first two. Tsaldaris also forced the appointment of a Populist as Governor General of Northern Greece, with ministerial rank, which gives him direct administrative control in the chief area of disaffection. Not even the elimination of the ruthless Napoleon Zervas as Minister of Public Order will offset this Tsaldaris victory, for the success of the promised amnesty will depend entirely on the confidence of the guerrillas in the honest intentions of the men who will direct it. They can have none in Tsaldaris or his appointees. It is hard to imagine how an experienced politician like Sophoulis could accept responsibility for such a miserable coalition unless he was put under irresistible pressure by Loy W. Henderson, the State Department's emissary, who, in cooperation with Ambassador MacVeagh, has been busy "non-intervening" in the political crisis. Mr. Henderson was reported off to Washington with a "diplomatic triumph" in his pocket. We fear his gratification is a little premature.

★

ROBERT R. YOUNG, THE BAD BOY OF THE railroad business, is once more reminding his fellow-operators that a fundamental ingredient of the competitive system is competition. To railroad presidents, as to industrialists, free enterprise is the inspiration of all oratory, to be invoked at every suggestion of further encroachment by government; but in practice, as the rebellious chairman of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway demonstrates, competition is something not to be mentioned at a board table. In polite railroad society, it is understood that convenience and profits call rather for the cozy sort of arrangement whereby freight trains moving over the shortest route between two points take exactly as long as those moving over the most indirect route. Between Chicago and California, Mr. Young points out by way of example, there are eight important freight lines, varying in travel distance by as much as 450 miles; yet over each of them the trip is scheduled to be made in precisely 118 hours and 30 minutes. Confronted with this remarkable coincidence, which Young has spread before the nation in the form of full-page advertisements, the roads have offered only the most bumbling explanation. William T. Faricy, president of the Association of American Railroads, did not deny Young's charge of "deliberate freight slowdowns" but defended them as a device for preventing "speed wars," which would otherwise result from the "intense competition." Here is a bald admission which should interest both the Justice Department, as a practice in restraint of trade, and the Congressional committees that are about to investigate high prices. With the shortage of freight cars held to be a major factor in the inflated cost of food, it might be well to discover how many bushels of wheat and potatoes rot in the fields while freight trains inch across the country on schedules slowed down by agreement.

★

NOVICES IN THE ART OF UNDERSTATEMENT are hereby referred to a master, Joseph R. McCarthy, Republican Senator from Wisconsin and last-ditch opponent of the mild Taft-Ellender-Wagner housing bill. "We found dead rats on the doorsteps, gas seeping from garbage, and veterans living in mud," the Senator reported after a visit to an emergency housing project in New York. "When you find conditions like that, you feel there is a problem."

The One World of Science

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S announcement that American radio isotopes will be made available for medical and biological research abroad is welcome news. During the past year, prospects have been poor for reviving the free international exchange of scientific information which has been the glory of science and the source of its achievements. In the fields of medicine and biology, the curtain has now been lifted by American action.

The cheap radioactive isotopes made in the atomic pile are the most important new scientific tool since the microscope. Their role in overcoming cancer needs no underlining, inasmuch as President Truman's announcement was made to the Fourth International Cancer Research Congress. However, they are just as valuable in other branches of medicine and biology. With radio isotopes as "tags," scientists can trace the infinitely complex processes that take place in living tissues, processes previously beyond man's ken. Within five years, hardly a medical or biological problem, from virus disease to growing old, will be tackled without the aid of radio tracers.

In sending radio isotopes abroad, we are doing ourselves as well as the world a service. Americans have no monopoly on scientific brains. A majority of the world's greatest scientists are Europeans. It was a Briton, Fleming, who discovered penicillin; a German, Domagk, who discovered sulfa; and a French couple, Irène and Frédéric Joliot-Curie, who discovered the first radio isotopes

Given the tools and the opportunity, European scientists will repay us a thousand-fold with new achievements.

Some time will elapse before scientists abroad can actually take advantage of the American isotopes. Unfortunately, research with isotopes demands expensive equipment, such as Geiger counters. In Europe today, Geiger counters are even harder to obtain than food. Lack of equipment and food may prevent European scientists from making their full contribution for many years.

It will take a great deal more than this offer to end the suspicions that divide the world and to restore worldwide freedom of scientific exchange. Medicine and biology are, after all, only two of many vital fields of science. Nevertheless, the announcement is a step in the right direction.

The General Assembly

NEXT week, the General Assembly of the United Nations meets at Flushing Meadow. Its significance has been blanketed by the rapidly developing crisis in Europe's economy and by the actions of the leading states in the two main power blocs which have by-passed the world organization.

To some extent, this by-passing reflects the impotence of the United Nations as demonstrated by repeated deadlocks in the Security Council. And some of these independent actions cannot be put down on the red side of the international ledger. The grim fact is that the future of the world depends almost solely on the policy of the United States. In the present state of Europe's crisis, a bold and generous implementation of the Marshall plan is the essential of world recovery.

But the hope of the United Nations depends equally on American action. The major tragedy, which we have seen enacted over and over again at Lake Success, is that the overwhelming responsibility carried by the United States has been discharged in a mediocre, unimaginative, and fearful fashion. American representatives have acted like frightened little people, grocery clerks in a big-time poker game. We can only hope that the play will be different in the next weeks at Flushing.

The Assembly is going to have to grapple with some thorny questions among the sixty-odd items on its agenda. The Report on Palestine, a constructive, imaginative document, will be sunk in the cross-fire of big-power interests unless the United States gives its firm support and shows itself willing to help guarantee a new basis of peace in the Middle East.

The Greek issue is already prejudiced both by Russian intransigence in the Security Council and by American threats of independent action should the Assembly fail to back the United States position. If, in the coming weeks, Greece could be stabilized with a liberal government strong enough not only to declare but to enforce an amnesty and to lay plans for the economic reconstruction of the country, the United Nations would be in a stronger position to insist on an impartial border commission to patrol the troubled northern region.

The veto, now under strong attack, has become the focus of anti-Russian feeling. There will be strenuous debate; but the veto will remain, for the simple reason that any amendment to the U. N. Charter must have the approval of the Security Council, which is precisely where the veto can be invoked. But beyond the present veto crisis is the over-all consideration that originally accounted for the presence of the veto in the Charter—that is, that no major decision in international policy can be taken, veto or no veto, unless there is unanimity among the great powers.

The overwhelming issue the Assembly must face, therefore, is this: Will the desire for the conditions of a stable peace expressed in the debates of the General Assembly succeed in narrowing rather than widening the breach between East and West, between the Soviet Union and the United States? If former Assemblies are any indication, the smaller and middle powers will take the initiative in the attempt to recover the lost ground of peace. The role of the great powers is far less certain. But, with Secretary Marshall heading the American delegation, the United States has perhaps its last chance to assert a moral leadership truly reflecting its paramount position in the councils of the nations.

Realism for Survival

AS WE go to press, we are waiting for a statement by Secretary Marshall or the President himself insisting that Congress must convene in special session to decide upon emergency measures to save Europe. That such drastic action is demanded has become clear from the reports of American observers on the Continent and from Assistant Secretary of State Robert Lovett's press conference last week. What has disturbed us from the beginning about the Marshall plan has been the casualness with which it has been presented to the American people, who, after all, have the final say in its implementation.

The emergency action that must now be taken is something in addition to the long-term plan of European recovery which has been hammered out through the summer by the representatives of sixteen nations in Paris. It is called for because Europe's food and fuel supplies are dangerously near depletion and many countries will face desperate need by mid-winter unless help is given now. If the need is not met, then the economic and political chaos will have become so widespread by next spring that it may be impossible to put into effect any long-term program.

The storm signals have long been flying. Feverish attempts to maintain stability in England and in France, reports of bad harvests, the increasing unbalance of our import and export figures, all have emphasized the fact that a leisurely program of aid will not be sufficient to save Europe from collapse. Only the Administration's obsession with domestic political considerations and its small-town banker's approach to world economics can account for our allowing events to drift so close to the edge of disaster.

The actual progress made in Paris should prevent emergency-aid measures from being as barren of permanent results as the expenditure of $15 billion in relief made by the United States since the war. In fact, whatever justification may be found for Assistant Secretary of State Clayton's sharp demand that the Paris Committee pare down its first estimate of $29 billion over four years lies in his insistence that the Marshall program must lead to a going European economy. It is quite obvious that Europe now faces the urgent need of food, fuel, and equipment, without which its workers cannot increase production. But, by the end of four years, it is reasonable to expect that Europe's mines will be producing more coal and iron and its fields more grain. Moreover, it may be assumed that, by that time, the food resources of Eastern Europe will be augmenting Western Europe's supplies—in spite of the political iron curtain—and that the production of Asia and Africa will be available. Even more valid seems to be the insistence that intra-European trade be developed as far as possible on a multilateral basis. An integrated European economy along the lines of the agreement now operating among Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg may be some years in the distance, but steps in that direction can be taken now.

It has been singularly unfortunate that discussion of Europe's needs has been carried on in terms of the American dollars that must be supplied. In the first place, this emphasis is unreal since the value of the dollar—as Britain knows to its sorrow—fluctuates with the American price level. No one can predict what that level will be a few years hence, although sober economists question the prevailing belief of the politicians that the Marshall plan will step up American inflation. More important, to speak in terms of dollars obscures the real nature of the problem. During the war, we met certain objectives in terms of planes, guns, and tanks. Today, we can state similar objectives in terms of the food, fuel, and equipment needed immediately and during the next four years to get Europe's economy back on its feet. And these requirements are in turn related to the program of opening up Europe's inland transport system, the development of the Ruhr under international control, the starting up of Europe's factories. Perhaps, more than anything else, American economic aid is essential in the restoration of the democratic political life of Europe.

IT IS in this last respect that the Marshall plan has received some of the least informed criticism. "Are we to pay out good American dollars," it is asked, "to build up European socialism as a competing system to American capitalism?" In this connection, the recent report of the National Planning Association, which cannot be accused of leftist leanings, is pertinent. "The Socialist experiment in Western Europe," the report says, "unlike communism in practice, has involved no infringement upon the civil liberties of the individual. This, from an American point of view, is of supreme importance. Our primary concern should be whether individual liberty is protected, and not whether it finds expression under any particular pattern of economic life. If it is protected in any nation, that nation falls within the area of freedom which, for the preservation of our own liberties, we are called upon more insistently than ever to defend."

The success of the Marshall plan has also a direct bearing on America's economic stability. The emergency restrictions on American imports which both Britain and France have imposed during the past few weeks should be considered warnings of worse to come. An Atlantic Ocean empty of American merchant shipping would be scarcely less disastrous to us than to Europe. Already, the President's economic advisers are predicting a depression—a deep one, not a modest price adjustment. The obliteration of our export trade would hasten this catastrophe. While it is unfair to assert that the Marshall plan is solely prompted by American economic self-interest, it is only realistic to recognize that its implementation will mean that America's factories, farms, and mines will continue to export to Europe at about the same rate that has prevailed during the past two years.

Once we get beyond our dollar complex and think of the Marshall plan in terms of the needs of Europe's recovery, some of its challenge emerges. We no longer think, "Can we afford to pour into Europe billions of hard-earned American dollars?" but rather, "Can we afford to withhold from Europe the aid by means of which it can once more become a healthy part of the world in which we must live?" This is the point at which national leaders have failed the American people. Instead of fearfully estimating how much a particularly backward Congress can be cajoled into paying, they should challenge the American people to an enterprise scarcely less momentous than the one to which they responded when Europe was threatened by Hitler's armies. For we have faced no more serious threat since those armies stood at the Channel ports.

Socialism, Communism, and the West

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

EVER since July 25, the second anniversary of the British Labor victory, I have been brooding, as I had often brooded before, over the way the advent of socialism in Britain has been taken for granted, neglected, or played down by the people in this country—liberals and radicals—who might have been expected to make at least as much fuss about it as they did about the advent of Soviet communism in Russia thirty years ago. And surely anyone who was present at the time and has been around since then will have to agree that the fanfare with which that great experiment was greeted, and the continuing passionate interest with which it has been reported, explained, defended, and played up, month after month and year after year, bear no resemblance to the mild fireworks set off by the same greeters when the British people went to the polls and voted by an overwhelming majority for a Socialist society, or to the unimpassioned interest with which the progress of British socialism, against tremendous odds, has been reported ever since.

Let me make it clear, before the shouting begins, that I am not complaining because liberals and radicals threw their hats in the air when the Russian Revolution took place. What troubles me is that the same hats did not go even higher, but on the contrary were played close to the head, at the advent of socialism in Britain. For it is my own deep conviction that British socialism, granting that it succeeds, will turn out to be infinitely more relevant to the future of Western civilization than Soviet communism.

"Granting that it succeeds" is, I admit, a tall hurdle at a time when Britain and British socialism—and Western civilization—are passing through the darkest of days. But let us assume, for the duration of this article at least, that Professor Toynbee's theory of the Stimulus of Blows and the Stimulus of Pressures is correct.

My reasons will be seen to consist of well-known facts.

1. While the October Revolution took place in a country outside the main stream of Western culture, the British revolution occurred in the very center of that culture, and particularly of its political culture.

2. While the October Revolution was a drastic overturn directed by a small group of Westernized intellectuals in a backward country, the British revolution, as a thousand people have said before me, was a revolution by consent, brought about by the vote, deliberate, free, secret, and peaceful, of the majority of the people of one of the most advanced sectors of Western culture.

No one will question the foregoing facts or their importance. From here on, however, while my facts may not be questioned, many will challenge their importance and more will deny their validity as arguments for my proposition that the British revolution is the most significant event of the twentieth century. And I am quick to admit that some of my reasons for believing that my proposition is correct spring from the very same elements in the British picture as the reasons which "the opposition" would give for arguing that my proposition is false.

3. While the October Revolution involved the shift from one extreme of social organization, feudalism (with a thin veneer of capitalism), to the opposite extreme, the proletarian state, the British revolution involved the shift to a Socialist order from a moribund capitalist order which had already been forced to appropriate many Socialist practices.

4. As a corollary, while the October Revolution repudiated the Russian past in a grand and terrible gesture, British socialism regards the British and the Western past not as a devil to be exorcised but as the matrix of the future.

5. While civil rights and freedom of thought, speech, and inquiry were, for reasons good, bad, and indifferent, not inherent in the October Revolution and are still, after thirty years, non-existent in the Soviet Union, the British revolution was accomplished without the sacrifice of these great Western concepts. On the contrary, they were the machinery by which the change from capitalism to socialism was effected.

6. As a corollary, while political fanaticism has from the beginning until now played a decisive part in the Soviet experiment, it has played and promises to play none whatever in the British experiment.

I NEED not be reminded that it is the very gradualism (point 3) of British socialism and its refusal to repudiate the past (point 4) which, as they have been manifested in Bevin's foreign policy—especially in respect to Greece and Palestine—have brought down the execration of Western liberals and radicals.

Britain's Socialist government has pursued an imperial policy in Greece and Palestine. But the same government at the same time has pursued a Socialist policy—and in a big way—by granting unconditional freedom to India. Place the two policies side by side and consider them in the perspective not of days but of a relatively few years, and I do not see how it is possible to deny that the granting of freedom to India is by far the more significant of the two—in itself and as an indicator of the future course of British foreign policy—if only for the simple reason that freeing India was an enormous step in the breaking up of the British Empire. And this process, along with the socialization of Britain itself, must inevitably weaken and eventually remove the very motivations that determine the present policy in Greece and Palestine. But the two policies have not been considered in relation to each other. They have been execrated or praised separately, and so great has been the preoccupation with Greece and Palestine that the granting of freedom to India has been treated as if it were a side issue if not some kind of Indian rope trick. Here again, a great event for which liberals and radicals have been crying their hearts out for generations has been greeted with a few perfunctory cheers. Inevitably the violence in Greece and Palestine overshadowed the quaint ceremony replete with ancient ritual by which the King of England peacefully renounced his claim, of two hundred years standing, to be Emperor of India.

Lenin's foreign policy was a complete reversal of that of the czars. Today, thirty years later, the Kremlin's policy is in great part not only a reversal of Lenin's but a continuation of traditional pre-Soviet policy. And this cannot be explained entirely in terms of the external situation—the fact that the Soviet Union is "encircled" by capitalism. It also indicates that whatever the extent and scope of Socialist development within Russia, that development has not yet swept away the old motivations.

Bevin's foreign policy has been a continuation, not a reversal, of the imperial Churchill's. The significant thing is that the continuity which these stodgy British insist upon has not only allowed for an imperialist policy in Greece and Palestine but also for the granting of freedom to India. And there is another point: while only a Socialist government would have taken this latter step without further long-drawn-out resistance, even the British Tories had accepted, willingly or unwillingly, the loss of India as a natural sequence in British history. There is small likelihood, therefore, that it will or can be reversed. And it seems to me logical to believe that thirty years from now the present policy in Greece and Palestine will appear as the vestigial imperialist policy of the first transitional phase of British socialism, while the granting of freedom to India will appear not as a temporary trick but as a foundation stone in the by then established structure of British socialism.

Bevin's policy in Greece and Palestine has also overshadowed, from day to day, the fact that socialization has been going steadily forward in Britain itself. It has, to be sure, been steadily reported, though its great human interest has been slighted. It has even been reported in detail, because there is no censorship, it is close to home, and the facts are on display. For these very reasons perhaps the emphasis has been, not as it was in the first years of the Soviet experiment—when no news was good news—on the larger fact that nationalization was going forward despite tremendous difficulties, but on the smaller fact that socialization in Britain has been slow and too kind to Colonel Blimp—only bad news has been news at all. But again, I think that thirty years from now the fact that the Socialist government moved slowly and overpaid stockholders will look less significant than the fact that the British economy was socialized.

THERE was a time when I shared wholeheartedly the contempt with which many liberals and radicals regard gradualism and any truck with the past. This attitude is particularly attractive to the citizens of a country with a strong penchant for violence and a deep emotional compulsion to forget the past or to regard it as having as little to do with the present and future as last week's newspaper. But my attitude has been somewhat tempered by my observation that beyond certain limits the past cannot be repudiated and that gradualism is not a theory subject to belief or disbelief but a process of history. I cannot help recognizing that today, thirty years after the October Revolution, the deeply engraved pattern of the Russian past is playing at least as decisive a part in Soviet policy, both foreign and domestic, as the blueprint of the Soviet future drawn up by Lenin and Trotsky. And I think there is no question that the Soviet reality will approximate that blueprint only after a gradual process which still has a long time to go.

Herbert Morrison

When I was in Russia in 1935, what impressed me most was the fact that the Soviet Union was a frontier society manifesting the crudeness as well as the energy the term implies. The energy and sense of power were overwhelming. So was my consciousness of a lack of "know-how" which was almost beyond the comprehension of a Westerner so conditioned to skill that he takes it for granted. To watch Russian workmen laying brick was to feel that one could do it better—merely because for a lifetime one had watched American workmen laying brick—and also to realize that such skills are not achieved by a whole population overnight or by decree.

The Russians have made enormous strides but backwardness still plagues them—it could hardly be otherwise, considering the historical stage of the country for which Lenin's blueprint was drawn and the catastrophes to which it has been subjected.

This backwardness is often mentioned in extenuation of Soviet policies, both foreign and domestic. But Western liberals and radicals, it seems to me, have never comprehended the extent to which it has operated in every phase of Soviet activity from the industrialization of Russia to the interpretation of Marx, and of Western ideas in general. Energy has consistently outrun skill. The present handling of the concepts of democracy and freedom is a case in point. This propaganda is generally regarded as "clever" and cynical—and it is both, in part; but in part also it reflects an actual crudity and an actual lack of understanding which Western liberals and radicals, out of their very sophistication in these concepts, are not equipped to recognize. For this and for other very plausible reasons, their response to the phenomenon of the October Revolution and Soviet developments since then has been quite natural—but in terms of their own ultimate goals defeatist.

Sir Stafford Cripps

WESTERN liberals and radicals would not dream of substituting the Soviet industrial "know-how" for that of the West. But they have, wittingly or not, willingly or not, substituted the necessarily limited Soviet version of socialism for the far less straitened, far richer Western version. The whole train of events beginning with the collapse of the Western Socialist movement at the outbreak of World War I and the success of the October Revolution has implanted the assumption that in the end Soviet communism was the only likely left alternative to capitalism. Liberals and radicals have been constrained, in a word, to feel—with emotions ranging from devotion to dismay—that the ultimate choice lay not between Soviet communism and Western socialism but between Soviet communism and Western capitalism.

As a result, liberals and radicals of the pro-Stalinist persuasion have been put in the impossible position of defending, if only by default, the Soviet denial of civil liberties and freedom of speech and inquiry, secret police and concentration camps, party fanaticism, intense nationalism, and the distortion of facts and ideas to fit ideological and nationalist patterns on the dangerous assumption that they were not the manifestations of Russian backwardness but the inevitable and excusable accompaniments of Soviet progress. At the other extreme, liberals and radicals of the anti-Stalinist persuasion have been put in the equally impossible position of being almost ready to support a preventive war on the Soviet Union under capitalist auspices.

Thus the obsession with Soviet communism as the only alternative led to and has progressively deepened the tragic rift on the left; it has also had much to do with another tragic development, the abnegation of the Western ideal of socialism. And one of the terrible by-products of all this is the widespread assumption that socialism is by its very nature totalitarian.

The great significance of the advent of socialism in Britain is that it offers another alternative—a democratic socialism democratically achieved. Since this is an alternative that most of the left could accept, it offers a basis for the rebuilding of unity. And, just as important, since it has at least a fighting chance of success, it justifies the rehabilitation as a positive force of the Western ideal of socialism. For if British socialism is successful, it cannot help being the first step toward a democratic Socialist Europe.

THIS perspective may be too long and too happy. Accept it for a moment, and it will be seen to offer great advantages merely as a tentative approach. The issue of Soviet communism, whether as millennium or menace, is retired as the central issue on the left. The positive program of fighting for a democratic socialism takes its place.

Best of all, in this perspective the position of the Soviet Union vis-à-vis the West takes on a far less frightening aspect.

It is quite true, I think, that the Soviet Union as it is now constituted cannot exist in the same world with the Western democracies except under an armed truce which may at any moment, by accident or design, explode into war—and what a war! It is equally true, I think, that Soviet communism as it is now constituted could not maintain itself very long in a Europe which had achieved democratic socialism. But the pressure which a democratic Socialist Europe would inevitably exert on Soviet communism would be not the threat, at the government level, of military destruction but the peaceful and irresistible pressure of people on people.

The possibilities of this process are discernible even now in the theater of Eastern Europe if, again, one lifts one's eyes from today's newspaper and takes a somewhat longer view. Soviet communism is winning the battles—and the elections. It is getting away with the suppression of political parties and the purging of individual opponents. But the emergence of the police system from the shadowy, sealed, backstage recesses of Russia to the full-lighted stage of Europe, and its application to "people we know," exposes that system for the first time to the actual observation and the judgment of the West. So far the spectacle has served, it would seem, only to increase the defeatism, happy or unhappy, which afflicts Western liberals and radicals—and for plausible reasons. It is all too easy to see in what ways Soviet communism is acting upon Eastern Europe. It is not so easy to see or to recognize evidence that it is being acted upon. But surely evidence of this sort is to be found in the Soviet denunciation of Western influence and of Russians who have "succumbed" to it, in Russia's campaign, concurrent with its movement into Europe, to discredit Western democracy, and its present attempts to justify its procedure in the countries it dominates.

It is meanwhile becoming clearer every day that Eastern Europe cannot be sealed off from Western Europe—Molotov went back to Moscow, but the trade pacts multiply. With a democratic Socialist Europe pressing upon it, Eastern Europe could turn out to be not the opening wedge of totalitarian communism moving west but the opening wedge of democratic socialism moving east, bringing in its wake the prosperity, peace, and genuine security in which the police state must wither away.

A SOCIALIST Europe, democratic and strong, would also go far toward combating the backward elements in the United States.

At the moment a Europe struggling toward democratic socialism and federation is caught between two backward giants—the U. S. A. and the U. S. S. R. The backwardness of the United States in relation to Europe lies primarily in the government's refusal to accept (1) the fact that the United States cannot get along without a prosperous Europe, and (2) the fact that Europe cannot afford and does not want a capitalist order. This is a menacing backwardness—which operates in every phase of official American activity; yet the pragmatic compulsion of the capitalist United States to support a Socialist Britain offers a point of pressure not to be overlooked. Neither should we forget that the present Administration—moving toward 1948—is very sensitive to the influence of labor and in general of opinion left of center as well as to the influence of the right. Through the application of pressure, the present Administration can be persuaded, out of an assortment of motives, to give aid to both Britain and Europe—and that aid can be turned to Socialist uses.

If my perspective makes any sense at all, then the main job of liberals and radicals is to unite—and unite quickly—on a program of fighting for democratic socialism in Europe, beginning with democratic socialism in Britain, not only as a goal in itself but as the only development that can prevent an insane atomic war and insure a peaceful prosperous world enjoying both security and freedom.

This does not mean that the Socialist experiment in Britain should not be criticized. Though its difficulties should be given just weight—as they have assuredly not been so far—it should, since so much depends upon its success, be constantly analyzed in terms of the Western ideal of socialism.

Soviet communism should be subjected to the same test. It has given the West lessons in energy and economic planning. Western socialism can give—is under obligation to give—Soviet communism lessons in civil rights, in freedom of thought and inquiry, those "skills" which were created and have been developed over a long period of time.

There are psychological obstacles to the program I suggest. One is the traditional American feeling toward Great Britain. It appears most often as anti-British; it is actually a feeling of ambivalence. But whatever its ingredients, this feeling makes it very difficult for Americans to work up enthusiasm for anything British.

Another is the obsession with Soviet communism, either for or against, as the only alternative. It will not be easy to dispel, even though the reason for it has lost much of its force. It has become a vested emotional interest, and Soviet propaganda is not designed to make it less so.

Still another, and very serious, obstacle is the half-conscious infatuation with violence and with power ruthlessly exercised, with the consequent carelessness of human life and minimizing of the human individual. This tendency was inevitable in a generation conditioned to cataclysm, to the mass murder of war, to the plausible, though illusory and in the end suicidal, belief that only violence works.

This complex of attitudes helps to explain why the facts (my point 5) that civil liberties and freedom of thought and inquiry remain intact in Britain and (point 6) that fanaticism—except for Churchill's resort to it—played no part in the shift to socialism have been so little stressed. To be sure, these facts, especially in the British contest, are about as newsworthy as the notation that a never-failing well has not gone dry. But their immense significance, for Britain, for Europe, and the world, is not thereby reduced.

Socialism, according to the Western ideal, is not merely a form of economic organization but a way of life. It envisages not the relinquishment of any of the

Drawings from life
by Oscar Berger

Emanuel Shinwell

goods of the Western past, in particular the great and still beautiful concepts of freedom for which our ancestors fought and died, but the addition to these goods of other goods—economic justice and social security. For while it is perfectly true that political democracy without economic justice is not enough, it is also true that without political democracy economic justice cannot long endure.

Western socialism also looks forward to the extension of all these goods to the whole world. And in a world which can afford them all, who can believe that its peoples will ever settle, or settle down, for less?

Chicago Has One More Chance

BY HOMER A. JACK

Chicago, August 30

ON AUGUST 13-16 the southwestern part of Chicago was the scene of the most serious racial disturbances since the widespread riots of 1919. Miraculously, nobody was killed, and the disorder was confined, but Chicago swayed dangerously on the brink of a city-wide riot.

Soon after the war Chicago began to experience violence in connection with the moving of Negroes into so-called "white" areas. The homes of Negroes were stoned and often were set afire with "Molotov cocktails." Since V-J Day there have been almost a hundred different attacks upon the person or property of Negroes—and occasionally upon other minorities. The disturbances came to a head at Airport Homes in December, 1946, when five thousand white neighbors marched on an emergency veterans' housing project because two Negro veterans and their families had been given leases. Policemen were hurt, cars were overturned, and a strong police detail had to guard the project for months, but the two Negro families stayed until one of their members was almost killed last February by the bullets of an unseen assailant. Airport Homes is an all-white project today, and residents of the neighborhood take pride in telling how they kept it so.

One of the last veterans' projects to be finished in Chicago was Fernwood, in a neighborhood where trouble was not unexpected. With the moral support of neighborhood newspapers, especially the Calumet Index, and of so-called "improvement" associations, such as the Fernwood-Bellevue Civic Association, the local alderman, Reginald Dubois, repeatedly said he could not guarantee there would be no repercussions in the neighborhood if some of the apartments in the project were leased to Negro veterans. Mr. Dubois begged the Chicago Housing Authority and its director, Elizabeth Wood, to by-pass its non-discriminatory policy just this once. But the authority, mindful of its public trust and of state statutes forbidding it to discriminate, went right down its list of 25,000 applications. And of the eighty-seven veterans assigned apartments at Fernwood, eight happened to be Negroes.

Move-in day was Tuesday, August 12. Crowds gathered that evening but did no damage. It should be emphasized that the white veterans in the project were not among them. On the second evening things began to get out of control. The police, 168 strong, made the tragic mistake of not dispersing the crowds as they gathered in the twilight. After dark the mob marched on the project, and two police lieutenants trying to keep it back were hurt with stones. The rioters then surged on to an adjacent arterial highway and stopped automobiles. They smashed fenders and threw stones through the windows of cars, mostly those containing Negroes. A number of Negroes required hospital treatment; only two persons were arrested.

On the third evening, despite an augmented detail of 365 policemen, the mob came close enough to the project to stone it and break the windows of three apartments occupied by white veterans. Prevented again from attacking the buildings or burning them, the crowd—estimated at five thousand people—made forays as far as a mile from the project to attack automobiles occupied by Negroes. Eighteen arrests were made that third night. One of the injured told me this story:

I live in Morgan Park [a Negro community about a mile southwest of the housing project] and on Wednesday about midnight I decided to drive to the lake with my girl—it was so hot. We were rerouted off Halsted Street by police. Riding in my convertible roadster with the top down, we were waiting for the light to change at 103d Street when a brick was thrown at us. A crowd of about five hundred whites were on the street corner. I only saw three policemen. The brick hit my head and also my girl. I stepped on the gas and was able to get away. The police did nothing. At the hospital they told me I had a fractured skull.

HOMER A. JACK is executive secretary of the Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination. A Unitarian minister, he is national president of the Unitarian Fellowship for Social Justice and secretary of the Chicago Division of the American Civil Liberties Union.

After these three evenings of violence Thomas Wright of the Mayor's Commission on Human Relations and I had an early-morning conference with Mayor Martin H. Kennelly. We pointed out to the Mayor that proper police protection should be afforded or the militia should be called out. That evening, Friday, 1,000 police were assigned to Fernwood, the largest detail ever assigned in Chicago except for Presidential protection. Negroes continued to be attacked, however, and attempts were made to drag some off street cars and buses more than a mile from the project. One hundred and eighteen arrests were made, mostly of boys and men under twenty-five who lived within a mile and a half of Fernwood, though some came from as far as four miles away. A college student who was sent to observe the rioting reported as follows:

One of the agitators in the mob yelled that if they could stop the traffic, the cops would have to straighten it out, at which time the crowd could break through the weakened police lines and rush the project. So the traffic was impeded. Then a boy shouted, "Nigger, Nigger." A stone flew, a safety-glass window crunched. And there started a bloody game of "bash their dirty brains in" which continued unchecked for almost twenty minutes. Every Negro-driven car was attacked, its windows smashed, and its occupants bombarded with heavy stones as it slowly traversed the traffic bottleneck.

The next day there were evidences that Mayor Kennelly wanted to find "a solution" to the situation. Since he turned to the Chicago Housing Authority and not to the police department, it was inferred that he sought some way of ousting Fernwood's seven Negro families (one had failed to move in). Civic groups immediately prepared to fight to keep the seven Negroes in the project and arranged a meeting with Mayor Kennelly on Saturday afternoon, at which Professor Louis Wirth of the University of Chicago and the American Council on Race Relations acted as their spokesman. The Mayor indicated that he would back up the Chicago Housing Authority and promised a public statement of policy. He had made no announcement, however, a week after the conference. The situation is complicated by the coming referendum for a bond issue for public housing; this will almost certainly be voted down now as a result of the Fernwood violence.

During the disorders civic groups were busy trying to prevent them from spreading. The first need was to stiffen the city policy. The second was to allay the fears of the Negro community and prevent retaliation. As a whole the Negro community acted with rare restraint, although on the fifth and sixth nights there were a few cases of counter-violence.

TWO weeks after the rioting there is an uneasy armed truce in Fernwood, with at least 700 policemen still guarding the project. It is widely rumored that the neighborhood's residents are waiting until the large police detail is removed, when they will drive the Negroes out and burn down the whole project if necessary. Because of the continuing tension, forty-one civic groups have presented a ten-point program to Mayor Kennelly and other civic officials which they feel must be put into operation at once if Chicago is to be spared further racial warfare. The program is so applicable to most other Northern metropolitan centers that a summary of it is given here.

1. The Mayor should, by public statement, reaffirm the policy of the city to protect the person and property of all its residents regardless of race, religion, or national origin.

2. Public officials, including judges of the courts, the corporation counsel, the state's attorney, and officials of all other social-service and investigative departments should take steps, which they generally have not done, to promote the speedy and vigorous prosecution of cases arising out of the Fernwood incident and any other instances of violence against racial or religious minorities.

3. The state's attorney and other appropriate agencies should investigate the possibility that the disturbances at the Fernwood project were the result of organized activity and a conspiracy to deprive people of their civil rights, and if such investigation discloses the existence of such organized activity and conspiracy, seek indictment and vigorous prosecution. There is cumulating proof that the racial violence at Fernwood as in other sections of Chicago was well organized, and that it had the approval of a network of so-called neighborhood-improvement associations.

4. The radio and the metropolitan and neighborhood press should assume continuing responsibility for the way in which they report incidents of racial and religious violence.

5. All organizations in the Fernwood and adjacent neighborhoods, especially churches, industries, unions, veterans' posts, parent-teacher associations, women's clubs, libraries, movies, and parks, should embark upon a program of education and action designed to eliminate further violence and increase the possibility of harmony within that area. One of the most difficult tasks has been the establishment of a beachhead in the immediate neighborhood of the housing project. Tentative conversations with the ministers of the Fernwood area show that churchmen behave little differently from non-churchmen in these situations. And yet the church and the volunteer welfare agencies have the best opportunities to combat overt bigotry.

6. The police department should institute a thorough-going examination of the racial and religious attitudes of its personnel, work out a comprehensive system of policing in racial and religious tension situations, and set up a training program in inter-group relations under competent direction. If any one factor fanned the friction at Fernwood, it was the initial inept policing. The order apparently went out for the police not to make arrests unless absolutely necessary. And many Chicago policemen are too prejudiced to act impartially in a mêlée caused by racial hostility.

7. The superintendent of schools and the officials of other school systems in the city should take cognizance of the current tensions which have recently given rise to violence and put into effect at the earliest possible moment a sound program of intercultural education, including the evaluation of teachers' attitudes in our public and private schools, especially in Fernwood and adjacent neighborhoods.

8. The acute housing shortage in Chicago should be dealt with by comprehensive planning, using both public and private enterprise, and the Chicago Housing Authority's non-discriminatory policy should be continued and supported. The violence at Fernwood once more emphasizes the fact that Chicago, for all its official and unofficial housing programs and committees, has not begun its post-war housing program. Indeed, since V-J Day more houses in Chicago have had to be abandoned because they have fallen down or for other reasons than have actually been built. The task is big enough for both private and public enterprise, and confidence in the efficiency of the Chicago Housing Authority must be maintained, despite the bitter attacks on its non-discriminatory policies and on its personnel.

9. In view of its demonstrated effective work the Mayor's Commission on Human Relations should be strengthened by increased resources and by enactment of a city ordinance giving it permanent and statutory status.

10. In order to correct the basic causes of prejudice and tension, the recommendations of the commissions of the Chicago Conference on Home Front Unity should be put in effect so as to eliminate as quickly as possible discrimination against Negroes and any other groups in the fields of employment, housing, health, education, recreation, and the enjoyment of civil rights.

There is no short cut to racial peace, as Charles Abrams pointed out in The Nation recently. The ten foregoing suggestions may help to delay, and perhaps even prevent, violence. But fundamentally, the causes of prejudice are the devices which keep peoples apart. And so the long-run, day-by-day procedures for lessening discrimination in all areas of society and against all minorities must be continued and accelerated if Chicago is to be saved. Chicago has one more chance.

Letter from Italy

BY MARIO ROSSI

Rome, August 30

THE Italian people are so deeply engaged in trying to solve the elementary problems of existence that political events, domestic and foreign, interest them only as their own situation is immediately affected. They are very skeptical about any promise of aid until they actually feel its results. Thus they are not excited by America's cancellation of the Italian debt or even by the Marshall plan. They do not realize that cancellation of the debt will leave Italy more dollars with which to buy grain in the United States and Argentina; they will be grateful only when they see the bread on their table.

One cannot blame them for this attitude, for food rations are terribly inadequate, and the government seems to be doing nothing to regulate consumption, increase production, and stop the inflation. Pietro Nenni, leader of the Italian Socialist Party, wrote recently in Avanti: "We are about the only country in Europe where the only limit to consumption is the money which people have at their disposal. . . . A sort of madness for spending has seized the rich and, we must admit, also the healthier layers of the population. . . . Indiscipline in the field of consumption has its repercussion in the economic and financial fields. The lack of any sense of responsibility in the leading classes is corrupting the whole nation."

The masses know that a closed caste is already so solidly entrenched that no true democracy or social justice is possible. And this perhaps explains the continuous trend toward the left shown in the recent local elections. There are today two million unemployed, which means that ten million persons, about one-fourth of the population, are without even the minimum necessities of life. This is the country's fundamental problem, and one doubts that any Marshall plan could solve it. For lack of raw materials and coal, industrial production today has dropped to 60 or 65 per cent of its pre-war level, but even full production would not absorb all the unemployed.

The Marshall plan has become much less attractive for Italy since the countries of Eastern Europe refused to cooperate. Before the war one-fifth of Italian trade was with these countries, and they represent a market that Italy cannot replace. Germany used to take 70 per cent of the Italian production of vegetables and fruits in exchange for coal, iron and steel, machinery, and chemical products. Italy has therefore asked to be heard before the Allies make any decision affecting the future of Germany. Italy, moreover, shares France's concern about security. Important Americans who have been in Rome recently have spoken of the necessity of building up Germany to prevent it from going Communist. The average Italian fears that America wants to make Germany the economic center of Europe and that Italy's economic dependence will mean political dependence.

MARIO ROSSI is The Nation's correspondent in Italy.

While the masses are inclined to wait and see, politically informed persons are asking a few questions. They realize that without help from America the country would have starved, but they do not forget that the United States is trying frantically to build up anti-Communist forces in Western Europe and to achieve this end is lending its support to the reactionary elements which are preventing the political, social, and economic changes so necessary if Italy is to become a progressive democracy. Many Italians are well aware that if they are being treated kindly it is because they are included in larger schemes. In other words, they fear that they are becoming more and more the pawns of forces which they cannot control. And after so many years of rule by armies of so many foreign nations they feel a strong urge to be once more the masters of their own destiny. This is a naive feeling, perhaps, in an age of super-states, when two nations are drafting policy for the rest of the world, but it must be considered nevertheless.

I DO not believe that American help in itself will buy De Gasperi more votes at next spring's general elections. The people know that certain fundamental social and economic reforms are urgently needed and that De Gasperi is not willing to carry them out. Had he really meant to do so, as he has promised so many times, he would not have formed a Cabinet representing exclusively the interests of the big industrialists and land-owners or have sought the support in Parliament of the extreme right, which is determined to maintain the status quo.

It is interesting to recall the conditions laid down by the right for its support of the last De Gasperi Cabinet. "Christian Democracy," said the Uomo Qualunque leader, Giannini, "is a great bourgeois party, is a Qualunquist party without knowing it. . . . It is Christian Democracy that has changed by coming closer to us; we have not moved toward it." His meaning was quite clear: the extreme rightist Uomo Qualunque will support Christian Democracy as long as it remains "a Qualunquist party without knowing it," and follows the same line. Should the government act in any way displeasing to Giannini, whose party has only 35 seats out of 556, he would withhold his support and that would be the end of De Gasperi's present ministry.

Italian liberals point out that there is nothing very strange in the Christian Democrats having gone over openly to the right. Even while sharing power with the Socialists and Communists, the Christian Democrats were strengthening their ties with the opposition. In the Rome municipal elections they joined forces with the Uomo Qualunque to prevent a candidate of the popular front from becoming mayor of Rome. In Sicily, where the popular front won a strong plurality, they made a deal with the Uomo Qualunque and the Monarchists to elect a Qualunquist president of the regional parliament in exchange for an entirely Christian Democratic regional administration.

To go farther back: at the referendum of June 2, 1946, six out of eight million Christian Democrats voted for the monarchy. And as for their record of anti-fascism, the 207 Christian Democratic deputies spent an aggregate of 3 years in jail and 2 in concentration camps during Mussolini's regime, while 219 Socialist and Communist deputies spent an aggregate of 295 years in jail, 17 in concentration camps, and 124 in confinement in penal islands; 3 were sentenced to death in absentia.

But the best proof of Fascist influence in the present government is the men who compose it. Luigi Einaudi, Vice-Premier in charge of financial matters, is a convinced monarchist and the president of Italy's biggest bank, the Banca d'Italia. The Minister of Transportation, Guido Corbellini, joined the Fascist Party on May 10, 1926, and on June 21, 1928, became an officer of the Fascist militia. The Minister of Merchant Marine, Paolo Cappa, supported Fascism before the March on Rome and was accused by the Socialist martyr Giacomo Matteotti of being an informer. The Minister of Foreign Commerce, Cesare Merzagora, is the director general of the Pirelli firm, one of Italy's most powerful industrial companies. Guido Gonella, Minister of Public Instruction, has been foreign editor of the Vatican's official organ, the Osservatore Romano. The High Commissioner for Food, Vittorio Ronchi, was head of the Ministry of Agriculture under Mussolini. The Minister of Justice, Giuseppe Grassi, is a southern land baron and president of a reactionary landowners' association.

Drawing by Lilly Ross
De Gasperi

Having come to power with the support of the Monarchists and Qualunquists, the Christian Democratic Party faced the problem of how to maintain itself in power as long as possible. With general elections due in October, it had a mere three months to get its own men placed securely in strategic positions. It therefore undertook what even Don Sturzo has called a coup d'état and managed to postpone the elections till spring.

Unless the "radical right" withholds its support, and that seems most unlikely, the new Cabinet will now have many months of life, time enough to fill the civil service with its faithful followers. Even before the last Cabinet crisis, when the situation was very confused, the Minister of Public Instruction, Gonella, dismissed many provincial superintendents of education appointed by the Resistance and the Allies and replaced them with men of his own party. Gonella has been repeatedly accused of trying to discourage state schools in order to strengthen religious schools.

The Minister of the Interior, Mario Scelba, has replaced a number of provincial governors (prefetti) with men more to his liking. And in a highly centralized state such as Italy the Minister of the Interior can exercise so much power through the provincial governors and the police chiefs that the left has reason to be worried. Its newspapers warn of preparations made to influence the coming elections. While it participated in the government, even as a junior partner, the left was assured that no measure would be taken against it without its knowledge. It has now been deprived of that sense of security. And the result can be dangerous in a country so sharply divided on political issues as Italy.

Fight for Freedom in the Arctic

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Meilakatta, Alaska

IN THE high school at Nome sixteen-year-old Alberta Schenck read about Thomas Jefferson. Before the junior class she recited the wonderful lines entitling all people to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Certainly Thomas Jefferson must have felt that every girl ought to be able to go to a moving picture starring Tyrone Power or Gary Cooper, especially if she was escorted by a soldier in the United States army. That must have been what Thomas Jefferson meant by "the pursuit of happiness."

So Alberta stayed right in her seat when the manager of the theater ordered her over to the section "reserved" for half-breeds and natives. The Declaration of Independence said nothing about having to sit apart from other people because one of your parents happened to be an Indian. Alberta had learned in school that Indians and Eskimos lived in Alaska many centuries before the first white men landed there. Her ancestors, she had been told, had seen H. M. S. Discovery, Captain George Vancouver commanding, sail up Cook's Inlet in 1794.

But the manager of the theater apparently knew nothing of Thomas Jefferson or H. M. S. Discovery. Nor did the Nome police, for Alberta was seized by two constables and forced up the aisle and out into the raw March wind from off the Bering Sea. Her soldier escort tried to comfort her, but Alberta was more indignant than tearful. She remembered what the founders of America had said about "redress of grievances." She was not quite sure what this meant, but she had a vague idea.

Alberta went to the headquarters of the Army Signal Corps and sent a telegram to the Governor at Juneau, 1,100 frozen miles away. In it she told the Governor what had happened in the theater, and not wanting to deplete the territorial treasury, she suggested that he answer her "collect." She reminded the Governor that her escort was an American soldier, and that her father had fought in World War I and both her brothers in World War II. She had paid the same price as white people to go to the show. Most of all, Alberta wanted the Governor to do something "to better conditions at once."

Today Alberta Schenck can sit where she pleases in any theater in Alaska. She can have her hair waved at any beauty parlor; she can order dinner in the main dining room of the Baranof in Juneau or any other hotel; she can enjoy what her school books told her are the inalienable rights of every American.

Indians, Eskimos, and Aleuts make up 40 per cent of the population of Alaska. They are descended from the RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is an Oregon journalist who served in Alaska during the war. He revisited the Territory last summer and has been writing for The Nation on various phases of Alaskan life.

Territory's original owners, the people who dwelt in Alakh-Skhak, the "Great Country," long before the white man took gold from its rivers and a king's ransom in furs from its animals. They form one of the largest minorities to be found in any land under American sovereignty; but before Alberta spoke up, they were discriminated against and often segregated. At the entrance to public places they encountered signs which warned, "We do not cater to native trade." This bigotry so permeated the atmosphere that during the war many American garrison commanders issued orders forbidding their soldiers to dance or associate in any way with Indian or Eskimo girls.

When the first invasion of American soil in nearly a century and a half took place on Kiska and Attu, Alaskans became aware that if the Japanese moved along the Aleutian Peninsula and struck at the mainland, the fate of the Territory might depend on the resistance of scattered Eskimo tribes. In the haste of the crisis the Alaska Territorial Guard was formed. An officer who could speak the native tongue, Major Marvin Marston, hurried by sled and plane from village to village drilling the Eskimos in guerrilla defense. Behind him trudged quartermaster units handing out old Winchesters and blue shoulder patches to sew on reindeer parkas. If the invader landed at one of Alaska's countless inlets or coves, the natives were to wage a desperate Fabian warfare until the alarm was given and the bombers of the Great White Father could come.

The natives might not be allowed to share a restaurant table with the white man or sit next to him in a dingy theater, but they proudly wore the shoulder patches and bought war bonds with their tribal funds. In igloos and fur huts Marston found pictures of President Roosevelt and General Eisenhower. "We got $10,000 reindeer money," a venerable Eskimo said to him. "Tell President Roosevelt we buy $10,000 war bonds."

The white population learned of the loyalty and sacrifices of the natives from Ernest Gruening, the first governor of Alaska ever to visit the far-flung villages along the Arctic Ocean and the Bering Strait. Gruening was also the first governor to condemn the prevalent discrimination. After almost eight decades of American rule the Indians and Eskimos found that at last they had a champion in the white-columned Governor's House at Juneau.

At a Thlingit village along the Inside Passage Gruening said to the Alaska Native Brotherhood, "Since I have been governor, I can assure you that nothing has been more offensive to me than to see the sign 'No Natives Allowed.'" He urged the natives to take part in politics, to vote in the territorial primaries and at the general election. "It is necessary," he said, "that the native people be truly a part of the electorate in proportion to their numbers and make their voice and their vote felt."

This had an ominous sound to Alaska's machine politicians, who have always feared full participation in politics by the large native minority. They called the Governor an "interloper" and "outsider," although they accepted with equanimity the domination of Alaska's fisheries and gold mines by outside corporations. They even tried, without success, to get the President to send a new executive to Juneau.

When a bill was introduced in the territorial legislature banning discrimination "on racial grounds" in any public place, a member of the territorial legislature opposed it because the white

Drawing by Seligson
Ernest Gruening

man "represented 2,000 years of civilization and culture, whereas the natives of Alaska are but fifty years removed from savagery." The member also claimed that laws could not end prejudice and intolerance. He was answered by Mrs. Roy Peratrovich, president of the Alaska Native Sisterhood. She said that seldom before had a person "but fifty years removed from savagery had the opportunity to acquaint the product of two thousand years of civilization and culture with the contents of the United States Constitution." She then read the Bill of Rights, and concluded with these words: "I know that laws will not end prejudice and intolerance. We have laws against arson and murder, and yet still we have arson and murder. But at least we let it be known that civilized people are against that sort of thing. The natives of Alaska may be only fifty years removed from savagery, but we believe that our government should let it be known that we are against prejudice and intolerance."

The bill was passed in the Senate by a vote of seven to one. It failed in the House by a tie vote. But now the natives took the advice of the Governor. They put up their own candidates for the legislature and elected them. And at the next session the House passed the bill, nineteen to five. Perhaps prejudice and intolerance can be dealt body blows. Not one case has had to be brought under the new law. Display of one of the old anti-native signs would be punished by a fine of $250 and a month in jail. It would cost a Nome policeman his star to force Alberta Schenck from her theater seat now.

Andrew Hope and Frank Peratrovich, Indians who hold seats in the House and Senate, have been elected and reelected from southeastern Alaska, the long "pan-handle" in which natives make up only 25 per cent of the population. "This is an indication," Governor Gruening points out, "that individual ability and merit are stronger than prejudice. It is also sound proof of how baseless this prejudice is."

Great doors on tiny hinges swing; and Ernest Gruening's championing of the natives may have swung the most important referendum in Alaskan history. When the Territory voted on statehood last October, the corporations lined up in a well-financed phalanx against the proposal. They were afraid membership in the Union would increase their taxes and loosen their grip on Alaska's natural wealth. Many white voters were influenced by the taxation argument, for Alaska has been the most lightly taxed entity under the American flag.

But statehood carried—by the unofficial margin of 9,565 to 6,820. Gruening stumped the Territory speaking for it, from the frozen shores of the Polar Sea to the spruce-clad coast within sight of the British Columbia railhead of Prince Rupert. And the natives stood by the man who had stood by them. The Indian villages voted more overwhelmingly for statehood than any white community. The question was decided in large measure by the people who not long ago could be dragged out of a theater if they would not occupy special seats.

"I hope," says Governor Gruening, "that the day may follow when men and women will be regarded as people, as Americans, as Alaskans, on a basis of character and ability only, and not as either 'whites' or 'natives.'"

A Backward Glance in History

BY WALDO R. BROWNE

ALL the passions are boiling over, and he who would keep himself cool and clear of the contagion is so far below the point of ordinary conversation that he finds himself isolated in every society." Thus wrote Thomas Jefferson to a friend in May, 1798. His country at this time was in the grip of acute hysteria, engendered by fear of a foreign power and hatred of a new form of government installed by that power. To the dominant political and economic classes in America, France was the menacing foe and democracy the odious subversive doctrine with which there could be no compromise. A few years before, the soil-grimed peasants and sweaty urban proletariat of France had overthrown the ancient monarchic tyranny, and their excesses had only recently subsided. Terrified by the spread of revolutionary ferment beyond French borders, the despotic governments of Europe, zealously abetted by the Vatican, were employing their ultimate resources of armed force and diplomatic intrigue in an effort to stifle the infant republic, with its dangerous slogan of "liberty, equality, fraternity." But in 1798 the armies of the Revolution were still invincible, both on their own soil and in adjacent countries. Disregarding the treaty of 1778, under which France had come to the aid of our own revolutionary cause, President Washington had given bitter offense to the French by proclaiming American neutrality in the European conflict and by strengthening political ties with France's arch-enemy, Great Britain.

In this atmosphere French-American disputes and misunderstandings and provocative incidents flourished luxuriantly, until in 1798 a "Stop France" movement had attained formidable proportions in the United States, and a virtual state of undeclared war existed between the two countries.

The American war faction, composed in largest part of what James Parton has termed "the silver-forked civilization of the country," was politically organized in the Federalist Party, then holding power, and was led by Alexander Hamilton, whose ideal of government was the "rule of gentlemen" and who believed that democracy could lead only to anarchy. The anti-war and pro-French elements, consisting in the main of small farmers and industrial workers, were led by Thomas Jefferson, champion of popular government and the common man, who thought that revolution every twenty years might not be a bad thing for any country. In the Presidential chair sat the former Vice-President, John Adams, protégé and partisan of the Federalists, a statesman considerably smaller physically and mentally than his illustrious predecessor in office, honest and conscientious but lacking in broad political judgment and obsessed by a dislike nearly as deep as Hamilton's for what he once spoke of as "those democratical principles that have done so much mischief to this country."

With the anti-French hysteria at its culmination in 1798, Hamilton inveighed against France as "a den of pillage and slaughter" and against Frenchmen as "foul birds of prey." In and out of Congress America's recent ally in the war against Great Britain was assailed as "the spawn of revolution" and "the enemy of civilization." Stories of French spy plots and of French landings on the Southern seaboard, with "slaves armed—masters murdered in their beds—churches burned—women outraged—girls kidnaped—horrors piled on horrors," filled the Federalist press. "The clergy were urging the hate of French democracy as a Christian duty, and converting their pulpits into pedestals of Mars." Even such distinguished patriots as Monroe and Gallatin were branded as tools and agents of a hostile foreign power, converts to "the new religion of France"; and typical of the attacks upon Jefferson himself was a contemporary cartoon depicting "Mad Tom in a Rage," endeavoring with the devil's active assistance to pull down a pillar labeled "Federal Government." War measures—then, as always, designated "defense measures"—providing for creation of a navy, a greatly enlarged army, and heavily increased taxes were rushed through Congress under Federalist sponsorship.

WALDO R. BROWNE was literary editor of The Nation in 1919. He is the author of Altgeld of Illinois and Chronicles of an American Home.

Nevertheless, it was becoming evident that the war party had overplayed its hand and that the Jeffersonians' efforts toward sanity and peace were beginning to enlist majority support. Realizing the political consequences if they should fail to foment war with France, the Federalists now sought an effective means of silencing the party of opposition, the party of democracy. In particular, they had long been crying for suppression of those "nests of intrigue and subversion," the local democratic societies organized throughout the country to further political education. In the summer of 1798 the Federalists pressed through Congress three bills directed in one drastic way or another against aliens, and a fourth which imposed heavy penalties on every person, alien or citizen, found guilty of trying to stir up "sedition" or of writing or publishing anything "false, scandalous, or malicious" against Congress, the President, or the Cabinet.

Although little action was taken under the new alien laws, enforcement of the Sedition Act brought an official reign of terror, and "from 1798 until 1801 liberty was mobbed in America with the zealous support of the federal courts, to the applause of the church." But with each prosecution of some prominent Jeffersonian, public opinion showed itself predominantly on the side of the victim, sometimes with rather alarming vehemence. "Thwarted in their plans against the leaders, the terrorists turned upon the weak and lowly, demanding the discharge of Jeffersonian artisans employed in the manufacture of war material. Out with them! 'It is a notorious fact,' complained Fenno, 'that a number of artisans . . . are of politics destructive of the Constitution.'" One of the most flagrant proposals for immolating a prominent citizen under the Sedition Act was directed against Dr. James Logan of Philadelphia, who went to France in 1799 at his own expense and wholly on his own volition in an effort to determine the true state of French opinion toward America. He was a Jeffersonian, a peace-loving Quaker, who felt that his own country had been deceived by war propaganda. Upon his return there were cries that he be prosecuted for "defaming his country abroad" and holding "traitorous intercourse with the democratic conspirers against civilization." But on reflection even the more rabid Hamiltonians drew back from this extreme application of the Sedition Act, and the furor aroused by the Logan incident soon subsided.

The war party continued to rage against Jeffersonian "appeasement," but now with the knowledge that its cause was all but hopeless. "Tracy, who had wanted to arm the women and children against the French, wrote McHenry that while he had sacrificed much 'to root out Democracy,' he thought it 'to be lost and worse,'" and "Jonathan Mason was furious because 'from being respectable in Europe, from having convinced Great Britain, and from having associated with all the friends of Order, Property, and Society . . . we must again become soothers and suppliants for peace from a gang of pitiful robbers.'" The Federalists had gone much too far in their autocratic efforts to suppress opposition opinion and to embroil the country in war. President Adams broke with Hamilton and joined the forces striving for peace, charging in an angry letter that the Hamiltonians were nothing better than "a British faction." With the elimination of several prominent "war hawks" from his Cabinet and the appointment of a conciliatory minister to France, which also adopted a less intransigent attitude, French-American differences were gradually reconciled, and the war hysteria was left little or nothing to feed upon. In 1801 Jefferson succeeded Adams in the Presidency. In his brief inaugural address he said: "If there be any among us who would wish to dissolve this Union, or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it."

If knowledge of past events is chiefly useful as a guide to intelligent action in the present, Americans would do well to ponder the chapter from our early history summarized in barest outline above. (Perhaps the best detailed account for the general reader is contained in Claude G. Bowers's "Jefferson and Hamilton: The Struggle for Democracy in America," a few brief quotations from which are embodied in this outline.) "Those who cannot remember the past," says Santayana, "are condemned to repeat it." And even if any direct relevancy of that chapter to our current crisis be denied and its most obvious lessons rejected, these events of nearly 150 years ago should at least serve as salutary reminder that the seemingly novel perils confronting us today are in reality not novel at all. Only the stage and actors and particular circumstances are new; the drama itself is in all essential elements as old as the beginnings of man's harried progress toward a truly civilized collective existence.

Hay Fever, Arthritis, Longevity

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

EACH year, at about this time, the steadily growing army of hay-fever sufferers become vitally interested in new medical treatments. Dr. D. L. Engelsher, who has been administering the anti-histamine drugs, benadryl and pyribenzamine, gives an account of his experiences with them in the New York State Journal of Medicine. Of 193 patients—ages ranging from three to seventy-nine—who were given benadryl and pyribenzamine on a three-day trial, two-thirds either felt no relief or their condition became aggravated, while of the remaining one-third, 9 per cent showed a marked improvement and the rest had mild relief. Drowsiness, an after-effect of the treatment, occurred in a considerable number of cases and should be emphasized, since it may prove dangerous to persons employed in work involving risk, such as drivers, machine workers, and the like. Dr. Engelsher concludes that although the new drugs have proved helpful to a small percentage of hay-fever sufferers, the vast majority are not sufficiently benefited. But my own experience with the drugs suggests that they are well worth trying, of course under careful medical supervision.

DISCUSSING the new strict controls over the sale of barbiturates in New York City, the official publication of the Medical Society of the County of New York requested the director of the Department of Pharmacology of a New York medical school to discuss whether "the barbiturate addict is just as much a danger to society as the narcotic addict." I quote from his answer:

It seems that what the public needs to know is that the development of addiction to the barbiturates is much more difficult to attain and that short periods of use for mild nervous states and sleeplessness do not result in difficulties. . . . The more severe grades of barbiturate addiction are as difficult to cure as are morphine addiction. . . . Both are maladjusted individuals, incapable psychologically of coping with the problems of life, seeking an escape in the trance-like state of depression by a drug.

IN Medicine (New York) of August 3, 1947, Dr. William B. Rawles gives an interesting evaluation of present-day therapy in rheumatoid arthritis.

Gold therapy: Although this method has been in use for the past eighteen years, there is still a difference of opinion as to its real value. Many patients have discontinued its use because of the frequent toxic reactions. If the gold salts are employed in the early stages of the disease, a marked improvement is felt by 50 to 60 per cent of the patients.

Intravenous injections of procaine have been beneficial in cases of traumatic arthritis and osteoarthritis. Although Vitamin D has been used as a treatment for more than ten years, it has little or no value; other vitamins are useful only for their tonic effect.

Anti-Reticular Cytotoxic Serum: In six of the first group of twenty patients receiving doses of the serum temporary improvement was noted.

X-ray therapy: Although the results of X-ray treatments have been disappointing in peripheral rheumatoid arthritis, it is of considerable value in spinal arthritis. Dr. Rawles reports a marked improvement in 60 to 80 per cent of the cases.

Prostigmin: This is not advocated as a new treatment for arthritis, but it has been found useful in relieving muscle spasm.

Arthritis is still a protean disease: 60 per cent of its victims need thyroid, 40 per cent lack hydrochloric acid, and 40 per cent show liver disturbances. Anemia is often present.

ACCORDING to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, 1947 promises to establish a record low in mortality. The death rate for the first six months of the current year was 7.6 per 1,000 policy holders, 3.8 per cent below that of last year during the same period. One of the favorable factors is the low mortality from influenza and pneumonia, 13 per cent below the previous minimum, recorded in 1945. Deaths from tuberculosis were 8 per cent below the 1945 minimum. Deaths from syphilis have decreased almost 30 per cent in the past decade, from appendicitis more than 70 per cent. This record seems all but incredible; happily it is true.

Among the several millions of insured children, the death rates from measles, scarlet fever, whooping cough, and diphtheria all add up to less than 1.5 per 100,000, which is very remarkable. Deaths from the diseases characteristic of later life have also shown a marked drop this year. The mortality from cardio-vascular-renal diseases has declined 1.2 per cent from that of last year. Diabetes mortality has declined 6 per cent. Even the number of suicides has dropped 7 per cent, and homicides 12 per cent.

If a new war does not rudely interrupt the American health race, we shall certainly fulfil the statistical prediction that by the end of the century 90 per cent of all deaths will be of persons over the age of forty-five.

Del Vayo—The Temper of the French

Paris, September 4

THE third anniversary of the liberation, celebrated throughout France during the past few days, has provided a good opportunity to gauge the present temper of the French people. Two things were immediately apparent: first of all, the commemoration of this historic event, without which France might today be a province of a new German Empire, aroused little popular enthusiasm. Secondly, the separate celebrations organized by the various parties reflected the deep internal divisions that have opened in France.

The government ceremonies were marked by a characteristically cold and solemn tone. Other functions bore an unmistakable party stamp; they were not so much commemorations of French unity during the glorious struggle for liberation as warnings to the opposing faction, issued in an atmosphere of growing hostility.

I spoke with some of the heroes of the Resistance, the real fighters in the five grim years of occupation. They did not hide their disappointment, indeed their bitterness, over these party splits and especially over the attitude of most of the French people, who give the impression, at least to the casual foreign observer, of political apathy, fatigue, or outright indifference. The crowds in the streets listened as loud-speakers blared official speeches on France's mission in the world today and the reconquest of its former greatness; their response was a wry grimace, or one of those pungent comments typical of a people who have lost everything except their wit, or simply a shrug of the shoulders.

But it would be wrong to conclude from all this that France is through, so prostrated and obsessed by food shortages and the prospect of a collapsing currency that it has lost all interest in politics. Many observers wrote France off once before, in 1940; this time an unexpected surge of fighting energy in the French people may prove them wrong again.

Beneath this apparent apathy is the profound disillusionment of those who, throughout the period of resistance, had hoped that a different France and a different world would emerge from the war. Louis Saillant, president of the National Council of Resistance and now secretary of the World Federation of Trade Unions, summed up their attitude in these words: "Most of the European peoples subjugated by the armies of Hitler dreamed that liberation would break the chains that bound them and open an era of political and economic independence. This expectation has been only partly fulfilled." And then Saillant ventured an explanation of Europe's frustration. "Can it be," he asked, "that influential American circles conceived the liberation as a simple restoration, as an investment which ought to pay dividends?" Refusing to accept the widespread notion that the French people were simply incapable of transforming the liberation into a true revolution, Saillant placed the responsibility for the present critical situation squarely on those who intended from the start that the liberation should be nothing more than liberation from the Germans and not from the political and social system which caused the fall of France.

The disproportion between what the Resistance hoped for and what has actually been accomplished in the past three years becomes obvious from reading the texts of the resolutions and demands formulated in the midst of struggle when the Gestapo was torturing and executing any underground workers it could lay hands on. I spent the official holiday going through this literature. Most of the resolutions seem to have been drawn up in much the same atmosphere as that of the 1789 Convention, where the uncompromising austerity of Robespierre and the impassioned speeches of St. Just made history that is still undimmed after a century and a half. The same patriotic ardor animated the underground leaders; they exchanged their guns for pens in the hope of liberating France not only from the Nazis but from the political and economic evils that made possible a retrogressive movement like fascism. For the best men of the Resistance the armed struggle against the invaders was part of the broad struggle against fascism in which my country was the first resistant; reading these underground documents, I was deeply moved by frequent references to the Spanish republic and its heroic fight.

Since varied political tendencies were represented in the French Resistance, the documents do not make clear the nature and the scope of the revolution they planned to set in motion. But in any case it was to be a democratic, anti-capitalist revolution that would destroy once and for all the age-old privileges of the industrial and financial oligarchy gathered at Vichy.

The revolution has been paralyzed, thwarted, but many of the forces which worked for it are still active. They are continuing their activities, apart from official France. That is why they did not participate in the government's liberation ceremonies but chose rather to organize separate demonstrations and meetings. Some have fallen back on themselves, and the visitor unfamiliar with the present situation is apt to assume that they have quit or dispersed. On the other hand, the right, which last year was still cautiously measuring its every step, is now most active and vocal. A realignment of French reactionary forces has taken place. Their propaganda is subtle, audacious, and efficient, adapted to the needs of the day; they are utilizing the same demagogic approach to social questions that has proved so successful for Perón. Their patient, jesuitical politics continues to exploit the mounting popular irritation over high prices and the bread shortage, and to prepare the psychological conditions "for the day De Gaulle decides to move."

[In next week's issue Mr. del Vayo will continue this discussion with an article on De Gaulle and the October elections.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Slender Reed

THE CULTURAL APPROACH: ANOTHER WAY IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS. By Ruth Emily McMurry and Muna Lee. University of North Carolina Press. $3.50.

THIS volume deals not with cultural approaches to international problems but with cultural-relations programs. For ten countries of the world it describes their policies of putting themselves across internationally by means of radio broadcasts, subsidized literature, information centers and national institutes abroad, and bilateral exchange of persons. The United States entered this field late and on a small scale in the years immediately before the last war, but many other nations have included it in their national budgets for a much longer period.

The book examines official statements of policy and the dates at which various programs were adopted, not the content of broadcasts or the character of the personnel exchanged. It quotes official claims of the success of these programs in furthering the special purposes of the initiating nation but does not attempt to make any independent investigation of results. It is therefore a handbook of official pronouncements about this "arm of foreign policy."

The nations examined are pre-war Germany and Japan, Russia, France, Great Britain, certain South American republics, and the United States. They differ hardly at all in their claims that such programs facilitate that country's economic and political advancement beyond its borders. Some nations also add that exchange of persons is a valuable way of getting extensive information about other countries. The larger nations agree that they must combat the propaganda of others. A French deputy rhetorically asked the Chamber of Deputies as far back as 1900, "What political operation or armed invasion was ever able, with less expenditure, to produce such important and lasting results?" As one reads, one is obliged to recognize that cultural-relations programs, though they are bloodless and war is not, are far from being "another way in international relations." We have them because we have also war, and not because we are eliminating war.

Cultural-relations programs have furthered many excellent objectives—from broadcasting daily news to helping a doctor or a nurse get better professional training than was available in his own country. The difficulty is in the nationalistic sponsorship. Radio broadcasts financed on some other basis than because they further economic and political penetration of another country would command more credence. The program for training doctors and nurses and teachers would be less suspect if it were run by an international board of their own profession and financed by groups working for world health and schooling. This is impossible today both because we still live under the threat of war and because only national treasuries are large enough to grant the sums necessary. This fact should not blind us, however, to the recognition that official cultural-relations programs, however honestly they are administered, are structurally ill adapted, in Archibald MacLeish's words in the Introduction, "to improve the mutual understanding of peoples by substituting for the artificial image of the state the human and living image of the people themselves." We must support them because they are what we have in the world as it is, but we shall be deluded if we bank heavily upon them.

RUTH BENEDICT

Radio's Responsibility

THE AMERICAN RADIO. By Llewellyn White. University of Chicago Press. $3.25.

ONE of the great accomplishments of the singing commercial is the fact that it has irritated the public into an interest in what makes radio tick. During the last few years an enormous number of people have learned, to their amazement, that the public owns the broadcast channels, and that radio stations are licensed on the theory that they will serve the "public interest, convenience, and necessity." To this growing awareness of the broadcasters' obligations "The American Radio" makes a very important contribution.

As radio man for the Commission on Freedom of the Press, Llewellyn White was responsible for the draft of the radio sections of that commission's report, "A Free and Responsible Press." The work of the staff consumed numerous man-years, but the report itself was a rather brief pronouncement bearing the signatures of the odd-dozen Caesar's wives who ornamented the commission's letterhead. The commission has, however, made the overflow of its investigations available in a series of volumes signed by its staff members, of which this is one.

"The American Radio," consisting of the research notes which led to the conclusions expressed in the final report, is a compendium of background material on the technology, finances, and politics of radio, dictated chronologically and carefully checked against the knowledge of experts in the field, among whom copies of the draft were circulated. It is a useful if not inspired handbook. The writing is rather uneven because it is apparent that the author has never quite decided—nor does the format make clear—whether he was speaking ex cathedra for the commission or only for himself. This is not to say that the book is inhibited or restrained in tone. Mr. White has very definite opinions. All of them are interesting, but some conflict sharply with others.

For example: On page 198 Mr. White feels that the Federal Communications Commission's "Blue Book" requirement, that stations devote a certain portion of time to public-service programs, is unconstitutional; ten pages later he proposes that the FCC set up schedules of required public service much more detailed than was ever contemplated in the "Blue Book." And he specifically denies the notion that this proposal would be unconstitutional. Then, on page 178, at the same time that he is castigating broadcasters as "men who do not understand the First Amendment," he urges that they be given greater freedom, through the abolition of the "Mayflower" rule, to pursue their personal predilections at the expense of other points of view. (The "Mayflower" rule requires stations to act merely as public forums of ideas, presenting all sides but refraining from adopting any editorial policy of their own.)

Although he expresses a strong belief in freedom of speech, he disagrees with the FCC's unanimous opinion that atheists, no less than spokesmen for religion, are entitled to time on the air for discussion of their views. And he defends the California station which, in an adroit effort to embarrass the FCC, gave time to an atheist at an hour which it knew would offend most listeners—the hour on Sunday which has been used for many years by the Salt Lake City Tabernacle Choir.

Mr. White is at his best in his criticisms of broadcast programs—it is obvious that he put in many long and grueling hours of night work beside his receiver—and he goes to the heart of radio's worst program abuses. As an ex-newspaperman he is shocked by the realization that newspapers, if they were managed as radio is, would sell not only their advertising columns but their news and feature columns as well. Radio stations have delegated to advertisers their responsibility to create programs—practically all of the program service which stations are sworn to perform is delegated to such agencies. Mr. White makes this analogy: "It is rather like a householder who carefully investigates someone to whom he proposes to sublet his home, only to discover that quite another family, about which he knows nothing and which is not bound by any lease to take care of the property, intended to occupy the premises all along." He devotes considerable attention to the National Association of Broadcasters, and clearly reveals the hollow nature of the N. A. B. codes, which, while purporting to be serious documents of self-regulation, are in reality so much public-relations confectionery.

He is concerned most, however, with radio's apparent failure to fulfil its responsibility to keep Americans informed about the current questions which, as citizens in a democracy, they are called upon to decide. Time is short, he feels; the atom bomb is ready, and unless the people of the world quickly arrive at a degree of sanity, we are all surely doomed. Surveys have revealed a shocking lack of knowledge of important subjects. In spite of an extremely high literacy rate and wide access to the radio, people are not getting all the basic information they need in order to vote intelligently. Mr. White finds, as many others have found, that radio has been even more derelict than other media in the performance of its duty to inform.

He makes numerous suggestions for the solution of this problem, but they boil down to these: an exhortation to the radio industry to take its responsibility more seriously and to temper its commercialism with professional standards; a demand that the FCC act more courageously, and listen occasionally to the still, small voice that is usually labeled, "Dissenting Opinion by Commissioner Durr"; a plea to the N. A. B. to improve the industry's ethics; and a suggestion to the public that it make itself heard, both in the stations and in the FCC.

JEROME H. SPINGARN

For Sages and Philistines

APPRECIATION: PAINTING, POETRY, AND PROSE. By Leo Stein. Crown Publishers. $2.50.

WHAT a delightful man Leo Stein must have been—if this book mirrors his personality as faithfully as it seems to. Here is a statement, which, alas, recently proved to be a last testament, of a man who made an appreciation of the arts a living, active, and fundamental part of his life. Without the least trace of snobbery or obscurantism he has stated the bases of his appreciation with a lucidity and directness which should disarm the most ardent of philistines and inform the most erudite of pundits. Perhaps his sister Gertrude, whose "cubist" approach to literature he does not seem to have particularly appreciated, may have been partially responsible for his patently wonderful sense of the value of words, and for his passion for composition both in painting and writing. His tastes might well be considered conservative—among his gods are Shakespeare, Milton, Byron, Giorgione, Cé-

For the first time in English—

Max Weber's

The THEORY of SOCIAL and ECONOMIC ORGANIZATION

Translated with an introductory essay by

Talcott Parsons

The student and the general reader will find here the fullest statement of Max Weber's system of sociological theory. Opening with a discussion of the analytical methods of sociology, it applies these methods to the broad empirical problems of historical structure and change. It is also a significant analysis of broad political, economic and social actions and their consequences. A profound work by a master historian, sociologist and philosopher.

488 pages

At all bookstores • $6.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

114 Fifth Ave., N. Y. 11

zanne—but his enthusiasms have all the novelty that can be engendered by real passion distilled through a sharply analytical mind.

Most of the book is devoted to a statement of what he likes in the way of painting, poetry, and prose, and why he likes it, and this embraces an expression of his personal philosophy, his views on a multitude of subjects, and some excellent critical analysis. He says that his critical analyses are sketchy and impressionistic, but to the reader they seem to be wise without being in the least didactic or pontifical. The remainder of the book is devoted to reminiscences of painters such as Picasso and Matisse—how tactfully he avoids the dreadful intimacies and quaint anecdotes by which such impressions are usually marred—and of life at 27 Rue de Fleurus, where he and Gertrude lived and started assembling their art collection. "Art for art's sake is a silly slogan," says Mr. Stein in the last pages of this book, "and art is only important as an integral part of culture." Certainly it is the fact that he had obviously integrated his own appreciations so thoroughly into his life and culture that makes this such a charming, informative, and human book.

ANTHONY BOWER

New Angle

THE WINE OF VIOLENCE: An Anthology on Anti-Semitism. Edited by Nathan Zuckerman. Association Press. $5.

HISTORIES of anti-Semitism already exist in abundance, and new tracts, many disguised as fiction, issue from the presses hourly. But Mr. Zuckerman has a new angle. In his "Anthology on Anti-Semitism" he assembles quotations, most of them very brief, from a few hundred miscellaneous authorities, including such strange bedfellows as J. Edgar Hoover and Earl Browder, Chaim Weizmann and Adolf Hitler, Ben Hecht and Leo Tolstoy, Theodore Roosevelt and Henri Bergson. There are also liberal selections from the men who would naturally appear in such a book: A. L. Sachar, Maurice Samuel, Ludwig Lewishon, Hugo Valentin, Lee J. Levinger.

Mr. Zuckerman's impersonal method justifies itself mainly in the lively disagreements about causes and cures. Most contributors urge that the fiber of Jewish life be strengthened, although Heywood Brown and others beg the Jews to solve their problem by vanishing. R. C. Rothschild cautions the Jews not to be unpleasantly insistent on their legal rights, while bolder spirits demand new legislation against race hatred. Some curious shades of belief are represented, including one point of view that this reviewer had long thought to have been invented by defenders of Jewish rights in order that they might destroy it with irony: "Let every Jewish student realize that his loud voice and tousled hair will do as much harm to Jewry as a dozen lies from Streicher, and we shall notice a diminution of the apparent discrimination in colleges." It is reassuring to learn from this evidence that Maurice Samuel had not invented his opponent when he criticized those who wish that Moses had brought Emily Post's "Etiquette" from Mount Sinai instead of the Ten Commandments. The conflict of opinion frequently dramatizes these very issues: a choice between "Etiquette" and the Ten Commandments, between an uneasy acceptance of second-class rights and a militant affirmation of democratic privileges.

The technique of the invisible editor frequently serves no purpose, especially when Mr. Zuckerman offers short and snappy value-judgments on anti-Semitism. "Is anti-Semitism moral bankruptcy?" The answer is "Yes!" twelve times. "Is anti-Semitism reactionary?" The answer is "Yes!" seven times. The editorial method becomes downright silly when Mr. Zuckerman selects paragraphs from here and there to write a history of anti-Semitism. The quotations overlap, facts are repeated, new rhetorical turns are employed for the same old entreaties. But once this unique method of assembling a work on anti-Semitism is allowed, the editor makes few additional mistakes. The scientific and economic analyses might have been more strictly segregated from the generous statements of amateurs (Orson Welles, Archbishop Spellman, and Ben Hecht are among the specialists who diagnose anti-Semitism as a disease); a more consistent employment of the distinction between anti-Semitism and anti-Jewishness might have helped give a pattern to the book.

The editor has granted representation to almost every shade of opinion; general disagreement is therefore to be expected. All that seems certain is that a number of Jews appear to be wilfully insistent upon maintaining their existence, their identity, and their rights and that they and their Gentile allies have worked out a variety of programs for survival. Fortunately, most of these programs are not mutually contradictory.

HENRY POPKIN

Prophet of Doom

LEON BLOY: A STUDY IN IMPATIENCE. By Albert Béguin. Sheed and Ward. $2.75.

LÉON BLOY, who in his lifetime suffered—vociferously—from obscurity and want, is coming royally into his own. A very fine book, "Présence de Bernanos," begins with a glowing testimony to the strange and angry master. I reviewed a while ago in The Nation Raïssa Maritain's "Pilgrim of the Absolute." The present work also offers the life and thought of the Ungrateful Mendicant, the scurrilous satirist of "Swine-on-the-Marne." It is not an anthology but a collection of four long essays: Initiation into Suffering; Poverty, Money, and the People of Israel; The Symbolism of History and the Soul of Napoleon; A Prophet of our Catastrophe and His Impatience. It is of high and sustained merit. Its weakness is that it claims for Léon Bloy a solitary grandeur which is fictitious. Bloy was not alone in rejecting "the popular belief in the steady progress of the species and the early advent of a golden age." It would seem as if no one among the modern prophets of doom had read the second Hugo, Leconte de Lisle, Taine, or Sully-Prudhomme.

The American edition of Béguin's book contains a very useful Historical Sketch of the Life and Work of Léon Bloy. Raïssa Maritain had not dwelt on the commanding influence of Anne-Marie Roulé, which was "the Secret of Léon Bloy." (Yet letters on the subject were published by Jacques Maritain in 1936.) Anne-Marie was a prostitute with whom Bloy fell passionately in love. He converted her, but she soared beyond his guidance. She saw visions, announced the end of the world, an apocalypse in which the role of Elijah was reserved for Bloy. She died twenty-five years later in an insane asylum. But according to his hagiologist, "Léon Bloy's inner life was largely determined by these revelations, to which he never ceased to lend the utmost credence." When the validity of the mystic experience is discussed, such facts should not be overlooked.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

In Brief

ATOMICS FOR THE MILLION. By Maxwell Leigh Eidinoff and Hyman Ruchlis. Whittlesey House, McGraw-Hill Book Company $3.50.

HERE is an excellent text for a man with vivid memories of high-school chemistry and physics. It is really an elementary book on atomic physics, very well written and containing lucid explanations of the why and wherefore of things—of matter and energy.

These days all roads lead to the atomic bomb. The many pages devoted to atomic physics are merely a preparation for the understanding of the final explosion. But must the atomic bomb represent the crowning glory of the work of chemists and physicists? No, indeed, if the chemists and physicists, headed by Einstein, Urey, Fermi, and others, have anything to say in the matter. The internal energy of the atom, which we can now tap, must be used for peaceful purposes, and the authors of this text wisely devote some 60 pages out of a total of 270 to this theme.

THE PROBLEM OF REDUCING VULNERABILITY TO ATOMIC BOMBS. By Ansley J. Coale. Princeton University Press. $2.

THIS is a report prepared for a committee of the Social Science Research Council, studying the social and economic aspects of atomic energy. What, if any, are the methods which can be used to reduce vulnerability to atomic warfare? Mr. Coale analyzes this problem. While it becomes obvious that some form of decentralization will be necessary, and primitive cave-dwelling may have to be resuscitated, no specific conclusions are drawn.

BENJAMIN HARROW

THE STORY OF ARCHITECTURE IN MEXICO. By Trent E. Sanford. W. W. Norton and Company. $6.

FOR the first time it has occurred to someone to write a popular book on Mexican architecture. As a matter of fact, it is much the same book about Mexico that we have been given, over and over, for the last ten years, only that this time it is about architecture. There are the same stories, from the same sources; the itinerary is the same; the same buildings are described with the old familiar inaccuracies. But since there is nothing else of the kind that an intelligent tourist can put in his suitcase, we should perhaps not cavil; and in these days any publisher who will "risk" such a book deserves honest praise. The illustrations are excellent, and new, and will help to show that there is architecture in Mexico, and that it is worth going to see.

ELIZABETH WILDER

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

The NATION

- ☐ with Harper's Magazine . . . $8.50 You Save $2.50
- ☐ with Consumers Union . . . $9.75 You Save $1.25
- ☐ with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union . $12.25 You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself:

- ☐ 1 Year $6 ☐ 2 Years $10 ☐ 3 Years $14
 - ☐ SERVICEMEN'S RATE $4 A YEAR
- Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO READERS:

To Subscribers:

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please cooperate by renewing your current subscription on receipt of the first notice of expiration.

To Newsstand Readers:

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

9-18-47

Films

JAMES
AGEE

THE Italian-made "Shoeshine" is about as beautiful, moving, and heartening a film as you are ever likely to see. I will review it when I am capable of getting any more than that into coherent language and feasible space.

"I Know Where I'm Going" is a very pleasant English film by Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger. It is the story of an imperious young Englishwoman (Wendy Hiller), about to marry for money, who is delayed among the natives of one of the islands off the coast of Scotland and there learns better things about herself and about life in general than she might have expected to. Some of this story is told, and characterized, with slickness and whimsy as well genuine lightness; I kept realizing, as I watched and enjoyed it, how shallow and shabby it would probably seem in print. But there are engaging performances by Miss Hiller and Roger Livesey; the sensitive photography and the intelligent if not very imaginative use of sound do more than enough to make eloquent the influence of place on people; and the whole thing is undertaken with a kind of taste and modesty whose absence did much to harm Messrs. Powell and Pressburger's "Stairway to Heaven" and "Black Narcissus." Theirs is a gentle sort of talent at last, but at times they know very well how to use it, without much concession to their liabilities—inordinate ambition, bumpiousness, and a general unevenness of judgment.

"Kiss of Death," which sketches the embarrassments of a burglar who becomes a stool-pigeon, is another of Hollywood's "locale" movies. (Possibly that word will do: what I mean by it is that the picture is shot mainly or wholly in actual places; the story, as a rule, is based on fact, though that seems to me less important.) It is written, coldly and convincingly, by Ben Hecht and Charles Lederer. It is directed by Henry Hathaway and photographed by Norbert Brodine. The script, though expert, is certainly not inspired, and I can't believe that the director and camera man are better than thoroughly competent, either. All of which makes "Kiss of Death" the more striking, for apparently if good technicians pay careful attention to the actual world, they can hardly help turning out a movie that is worth seeing; and the actors who have to play up to this world are greatly stimulated and improved by their surroundings, too. I don't care as much for this film as for the much more lively "Boomerang," but in its own way it is nearly as good a job. Victor Mature is good as the burglar. I have always wished I might cast him right; he is well cast this time. In any adequate production of the picture he would be still better in a still better role: as Diomed in Shakespeare's "Troilus and Cressida."

"The Roosevelt Story" is interesting to see, chiefly because it includes a good many revealing portraits of the late President, and because in most other respects it is so archetypically awful. It claims to be non-political, which is as absurd as if one put out a biography of Babe Ruth, taking care to avoid the hot subject of baseball. Its commentary approaches the low, to date, in pseudo-common-mannishness (and that is a pleonasm if ever I perpetrated one). You can't help realizing as you watch it, still more as you listen to it, that a terrifying number of Americans, most of them in all innocence of the fact, are much more ripe for benevolent dictatorship—and every dictatorship is seen as benevolent by those who support it—than for the most elementary realization of the meanings, hopes, and liabilities of democracy. It is doubtless an exceedingly well-meant film, but that doesn't exactly reduce its power to sadden and to disturb. It includes a good many shots of the dead-march in Washington. These are some of the most beautiful shots ever put on film and, properly arranged, could be as great and as moving, in their far more complex and qualifiable way, as Whitman's threnody. They were very well ordered in the newsreels just after Roosevelt's death. Here they are so used as binders, and as springboards for flashbacks, that most of their possible power is thrown away. But even in this mangled state some of the single shots are enough to stop the breath.

"The Devil's Envoys" is the work of Jacques Prévert and Marcel Carné, who made "Children of Paradise." The pretentious, hammy, romantic symbolizing and oblique philosophizing of the latter bothers me more than it used to, but I still very much like the picture; it does have style and glamour. "The Devil's Envoys" has style and glamour too, but not of a kind I can care much for. The effort is to make a movie equivalent of one of those medieval romances which have always seemed to me as overrated as they were interminable; and to lace this sleepy posset with a lot of heavy allegory about Love as Evil and Love versus Evil. Quite a bit of it is elaborately beautiful; but I was forced to realize anew, as I watched it, just how boring unalleviated beauty can be. Once in a while this trance-like ballet of beauty and black magic permitted, almost as if by accident, a glimpse of what the actual Middle Ages must have felt and looked and smelled like. At those moments the picture became wonderful, magic and beauty and even allegory included. But most of it is like a required reading of "Aucassin and Nicolette," translated into Middle High Marshmallow. It is a discouraging sign of the times that "The Devil's Envoys" won a French Critics' award. That goes far toward helping explain why the best movies in the world, and in many years, are being made in Italy.

I was astounded to hear that some knowledgeable people think of "Brute Force," a movie about men in a big jail, as a happy return to the melodramas of the early thirties. Maybe so, in some of the jab-paced, slickly sadistic action sequences. But there isn't a line in it, or a performance, or an idea, or an emotion, that belongs much later than 1915, and cheesy 1915 at that. And terrible as the movie is, that is its considerable charm. I suspect, without malice, that the ideal audience for O'Neill's "The Iceman Cometh" is in some non-temperance Old Men's Home along the Bowery—it is in that sense a genuine and likable folk-play. I also suspect that the ideal audience for "Brute Force" is among men who have been shut off from the world, paying their debts to society—as society laughingly puts it—since Pershing was a pup. I am sure they were never like the men in this picture, even in their youth; but I'm also reasonably sure that they think they were, and think people still are. If you have ever seen a country audience taking "The Old Homestead" for Gospel, you'll know what I mean.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN "Two Worlds of Music" (Creative Age, $3) Berta Geissmar writes about the years in which she was close friend, secretary, and adviser to Furtwängler and manager of the Berlin Philharmonic, until she was forced out of her positions by the Nazis and had to leave Germany; and about her subsequent experiences as secretary to Beecham and manager of the London

Philharmonic. The book is not without interesting details, especially in the portion about Beecham; but about Furtwängler it is sketchy, incomplete, idolatrous, and worthless, since it creates a picture of someone with no resemblance to the flawed musician and flawed human being that Furtwängler is by the testimony of more reliable witnesses, including himself.

The book is an amazing revelation of the lack of moral awareness on the part of its three chief characters—Furtwängler, Beecham, and Dr. Geissmar—in the situations in which they found or placed themselves: on the part of Furtwängler in staying in Germany, especially when there could no longer be any pretense that he might be able to get the Nazis to change their policies, or could benefit anyone but himself; on the part of Beecham in going to Germany to arrange Beecham's appearances there and to engage German artists for Covent Garden (Beecham got amusement from ramming her down the Nazis' throats; she got satisfaction from it). Their excuse was that they were acting in accordance with their contention that art must be kept non-political—in disregard of the political use the Nazis made of Furtwängler's submission after his resignation, and of Beecham's visits. And actually Beecham yielded to the request that he omit a Mendelssohn symphony from the programs of the London Philharmonic on its German tour—as Furtwängler yielded to similar German pressure not to play a Mendelssohn symphony in Budapest.

Lacking moral awareness, Dr. Geissmar can describe incidents like the one of Beecham and the Mendelssohn symphony without any realization of how damaging they are. Thus she writes that when, in February, 1934, the Italian ambassador transmitted the request for a tour of Furtwängler and the Berlin Philharmonic in Italy in April, "I told him that his request came too late. But he was so insistent that I finally promised to do my best, provided . . . that after upsetting our plans he would at least arrange an audience for Furtwängler with Mussolini in Rome. I did my work, Cerruti did his. . . . The day after the first concert Furtwängler had an audience with Il Duce. . . . The second concert was sold out, Mussolini and his daughter Edda occupied a box. . . . Furtwängler was given an Italian decoration of the highest order the country could bestow on an artist." And while the German Nazis in Rome reported home only a complaint about the non-Aryan members of the orchestra, "the German Ambassador, von Hassell . . . reported to the German Foreign Office, emphasizing the great success of the tour, particularly in view of the obviously hostile feeling of the Italians towards the Nazis."

Yet, instead of being pleased the authorities in Berlin, including Goebbels, were furious—because the tour had been arranged by her. "That their ultimate end had been accomplished did not matter: they had not accomplished it themselves." And it is clear that she reports all this without any realization that she is claiming credit for success in, and complaining of Nazi ingratitude for, an involvement of art with politics, and describing actions by Furtwängler as damning as anything he did in Germany—as, for example, his first appearance after his submission, in April 1935, at a Winterhilfe benefit concert attended by Hitler and the entire government, and the famous cordial handshake with Hitler at that concert, which Dr. Geissmar rightly calls a "symbolic gesture."

The "Pavlova" edited by Paul Magriel (Holt, $3.50) is, like the "Nijinsky," one of the volumes in the series sponsored by Ballet Society, and made up largely of material previously published in Dance Index. Its most important contents are the photographs of Pavlova, which are lovely, and sometimes excitingly so, though not as vivid and exciting as the Nijinsky photographs (but I doubt that any ever were or will be). In addition there are Marianne Moore's poetic comment on the photographs, Carl Van Vechten's reviews of Pavlova's first performances at the Metropolitan, her own "Pages from My Life," a brief recollection by one of her pupils, Muriel Stuart, a chronology, and a bibliography.

The Museum of Modern Art's pamphlet "The Theater of Eugene Berman" offers some of Berman's stage designs, and an introduction by George Amberg on the subject of easel painters as stage designers, in which the writing and thought are extremely unprecise and unclear.

This is true also of Mr. Amberg's long introduction to "Art in Modern Ballet" (Pantheon, $7.50), a collection of drawings and paintings for the ballet by easel painters of Europe and the Americas. About a third of the book is devoted to an index of 833 ballets with full data concerning book, music, choreography, scenery, costumes, company, and first performance, and to further indices of the composers, choreographers, and designers.

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4256
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. and Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

NOTICE TO NEWSSTAND READERS.

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price. Why not fill in the coupon on page 263 and mail it to us today!

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
58th ST.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
23rd ST.

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

RKO NOW

"PIQUANT ENTERTAINMENT"—PM.
Gene Tierney • Rex Harrison
George Sanders
'THE GHOST and MRS. MUIR'
From R. A. DICK'S Novel
—and—
'MOSS ROSE'
PEGGY CUMMINS
VICTOR MATURE • ETHEL BARRYMORE
From JOSEPH SHEARING'S Novel

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

QUEENS

MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kith's
FLUSHING
Kith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

ANN SHERIDAN LEW AYRES • ZACHARY SCOTT

'THE UNFAITHFUL'
—and—
'A LIKELY STORY'
Bill WILLIAMS
Barbara HALE

Letters to the Editors

The Ideal Candidate

Dear Sirs: The implications of the promotion of Lieutenant General J. Lawton Collins to Deputy Chief of Staff seem to have been generally unnoticed. Newspaper reports state that General Collins has been mentioned as a possible successor to General Eisenhower, though most army men believe the position will go to General Omar Bradley. Of course Bradley could be moved out after a sufficiently decent length of time to "honor" him had elapsed. Collins, a devout Roman Catholic, one of the leaders of the fight to merge the armed forces, equipped with a dogged determination to succeed, personal integrity, and ability as a soldier, is the ideal candidate in the eyes of certain forces in and outside government circles.

The accusation of religious bigotry will doubtless be raised should any protest against Collins's appointment be made. But there arises a most important consideration—that of loyalties. Regardless of his personal integrity and ability, a man in his high position, civil or military, who has been indoctrinated for years with the political philosophy of the Roman Catholic church must make a major decision each time loyalty to his church comes in conflict with loyalty to other policies of our non-Catholic country. Justification can usually be found for following the "directives" of the church. When the philosophies of the Catholic church and the military are combined in one person in a position of such importance as the Chief of Staff of the army, and when the Catholic church is openly engaged in a struggle against Russia, is there not danger that we might be rushed into war against Russia?

Another question arises. It is becoming increasingly apparent that the fate of capitalism will be determined within the United States. The forces of reaction have already started to use their wealth to freeze our economy along dangerous lines and eventually will try to use the military. The crisis which the economists predict is not far off will determine whether capitalism will be transformed into fascism or develop into some form of economic democracy. Since the army will play a dominant part in any ensuing disorders, and since the influence of the Catholic hierarchy may be expected to be thrown on the side of capitalist reaction, the selection of a Catholic Chief of Staff would have tremendous economic and political significance. The appointment of General Collins, therefore, would be unwise.

HELEN WALLACE KELLEY

Washington, August 20

Courtesy or Truth?

Dear Sirs: In an attempt to "answer" the charge made in the recent Hutchins report that American newspapers are not sufficiently critical of one another, one newspaper man, Walter Locke, a columnist on the Miami Daily News, has offered the insipid and unconvincing "explanation" that newspaper editors have grown too polite nowadays to call one another names. He is persuaded that such politeness enables rival newspapers to live together in peace. Perhaps it does, but peace at whose expense? At the expense of the American public, the answer must be, and at the expense of the truth.

"Competitors in business develop a 'courtesy' of their own," Mr. Locke goes on to say. "Is this 'courtesy' a combination in restraint of trade? Who knows?" he asks. Mr. Locke knows. Mr. Locke also knows that in the newspaper business the trade is in ideas and facts. Tiring of the critical spirit in which newspapers once were published, "the editors," he says, "settled down to their job as purveyors of news and ideas, leaving the public to judge their rivals for themselves." Well, the public will then judge Mr. Locke for itself. It will want to know why it is really impolite for co-workers in the vineyards of the truth to point out errors—and falsehoods, too—wherever they may be found, in the common endeavor of newspapers generally to provide the public with the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Mr. Locke is talking through his hat. He is too good a columnist and too good a critic not to know that peace must be built on a much firmer foundation than mere politeness. The only worthy foundation and the only lasting one can of course be nothing less than the truth. And our age, far from having grown "polite," is characterized, more perhaps than any age before it, by criticism, watchdog of the truth. We test our products and ourselves relentlessly, searching for flaws. We employ the most powerful X-rays to ferret out flaws in steel beam and human bone. We probe, probe, probe—with microscope and telescope, with fluoroscope and stroboscope. We insist on the truth. We love the truth.

The ancient Greeks also loved the truth, more ardently perhaps than we Americans do today. Even then, however, a certain Diogenes felt it to be necessary to walk about in the market place in broad daylight with a lighted lantern in his hand, the better to search out the truth in men's countenances. But Mr. Locke, who also carries a lantern, would blow out the flame before peering into his rivals' faces.

EWING ANDERSON

Miami, Fla., August 26

An Undesirable Alien

Dear Sirs: In the year of grace (or of disgrace) 1917 the United States Congress approved the Jones law, by which the Puerto Ricans were granted American citizenship. Those who accepted American citizenship were granted the right to vote and the privilege to serve their country (Puerto Rico) as public officials, either by election or by appointment. But those who rejected it, preferring to remain citizens of Puerto Rico, were deprived of the right to vote and to hold public office—just as if they were convicted criminals.

I was one who rejected American citizenship in 1917. Now, after thirty years, I have made application to become a United States citizen in order to be in a position better to serve Puerto Rico, my party (the Independence Party), and my ideals of freedom.

My application was not accepted. The federal authorities here rejected it on the ground that I had failed to establish that I was not within the class of persons whose naturalization is prohibited by Section 30 of the Nationality Act of 1940 and that I had failed to establish that I was attached to the principles of the Constitution and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the United States. And besides, they considered me an undesirable alien.

Alien means the native of another country, and I am, according to the federal authorities, an alien in my own country. I, an alien in Puerto Rico, when I was born in Puerto Rico, of Puerto Rican parents, a grandson of Puerto Ricans on my father's side and a grandson of Spaniards on my mother's. And why am I undesirable? Because, when asked if I would be willing to take up arms against the Puerto Ricans in case of war between Puerto Rico and the United States, I said that I would not. Undesirable, because I believe that my country should be free and will struggle for its independence!

The gentlemen who deny me the right to be an American citizen should be ashamed to ask a decent man whether he would bear arms against his own brothers and countrymen. Only a degenerate would answer that question in the affirmative. Because I answered it in the negative I am considered an undesirable alien—in my own country of birth!

The undesirable aliens are they who have come to Puerto Rico to deprive us of our sovereignty and our personality as a nation; they who impose upon us arbitrary laws to the detriment of our commerce, our agriculture, and our industries; they who compel our children to study in a foreign language; they who deny us political and civil rights in our own country unless we are invested with their citizenship.

Perhaps they are even planning to deport me. But I am in the country where I was born and reared. Where, then, could they send me? Probably to the moon or to the planet Mars, aboard a jet-propelled rocket! In that case, you shall hear from me; I'll send my stratospheric impressions and my interplanetary adventures.

DR. EUGENIO VERA

Río Pedras, Puerto Rico, August 10

The New Abolitionist

Dear Sirs: After 1,947 years of "Christianity" it is strange that the white man in America, and particularly in the South, has been unable to gain his freedom. The Negro's bondage was limited to the physical, environmental, and circumstantial, but the white man's extends to the mental, emotional, and spiritual. The slavery of the Negro was imposed from above; that of the white man is self-imposed. The Negro's master was a white man; the white man's master is fear. The white man's bondage is many times more costly to society than the Negro's ever was.

The expensive system of segregation

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 228 By MR. X.

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the sixth of six puzzles constructed by Mr. X in competition with Mr. Y. At the end of the competition, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

ACROSS

- 1 I'm Pancho—defender of the people
- 5 Cut capers
- 10 Engine for making tea in the back room
- 11 Visit to the rune seems like trespassing
- 12 Incline to cunning to scale the parapet
- 13 Total drop in ambulances restores composure
- 14 One gets the D. T.'s when fired upon
- 15 Eastern token
- 18 We still struggle: it's not end, see?
- 21 Statue conceals its crafty touch
- 24 Is ten enough for the model?
- 26 The trusting sometimes net a liar
- 27 I came in shapeless to emerge in a natty outfit
- 28 A thing that blots out the sun
- 29 Served on tray at every meal
- 30 This pest, sirs, is always with us

DOWN

- 1 A cream room
- 2 The zombie embraces a tomato
- 3 Does the painter have a reference?
- 4 Neglected to edit mot

- 6 Twist with the curl is berled in erl
- 7 There's an incongruous lie in the article
- 8 Fundamentals for steel men
- 9 Home for the horse race
- 16 Greatness alienates people and loses friends
- 17 Luce shed light on Time publication
- 19 The exploited blow up when they lose it
- 20 Movies in bed
- 21 I'd go in a barge to make a shortcut
- 22 Free gifts
- 23 Tastes vary in different countries
- 25 A trio running amuck

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 227

ACROSS:—1 SPONSOR; 5 ORLEANS; 9 PIERROT; 10 VIOLATE; 11 RADII; 12 AGREEMENT; 14 BESS; 15 EARLIER; 16 TOT; 20 COS; 21 AWAKENS; 23 CODE; 24 TITIVATES; 25 MATER; 29 ENLARGE; 30 IGNORES; 31 SISTERS; 32 ENSLAVE.

DOWN:—1 SUPERB; 2 OVERDO; 3 SORTI-LEGE; 4 RITUALS; 5 OBYVERSE; 6 LOOSE; 7 ACADEMIC; 8 STENTORS; 13 BOW; 14 RUDIMENTS; 17 BON; 18 TACTLESS; 19 TANTALUS; 22 SETTERS; 23 CASTILE; 24 STERNA; 25 TRISTE; 27 VERGE.

NO ONE IS SAFE FROM CANCER

This year, 184,300 Americans will die of Cancer . . . one every three minutes.

YET . . . one in three could be saved thru early detection and prompt treatment.

PROTECT YOURSELF! CANCER'S DANGER SIGNALS

1. Any sore that does not heal, particularly about the tongue, mouth or lips.
2. A painless lump or thickening, especially in the breast, lip or tongue.
3. Progressive change in the color or size of a wart or mole.
4. Persistent indigestion.
5. Persistent hoarseness, unexplained cough, or difficulty in swallowing.
6. Bloody discharge from the nipple or irregular bleeding from any of the natural body openings.
7. Any radical change in normal bowel habits.

GIVE to help win mankind's great war — the fight against cancer.

AMERICAN CANCER SOCIETY
47 Beaver Street
New York City

which the white man selfishly contrived is retarding the progress of the whites and advancing the cause of the Negroes. The white man is forced to pay the tremendous price of the dual social, economic, political, and religious systems he maintains. In the "Solid South" he has to pay for two of everything—two schools, two churches, two drinking fountains, two swimming pools, two bus and railroad ticket offices, and so on.

How can the white man be considered free in the South today when he is constantly told where he can and cannot sit on public carriers, where he can and cannot eat, where he can and cannot live, with whom he can and cannot associate? If this is the liberty and democracy which declares, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal," then give me no part of it.

Why do so many millions of our American citizens have to be subjected to such bitter prejudice and cruel discrimination? I think the white man suffers these hardships and indignities because he chooses to. He does not seem to realize that he is enslaved by the operation of an irrational system which was created by himself. Therefore, the Negro, who has been too busy with his religion and too fearful of his God to do anything about it, should struggle to see that our white brothers gain the freedom that the Constitution guarantees to all.

MORRIS H. TYNES

Greensboro, N. C., August 15

CONTRIBUTORS

RUTH BENEDICT, associate professor of anthropology at Columbia University, is the author of "Patterns of Culture," "Race: Science and Politics," and "The Chrysanthemum and the Sword."

JEROME H. SPINGARN is an expert on radio law formerly employed by the FCC.

ANTHONY BOWER is on the staff of New Directions.

HENRY POPKIN is a member of the College of Arts and Sciences of the Newark Colleges of Rutgers University.

BENJAMIN HARROW is professor of biochemistry at the College of the City of New York.

ELIZABETH WILDER is an authority on Hispanic culture.

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your own and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then was your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-3
598 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

TYPING SERVICE

MANUSCRIPTS EXPERTLY TYPED. Plays, stories, novels, criticisms, rewrite instructions; low rates, prompt delivery. "MANUSERVICE," 120 East 59th Street, PLaza 3-4789.

CIGARETTES

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons Price $1.45 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. ACE MAIL ORDER CO., East Orange 1, N. J.

SITUATION WANTED (MALE)

LABOR ECONOMICS GRAD, N. Y. U., working on Master's, desires research, statistics, writing, etc., in this or related fields, full or part-time. Box 1731, c/o The Nation.

FORMER GOVERNMENT ATTORNEY

Desires position in public organization. Background international and domestic affairs; political, financial, social problems; federal, state legislation. Excellent governmental, business, personal references. Salary open. Box 1732, c/o The Nation.

PHOTOGRAPHY COURSE

CREATIVE PHOTOGRAPHY—Private course for 4-5 students. Practical studio and dark-room work. Commercial, Pictorial, Portrait, Round-table discussions. Joseph Breitenbach, A.R.P.S., ASMP, 210 Central Park So., N. Y. 19, CO 3-0468

GUIDANCE

A TRUE PICTURE of personality and possibilities from accurate handwriting analysis by psychologist. Alfred Reiss, Ph.D., 680 Fort Washington Ave., NYC 33, WA 7-4088.

Classified Advertising Rates

74¢ A LINE (SIX WORDS)

Minimum three lines

Box No. counted as 3 words

5% discount for 3 insertions

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.39 per inch.....1 time

7.02 " ".....3 times

6.65 " ".....10 times

The NATION

20 Vesey Street New York City 7
BArcley 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 20, 1947

NUMBER 12

The Shape of Things

SECRETARY MARSHALL MADE TWO IMPORTANT statements last week. The first was a sharp challenge to all who cling to a policy of drift in the face of Europe's mounting crisis. The Secretary of State said plainly that Europe's needs this winter would be so acute that emergency measures would have to be taken to prevent mass hunger and all its economic and political consequences. When asked whether such measures could be taken without Congressional sanction, he said no. When asked whether a special session would be called, he hedged, saying that the facts now being assembled and the reports of returning Congressional tours of inquiry would provide President Truman with the information necessary for a decision. But if Secretary Marshall's own statements were accurate, the need of a special session is already established unless the World Bank abandons its ordinary criteria and lends money in large amounts on the basis of need. In Europe, matters have gone far past the point where conventional credit methods have any meaning. As Mr. del Vayo says about France, a bread ration of 200 to 150 grams is itself a "revolutionary factor." Unfortunately, it is one whose meaning a Republican Congressman usually has immense difficulty in understanding. The job facing the Administration is to replace swiftly in the minds of the people—especially including the Congress—the idea of a leisurely debate, sometime after January 1, on plans for long-range support of European recovery with the realization that if emergency aid is not dispatched before the cold comes, long-range support will not even be worth debating. The legislative processes of a well-fed democracy, keyed to the exigencies of an imminent Presidential campaign, are likely to seem somewhat irrelevant to people hungering on 150 grams of bread. It is this that Secretary Marshall and the President must somehow convey to the public—right away, without evasion or any concessions to the political maneuvers of Senator Taft and his cohorts.

★

THE SECOND STATEMENT BY MR. MARSHALL was obviously intended as the keynote for the General Assembly, opening two days later. The Secretary of State made several points which must be taken as encouraging since they reveal a firm determination to work through the United Nations for the aims set forth in the Charter. He indicated that, while changes in the Charter were not ruled out, he believed progress could best be made in the immediate future "within the general framework which we now have"—an obvious reference to the veto. But the most interesting section of his talk dealt with the political issues of Greece and Palestine. In regard to the first, he made it clear that the United States would press for a solution and that the "solution must be the cessation of the threat" to Greece's borders. This is, of course, sharp notice to Russia that the United States will take the offensive on the Greek border problem. He gave no indication that the Balkan states might also have a legitimate complaint of frontier violations. On Palestine, Secretary Marshall was less forthright, contenting himself with the hope that the Assembly might arrive at a "definite solution of this complex matter." In contrast to his statement on Greece, he left out any reference to an existing American policy, an omission which will not pass unnoticed.

★

CAUGHT BETWEEN THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW and John L. Lewis's love for a good fight, the American Federation of Labor faces its liveliest convention since the Mineworkers' leader knocked down Big Bill Hutcherson in the session of twelve years ago. Under the new labor law, trade-union leaders are obliged to swear that they are not Communists if their unions are to have access to the services of the National Labor Relations Board and be recognized as bargaining agents. Denying members of a legal party equal treatment under the law, the clause would appear to be unconstitutional beyond a doubt, and the board's general counsel, Robert B. Denham, has reduced it to an absurdity by ruling that refusal by a single officer of a labor federation to sign the anti-Communist affidavit is enough to disqualify every member union. The entire hierarchy of the A. F. of L. was prepared reluctantly to yield on the issue, but Lewis's determination to withhold his signature makes their surrender meaningless. Without his agreement, all 43,000 locals of the federation will be denied standing before the board. To get around this obstacle,

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	269
In Freedom's Wake	271
How to Check Prices	272

ARTICLES

Politics and People by Robert Bendiner	273
Cartoon: "Handle with Care" by Ezekiel Schloss	274
Atomic Bombs or Atomic Plenty? by Leonard Engel	275
Wedemeyer's Report on China by Maxwell S. Stewart	277
Students Map the Future by Curtis Farrar	279
On the Sikh-Moslem Frontier by Andrew Roth	280
Thomas Garrigue Masaryk by Robert Bass	283
Sun, Sea, and Sand by Horace Sutton	285
Will De Gaulle Come Back? by Del Vayo	286

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Totalitarian Myth by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.	287
Prelude to Planning by George Soule	287
Three Poets by H. P. Lazarus	288
Labor and Politics by Philip Taft	290
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	291
In Brief	292
Music by B. H. Haggin	293

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 228 by Mr. Y	295
--	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon Literary Editor Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Schultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.
Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

the unions that want to work with the board will either have to deny Lewis a seat on the executive council or withdraw from the federation, both actions that would assure a maximum of fireworks at the convention. What might forestall the expected struggle is a reversal of the Denham ruling by the counsel himself or by the board, which can take such action in a case on appeal. Finding this one of the rare occasions in which we agree fully with John L. Lewis, we believe that the evil lies in the law rather than in the Denham interpretation. We hope, therefore, that the matter will not be settled by legalistic evasion or by the defeat of Mr. Lewis within the Federation. What is needed is a Supreme Court decision that will clear the air and restore the perspectives of Congressmen.

★

SURE OF HIS PLACE IN THE FAMILY OF United Nations, Perón is proceeding systematically to stamp out the last traces of freedom in Argentina. The latest victim is the Argentine press. Big dailies like La Prensa and La Nación, whose journalistic independence has long been a source of pride among Argentines, are now faced with the alternative of surrendering to the government or going bankrupt. A few weeks ago, the owners of all printshops were summoned to police headquarters and warned that if they continued to print newspapers and magazines hostile to the regime, they would do so at "great risk." The owner of one large Buenos Aires press demanded a written order. The police chief refused; they must act "voluntarily," he said, "out of patriotic motives." Some papers—notably the Socialist Vanguardia, which has shown magnificent courage throughout this shameful period—carried front-page stories of what had happened and announced that this would probably be their last issue. In the case of the well-to-do publishers of La Prensa, Perón has devised a new form of financial pressure: the daily has been accused of violating customs regulations in its purchases of newsprint abroad since 1939 and is liable to retroactive duties that may run into millions of pesos.

★

THE SURVIVAL OF FRANCO AND HIS FASCIST regime two years after the war's end is an arrogant challenge to the United Nations Assembly which convenes this week. The reasons that determined the U. N. last December to ask member nations to recall their ambassadors from Madrid are still valid; indeed, they are reinforced by new crimes and manifestations of insolence. The number of Spanish Republicans put to death by Franco since the beginning of this year is higher than in any year since 1939, when the war in Spain came to an end. A number of important Nazi agents whom the French police have been trying unsuccessfully to trace in France and the French occupation zone of Germany are now revealed to be living safely in Madrid. Though the Spanish dictator, like his mentor Mussolini, has always proclaimed himself the defender of "order," more attacks, assassinations, and other acts of violence have been recorded since last December than in any corresponding period in the past five years. The plebiscite which Franco staged this summer to impress the United Nations proved a flat failure. American correspondents who covered the event were unanimous in describing it as a farce; and Assistant Secretary of State Norman Armour admitted that it had in no way altered the Spanish situation. Hunger is endemic in Spain, while the straperlo—black market—continues to flourish and Spanish industrialists negotiate desperately for financial support from American private firms. In the light of the record, it is the duty of the United Nations to implement last December's resolution with effective measures against Franco. Lord Templewood, Britain's Conservative ex-ambassador to Madrid, speaking in the House of Lords, recently demanded economic sanctions to end this international plague.

✱

"THE PEOPLE," AS THEY ARE LIGHTLY referred to by those who presume to know what it's all about, have a way of knowing what it's really all about that we find very heartening. Take the latest British by-election—in the Edge Hill district of Liverpool. We'd been told (1) that this was a real test of the Labor government's hold on popular support and (2) that the Labor Party had a hard fight on its hands. It sounded ominous. On August 26, the New York Herald Tribune—we cite it merely as an example—published a dispatch from its London correspondent who wrote with a kind of happy "ominosity" that "the Labor Party is confronted, in the midst of Great Britain's economic crisis, with what promises to be the toughest political fight it has faced since the general election. . . . The Conservatives, therefore, are going up to the campaign with even more than the usual political fervor. There is no doubt that if the Conservatives win, they will trumpet the victory loudly as proof that the Labor Party is on the way out." And furthermore: "It would be fair to say that if the Labor Party holds onto the seat in the face of the heavy odds of politics and the five-way split in voting, it will be a victory of great political importance. It would, in fact, be a much more important result than a Conservative victory." On September 9, the day before the election, Herbert L. Matthews of the Times—to take another example—writing from Liverpool, took the line, also, that this contest would provide the first real test of Labor's "toehold on the country." But in Mr. Matthews' dispatch on September 10, the election had become merely "something of a test case" and he observed blandly that "All signs tonight pointed more than ever" to a Labor victory! Well, Labor won "comfortably" the thirtieth by-election since the Labor Party took over. (It also won the other twenty-nine.) We are now waiting for the Times and the Tribune to trumpet the victory loudly as proof that the Labor Party is not on the way out.

✱

EVERYBODY WAS VERY PLEASANT AND proper about it and talked of "schedules" and "commitments for the winter programs," but the end result is that Max Lerner has been dropped as a news commentator by WOR. So still another has been added to the long line of silenced liberal voices. Abandoned by his sponsor, a tea company, some time ago, Mr. Lerner had been speaking on network sustaining time for the last ten weeks. Perhaps the station chose this delayed method of lay-off in order to ease the sponsor's problem in disposing of Mr. Lerner; or perhaps WOR meant well at the beginning of Mr. Lerner's non-sponsored appearances, but simply lacked the stamina to keep a controversial, left-of-center commentator on the air on its own time. In either case, there is little point in making an individual martyr of Mr. Lerner, as liberals have tended to do with each of their successively stifled radio spokesmen. What is important is the moral of these cases: In spite of the fiction that the air belongs to all of us, in practice it is controlled by and run for those who use it as an advertising medium. There will be little competitive play of ideas over the air until the listening audience, through federal power and through concerted consumer demand, reclaims the air from those whose only interest in it is commercial.

In Freedom's Wake

THE communal riots in India continue to engage the attention of the governments of India and Pakistan. The loss of life and property has been serious. For over a month now, the American press has been highlighting the riots almost to the exclusion of any other news from India, with the inevitable result that a widespread impression has been created that the entire subcontinent is aflame. That, however, is not the case.

East, South, and Central India have been virtually free from communal warfare. Behar, Bombay, the United Provinces, and Assam, which witnessed some bloody riots before power was transferred to the Indians, have also seen no fighting. Calcutta, once the scene of ghastly massacres, has been brought under control by the new government of India. Gandhi's presence in that city has been a great factor in restoring intercommunal harmony. He has again demonstrated his phenomenal hold on the hearts of his people—of both religious groups.

The present disturbances are confined largely to the Punjab, the Northwest province, Baluchistan, and, more

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	269
In Freedom's Wake	271
How to Check Prices	272

ARTICLES

Politics and People by Robert Bendiner	273
Cartoon: "Handle with Care" by Ezekiel Schloss	274
Atomic Bombs or Atomic Plenty? by Leonard Engel	275
Wedemeyer's Report on China by Maxwell S. Stewart	277
Students Map the Future by Curtis Farrar	279
On the Sikh-Moslem Frontier by Andrew Roth	280
Thomas Garrigue Masaryk by Robert Bass	283
Sun, Sea, and Sand by Horace Sutton	285
Will De Gaulle Come Back? by Del Vayo	286

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Totalitarian Myth by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.	287
Prelude to Planning by George Soule	287
Three Poets by H. P. Lazarus	288
Labor and Politics by Philip Taft	290
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	291
In Brief	292
Music by B. H. Haggin	293

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 228 by Mr. Y	295
--	-----

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor Literary Editor
J. King Gordon Margaret Marshall

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance
Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Managing Editor: Jerry Tallmer

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Assistant Literary Editor:
Caroline Whiting Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Schultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $8; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

the unions that want to work with the board will either have to deny Lewis a seat on the executive council or withdraw from the federation, both actions that would assure a maximum of fireworks at the convention. What might forestall the expected struggle is a reversal of the Denham ruling by the counsel himself or by the board, which can take such action in a case on appeal. Finding this one of the rare occasions in which we agree fully with John L. Lewis, we believe that the evil lies in the law rather than in the Denham interpretation. We hope, therefore, that the matter will not be settled by legalistic evasion or by the defeat of Mr. Lewis within the Federation. What is needed is a Supreme Court decision that will clear the air and restore the perspectives of Congressmen.

✱

SURE OF HIS PLACE IN THE FAMILY OF United Nations, Perón is proceeding systematically to stamp out the last traces of freedom in Argentina. The latest victim is the Argentine press. Big dailies like La Prensa and La Nación, whose journalistic independence has long been a source of pride among Argentines, are now faced with the alternative of surrendering to the government or going bankrupt. A few weeks ago, the owners of all printshops were summoned to police headquarters and warned that if they continued to print newspapers and magazines hostile to the regime, they would do so at "great risk." The owner of one large Buenos Aires press demanded a written order. The police chief refused; they must act "voluntarily," he said, "out of patriotic motives." Some papers—notably the Socialist Vanguardia, which has shown magnificent courage throughout this shameful period—carried front-page stories of what had happened and announced that this would probably be their last issue. In the case of the well-to-do publishers of La Prensa, Perón has devised a new form of financial pressure: the daily has been accused of violating customs regulations in its purchases of newsprint abroad since 1939 and is liable to retroactive duties that may run into millions of pesos.

✱

THE SURVIVAL OF FRANCO AND HIS FASCIST regime two years after the war's end is an arrogant challenge to the United Nations Assembly which convenes this week. The reasons that determined the U. N. last December to ask member nations to recall their ambassadors from Madrid are still valid; indeed, they are reinforced by new crimes and manifestations of insolence. The number of Spanish Republicans put to death by Franco since the beginning of this year is higher than in any year since 1939, when the war in Spain came to an end. A number of important Nazi agents whom the French police have been trying unsuccessfully to trace in France and the French occupation zone of Germany are now revealed to be living safely in Madrid. Though the Spanish dictator, like his mentor Mussolini, has always proclaimed himself the defender of "order," more attacks, assassinations, and other acts of violence have been recorded since last December than in any corresponding period in the past five years. The plebiscite which Franco staged this summer to impress the United Nations proved a flat failure. American correspondents who covered the event were unanimous in describing it as a farce; and Assistant Secretary of State Norman Armour admitted that it had in no way altered the Spanish situation. Hunger is endemic in Spain, while the straperlo—black market—continues to flourish and Spanish industrialists negotiate desperately for financial support from American private firms. In the light of the record, it is the duty of the United Nations to implement last December's resolution with effective measures against Franco. Lord Templewood, Britain's Conservative ex-ambassador to Madrid, speaking in the House of Lords, recently demanded economic sanctions to end this international plague.

✕

"THE PEOPLE," AS THEY ARE LIGHTLY referred to by those who presume to know what it's all about, have a way of knowing what it's really all about that we find very heartening. Take the latest British by-election—in the Edge Hill district of Liverpool. We'd been told (1) that this was a real test of the Labor government's hold on popular support and (2) that the Labor Party had a hard fight on its hands. It sounded ominous. On August 26, the New York Herald Tribune—we cite it merely as an example—published a dispatch from its London correspondent who wrote with a kind of happy "ominosity" that "the Labor Party is confronted, in the midst of Great Britain's economic crisis, with what promises to be the toughest political fight it has faced since the general election. . . . The Conservatives, therefore, are going up to the campaign with even more than the usual political fervor. There is no doubt that if the Conservatives win, they will trumpet the victory loudly as proof that the Labor Party is on the way out." And furthermore: "It would be fair to say that if the Labor Party holds onto the seat in the face of the heavy odds of politics and the five-way split in voting, it will be a victory of great political importance. It would, in fact, be a much more important result than a Conservative victory." On September 9, the day before the election, Herbert L. Matthews of the Times—to take another example—writing from Liverpool, took the line, also, that this contest would provide the first real test of Labor's "toehold on the country." But in Mr. Matthews' dispatch on September 10, the election had become merely "something of a test case" and he observed blandly that "All signs tonight pointed more than ever" to a Labor victory! Well, Labor won "comfortably" the thirtieth by-election since the Labor Party took over. (It also won the other twenty-nine.) We are now waiting for the Times and the Tribune to trumpet the victory loudly as proof that the Labor Party is not on the way out.

✕

EVERYBODY WAS VERY PLEASANT AND proper about it and talked of "schedules" and "commitments for the winter programs," but the end result is that Max Lerner has been dropped as a news commentator by WOR. So still another has been added to the long line of silenced liberal voices. Abandoned by his sponsor, a tea company, some time ago, Mr. Lerner had been speaking on network sustaining time for the last ten weeks. Perhaps the station chose this delayed method of lay-off in order to ease the sponsor's problem in disposing of Mr. Lerner; or perhaps WOR meant well at the beginning of Mr. Lerner's non-sponsored appearances, but simply lacked the stamina to keep a controversial, left-of-center commentator on the air on its own time. In either case, there is little point in making an individual martyr of Mr. Lerner, as liberals have tended to do with each of their successively stifled radio spokesmen. What is important is the moral of these cases: In spite of the fiction that the air belongs to all of us, in practice it is controlled by and run for those who use it as an advertising medium. There will be little competitive play of ideas over the air until the listening audience, through federal power and through concerted consumer demand, reclaims the air from those whose only interest in it is commercial.

In Freedom's Wake

THE communal riots in India continue to engage the attention of the governments of India and Pakistan. The loss of life and property has been serious. For over a month now, the American press has been highlighting the riots almost to the exclusion of any other news from India, with the inevitable result that a widespread impression has been created that the entire subcontinent is aflame. That, however, is not the case.

East, South, and Central India have been virtually free from communal warfare. Behar, Bombay, the United Provinces, and Assam, which witnessed some bloody riots before power was transferred to the Indians, have also seen no fighting. Calcutta, once the scene of ghastly massacres, has been brought under control by the new government of India. Gandhi's presence in that city has been a great factor in restoring intercommunal harmony. He has again demonstrated his phenomenal hold on the hearts of his people—of both religious groups.

The present disturbances are confined largely to the Punjab, the Northwest province, Baluchistan, and, more recently, Delhi. A vivid, first-hand account of a fragment of the conflict is provided in an article by Andrew Roth on page 280. The important thing to remember is that the riots do not represent a clash between the two dominions as such. On the contrary, the two governments are wholeheartedly cooperating in their attempts to restore peace. They have agreed on the strongest measures against the armed bands. They have made joint arrangements to evacuate the refugees through all possible means of transportation. The Prime Ministers of both dominions have been touring the stricken areas, exhorting their followers to abandon murderous assaults.

The rioting in the Punjab presents a complex and serious problem. Partisan assertions that the Sikhs alone are responsible are unfounded. It is true that the splitting of the Sikh community into two has aroused that martial people. Like the early Christians, the Sikhs were fiercely persecuted by the Moslem rulers at one time. The memories of those days are still vivid, and the Sikhs have been obsessed with a fear that they might suffer similar persecution under the new Moslem Dominion of Pakistan.

To get a proper perspective on the whole Indian situation, we must also bear in mind that India's four hundred millions are going through political, economic, and social revolutions simultaneously. The period of transition between the end of an imperial regime and the emergence of a people's government is bound to be difficult. Many encouraging things are happening in India whose significance has temporarily been eclipsed by the riots. The Constituent Assembly has laid down the fundamental principles of the new constitution, based upon agreements among all sections of the House—Hindus, Moslems, Christians, Parsees, and Sikhs. The Report on Minorities, which has been hailed by everyone, declares that a Statutory Commission will guarantee full protection to the minorities and will enforce safeguards. All the Indian states with the exception of Hyderabad have joined India or Pakistan, thus recognizing the control of the dominion governments over foreign affairs, defense, and communications. In many provinces and states, untouchability has been banned. Provisions are being made for free and compulsory education. Landlordism is being vigorously assailed. These and many other measures hold promise of steady progress. What we are witnessing in India is in a large measure the aftermath of alien domination.

Beginning next week, King Gordon will become a Staff Contributor, acting as The Nation's correspondent at Flushing Meadow. He will report and comment regularly on the proceedings of the United Nations General Assembly. Mr. Gordon will also do special broadcasting for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

How to Check Prices

EVERY day that passes brings a flood of figures and charts to show what no housewife needs to have demonstrated: that since the end of May we have had sixteen weeks of unchecked inflation, that food prices have soared to the point of imposing serious hardship on lower- and middle-income families, and that unless there is swift and decisive action we are moving toward something very like disaster. Calling for a special session of Congress, Representative O'Toole of New York warns of a winter that "will be one of the most severe economically our people have ever faced." And this in a year when the fate of Europe depends on our aid.

Four lines of attack on runaway prices have been advanced: drastic curtailment of exports, consumer resistance, prosecutions for price-fixing, and a restoration of government price controls—and all four have their weaknesses.

A curb on food exports, increasingly urged by isolationist opponents of the Marshall plan, is surely the most fatuous and dangerous of all. While it might have a temporary effect on the domestic price index, it would forfeit American leadership in the world and throw Europe to the wolves, with long-range consequences to our economy that can hardly be imagined. Those who attribute high prices to our food shipments abroad should be reminded that present relief exports and the most generous aid likely to be granted under the Marshall plan taken together would hardly be more than a tiny fraction of what we sent overseas during the war—in food, guns, tanks, trucks, and a hundred other commodities; yet we had no inflation then, thanks to controls.

Consumer resistance—refusal to buy at exorbitant prices and the purchase of substitutes—is of course highly desirable, but even if it were far more generally practiced than it is, it would still be of limited value. As one official of the New York League of Women Shoppers explains, "We've been recommending that housewives use eggs, poultry, fish, and cheese as meat substitutes. Now we look at the price of eggs and poultry and other substitutes, and we can't recommend any more, because we feel like hypocrites."

Prosecution of price-riggers, which appears to be the current approach of the Administration, is good as far as it goes. But it is so slow a process, involves so small a part of the entire problem, and is so unlikely to be fruitful that it need not be seriously considered as anything more than a contributory solution.

Thus the experts are brought reluctantly but inevitably to a reconsideration of price control by government. Sentiment in its favor is building up both in the President's Council of Economic Advisers and in the Cabinet. Chester C. Davis, a key member of the Harriman Foreign Aid Committee, appointed to study the country's resources for implementing the Marshall plan, told a press conference last week that "it may be necessary to attempt to reinstate government controls of food" in order to carry out the aid program. And while the bulk of the press is still chary about replacing price ceilings, editorial sentiment is unquestionably moving in that direction. Even the Republican New York Herald Tribune concedes that under the emergency circumstances "there is precedent for abandoning the free market."

Against this course the arguments most commonly advanced are these: (1) for a Republican Congress to restore controls would be a politically fatal admission of responsibility for the current inflation; (2) price controls without rationing would create a vast black market which would either defeat the purpose of the move or make necessary a tremendous corps of agents and inspectors; (3) the restoration of rationing would be political dynamite in an election year and would stir fierce opposition to the entire foreign-aid program; (4) all such moves would be meaningless without allocation of materials such as we had during the war.

Granting the difficulties, both political and technical, we believe that government action is not only feasible but mandatory. It is probable, as some former OPA officials believe, that the entire economy would bog down at this point if the government attempted to reimpose controls at the wholesale and retail levels. But that is not where the problem lies. What is desperately needed is price control—at the source of production—in industrial and building materials, especially steel, and in basic farm commodities like grains and livestock.

Given price ceilings and a system of allocations on these goods, along with reenacted import-export controls, the price level on other commodities could safely be left to the rules of the market place, without the necessity of an army of agents or the difficulties of rationing. It would still be possible, of course, for a retailer to charge too much for a loaf of bread, but he would not have to do so in order to get back his own money, plus a normal profit. Consumer resistance could then take care of the retail profiteer.

As for political considerations, the Republicans in Congress have a choice between this limited surrender and the burden of responsibility for a fast-approaching débâcle—provided of course, the Administration takes the lead and makes the choice clear, both to the gentlemen on Capitol Hill and to the country at large.

✱

[NOTE—The caricature in last week's issue by Oscar Berger labeled "Sir Stafford Cripps" was actually, of course, a drawing of Philip Noel-Baker. Our apologies to the two statesmen, the artist, and our readers.]

Politics and People

BY ROBERT BENDINER

AFTER the remarks attributed to Herbert Hoover in this month's American Magazine it is clear that the country has yet to solve the problem of what to do with its discarded Presidents. Certainly the use to which the Republicans have put Mr. Hoover hardly seems compatible with the dignity of his station as Elder Politician. Granted that someone with a name had to be found to test the risks involved in making the war a campaign issue, it was nevertheless rather shoddy to assign the sapper's task to the Grand Old Man of the party.

It is possible, of course, that Hoover's repudiation of America's role in the war was purely an inspiration of his own, offered as a public service and without a thought of its effect on his party's fortunes in a pre-election year. Yet for the McCormick-Taft sector of the G. O. P. it has clearly been a daring and valuable contribution. No politically active Republican could have afforded to take the lead, as Hoover has done, in reviving the kind of isolationism that once flourished in America First circles. Not even Taft, who publicly deplored the Nürnberg trials, dared to offer what Hoover has now made a respectable opinion: that it was unnecessary for us to get into the war, that it was a mistake to believe "Britain was in danger of defeat," and that "we would never have been attacked by the Japanese if we had not given them provocation." But now that the plunge has been made, it will be possible for the Tafts and McCormicks to judge the public reaction with a view to introducing a bit of Roosevelt war guilt as a campaign issue in 1948.

It is noteworthy in an ominous way that while a bevy of Democrats have denounced the new Hoover doctrine, no word of condemnation has yet been heard from a Republican source. Indeed, one Republican Senator has been emboldened to go the Elder Politician one better. Senator Hawkes of New Jersey not only agrees with Hoover but adds that both "Japan and Germany would have been defeated without our active participation."

Unless the Hoover doctrine is promptly squelched, we may expect more of this sort of thing between now and the elections—as much more as the traffic will bear. For the benefit of those inclined to do the squelching let me uncharitably recall a few other remarks by the Elder Politician which he would perhaps prefer to forget. "American soil," Hoover solemnly announced on December 7, 1941, "has been treacherously attacked by Japan." (Why "treacherously" if we provoked the attack?) "Our decision is clear," he continued. "It is forced upon us. We must fight with everything we have." And in case anyone thinks it was Roosevelt who did the forcing, I hasten to draw once more on Mr. Hoover, speaking this time on December 8 of the same year: "The President took the only line of action open to any patriotic American."

IN SAD cases like the defeat of Phil Storch in Pennsylvania's Eighth Congressional District last week, it is not uncommon for the alibis to be in before the final returns. They are rarely comforting and even more rarely convincing, but in this instance they do point up some facts that should dampen any Republican jubilation.

To begin with, there was never a chance that Storch, the Democratic candidate and a C. I. O. Newspaper Guildsman, would actually defeat Franklin H. Lichtenwalter, the Speaker of Pennsylvania's Republican House of Representatives, in a district that goes Democratic only when the banks crash. The mystery is why labor should have chosen to puff up a campaign in which the registration figures doomed its man from the start by a count of 70,000 Republicans against 46,000 Democrats. The reasoning seemed to be that if Storch even ran his opponent a close race, a moral victory would have been scored and the Taft-Hartley Act would have been publicly repudiated. But moral victories are dubious political assets, and in any event Storch fell far short.

At this point the forces working against Storch should be considered. The mere fact that labor, at least locally, seemed bent on making the campaign a test of sentiment on the Taft-Hartley Act brought out the Grundy machine in all its power. The money said to have been spent on Lichtenwalter was certainly not matched for Storch either by labor or by the Democrats. Local trade unions of all hues put on a remarkable demonstration of co-operative zeal; but national labor leaders chipped in nothing more substantial than words of encouragement, feeling no doubt that it would be strategically unwise to invest funds in a lost cause.

As for the local Democratic machine, observers report a persistence of that old custom of the Philadelphia area whereby the Congressional seat and its favors go regularly to the Republicans without much opposition, in return for which Democrats get a good share of local offices and the patronage that goes with them.

In the light of these circumstances and the real gains made by the Democrats in the industrial areas of Bethlehem and Allentown, the Taft-Hartley law can hardly be said to have had much of a test. Its proponents who are inclined to crow prematurely are referred to Mr. Lichtenwalter's many avowals during the campaign that the law was not an issue at all, since it had been passed by a bi-partisan majority. They might also consult the most recent Roper poll, which shows Taft's stock dropping like a barometer in dirty weather.

"HANDLE WITH CARE"

Atomic Bombs or Atomic Plenty?

BY LEONARD ENGEL

EARLY this summer President Truman vetoed a bill for a National Science Foundation on the ground that its somewhat unusual administrative setup was unsound and possibly unconstitutional. Although his objections have some point, the veto was a blunder. For Congress will not pass a bill more to his liking and may indeed for several years pass no legislation of this sort at all.

Every day without a National Science Foundation is a national calamity. In the first place, the United States is currently suffering from a grave deficiency of scientific man-power as the result of a singularly shortsighted wartime conscription policy. Student scientists were drafted just like students of beauty culture, as though the one were no more important to the nation's future than the other. Nearly ten thousand Ph.D.'s and scores of thousands of engineers were lost. The shortage can only be made up, because of the length of time it takes to turn a young man or woman into a scientist, by an extensive federal-scholarship program, such as was authorized in the vetoed bill.

In the second place, lack of a civilian National Science Foundation is giving control of basic or "pure" scientific research, the most important type of scientific work, to the army and navy. During the war science crossed a great divide. The ultracentrifuge, the electron microscope, the atom smasher, and the atomic pile became universally necessary scientific tools, and basic research grew into an activity requiring expenditures beyond the capacity of universities and other private institutions. In the absence of other "angels," the army and navy have become key factors in the financing of research. This year, for example, military appropriations are furnishing half the $400,000,000 which is being spent on basic research. The supplier of funds, of course, becomes the boss. The army and navy are even active in medicine and atomic energy, fields in which there are well-endowed civilian governmental agencies.

To put it bluntly, there is no greater evil conceivable than military control of scientific research. It means a gradual cessation of progress in pure science, for the "army mind" and the spirit of free scientific inquiry do not go together, and competent scientists will not work for long under military direction. And it means the perversion of such scientific knowledge as is gained, for armies and navies are ultimately concerned not with the preservation and enrichment of human life but with its destruction. Whatever the good-will of individual officers, military control in the laboratory leads inescapably to atom bombs and man-made plagues instead of atomic plenty and conquest of disease. The logical end result of militarized science is the Nazi Vernichtungslager, the annihilation camp with its gas chambers, mechanized ovens, and other gear for mass murder.

I would like to expand on this. To begin with, I do not mean to imply that the United States army and navy are officered by monsters who are contemptuous of science and who would salvage only that part of it which is useful for blood-letting. Most officers are decent and well-meaning men. Some, especially in the branches that have to do with research and development, are as broad-minded and understanding as any individuals in the nation. However, military control would stultify and pervert science even if every officer were a paragon of humane intellectual virtues, for the stultification and perversion flow from the system, and the system is stronger than any number of excellent individual officers.

LET us see how the system works. The army and navy entered the basic-research picture immediately after V-J Day. During the war little basic research was carried on; all efforts were concentrated on applying previously accumulated scientific knowledge to the tasks at hand—namely, fashioning weapons and winning the war. Thus knowledge gained in two generations of research into the atom was bent to the making of atom bombs. American scientists did a superlative job of applying science to military technology; in fact, they did such a good job that they quite literally used up the world's bank of basic scientific knowledge in several important fields. Further progress in those fields imperatively demanded new knowledge of natural facts. To give a simple example, we produced during the war as good metal alloys as can be made in the present state of metallurgy, which, in spite of its antiquity, is still more a hit-or-miss art than a science; to make really improved metals, man must finally learn something of their internal structure, a problem in basic research. Realizing this, and realizing that current research costs are beyond private means, the army and navy stepped in and awarded research contracts to scores of private institutions.

It should be emphasized that the contracts were awarded on an extremely generous basis and purely as a temporary stop-gap. Thoughtful army and navy people themselves realized that military financing and control of research were undesirable and agreed to them only as interim measures, until the establishment of a civilian Science Foundation.

LEONARD ENGEL is a writer on science who has lately been paying particular attention to the application of atomic energy.

Armies and navies are authoritarian, hierarchical organizations in which subordinate individuals possess neither status nor initiative. Into such a framework the scientist, particularly the worker in pure science, cannot be fitted. The pure scientist is an individual who is challenging nature to yield up its secrets. His hallmark is a bold, if patient, mind. Under the stimulus of war or high pay he may consent to work under military direction for a time. But the arrangement is usually temporary, since there is little place in the depths of the chain of command for the individual who must exercise initiative.

This is not to suggest that scientists cannot work under any direction at all, or that basic research is an activity of solitary laboratory heroes. Quite the contrary; basic research very often demands a high degree of organization and direction. But the organization must be freely cooperative, and the direction must come from men selected for their scholarly achievements and not by the roulette wheel of the army assignment system.

A specific example will make this clear. Two acquaintances of mine at the Rockefeller Institute are investigating the electrical properties of living cells. Living cells, as one of these men expressed it, are "lousy batteries" which cease operating at the moment of death. From studies like this will come one day a new understanding of life and death and perhaps a revolution in medicine. As a preliminary to the cell studies, it is necessary to measure the electrical properties of a long list of substances. Some of these have been measured before, but the work was done by so many different individuals in so many different ways that no one knows whose figures are to be trusted. So new measurements are patiently and systematically being made by a group of Yale and Rockefeller Institute scientists of which my acquaintances are members. Now, which way is that job handled better, by a cooperative group under the guidance of a man who has done distinguished work in the field all his life or by a group under an alumnus of West Point? The question answers itself.

Up to the present the army and navy have wisely refrained from attempting to exercise even indirect control. Money has been given almost without strings to universities and recognized research institutes for work in a wide variety of fields. But this cannot continue indefinitely. Army and navy funds are limited, and sooner or later their research branches will be called upon to justify their expenditures in terms of military results—that is, new weapons developed and old weapons improved.

This will lead to close supervision of scientific contractors and gradual elimination of pure-research projects. For it is in the nature of pure research that it cannot be justified in terms of immediately useful results. It is exploration of the unknown, and one cannot know in advance whether a gold mine or a totally useless swamp lies at the end of the trail. Only applied science yields predictable results. So army- and navy-sponsored research will be confined more and more to weapons development and will involve an ever narrower group of scientists, since scientists not only resent military supervision but are humanitarians profoundly uninterested in weapons. And if no alternative to military sponsorship and domination of science is found, there will in time be no pure science in the United States, no epochal discoveries from which applied scientists can build a new world. There will be only weapons.

THERE is another destructive factor in military control of science. Armies make a virtue of suspicion. Other nations are potential enemies. Hence new scientific developments are viewed by the military as counters in a possible war and are naturally to be kept secret wherever possible. The scientist, on the other hand, is anxious to make each new advance public. He intends his contribution for the benefit of humanity and wishes to make it available to all. He understands something, moreover, which few military men ever comprehend—that all advances must be published in order to make further advances possible. For the enormously intricate, yet minutely organized body of techniques and knowledge called science—man's greatest achievement—is the work of numberless men, each of whom builds upon the work of others and most of whom labor in complete obscurity but nevertheless contribute something essential. Go back through the history of science; see how small a step each man takes, how all depend on the work of those who have gone before, how even the great synthesizers like Darwin and Einstein must have access to the work of others in order to erect their theories. Secrecy, in short, breaks the threads of science's continuity, and if military secrecy is imposed on American science, American science will perish.

That brings me to the final point. It is sometimes said that militarization of science with its concentration on weapons development is an evil which is at least partly compensated by by-products of value to the world as a whole. Thus atomic power is pointed to as an immensely valuable by-product of the atom bomb. It is not true that atomic energy is a gift of the bomb—they are distinctly different applications of basic atomic research—nor is it generally true that weapons development confers important incidental benefits on humanity. Very nearly a third of the research which the army, navy, and air forces are currently sponsoring or carrying out, for example, is concerned with supersonic flight. The laws of supersonic flight are of great importance in military aircraft, artillery projectiles, rockets, and guided missiles but have only a remote connection with a peaceful world. Many other military research projects have as slight a non-military value. Of those that do have more immediate constructive aspects, few will ever yield benefits that could not be obtained in other ways at a tenth the cost.

One must make no mistake. Weapons improvement, with which military-sponsored research is becoming increasingly occupied, is applied science or development work. Development work, unlike pure science, has few surprises and you get what is paid for. When an army pays the bills, you get weapons, not power plants or wonder drugs.

At the moment the army and navy still do not have firm control of basic scientific research. American science is a husky civilian growth, with a strong tradition. But bit by bit control is slipping from its traditional academic guardians. While it will not solve all problems—the problem of freedom of scientists from FBI witch hunts will remain—a civilian National Science Foundation will at least put the direction of scientific research back where it belongs, firmly in the hands of civilian scientists.

Wedemeyer's Report on China

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

THE return of Lieutenant General Wedemeyer with his "fact-finding" report on conditions in China and Korea marks the zero hour for the determination of America's post-war Far Eastern policy. Many observers have interpreted the General's bitter denunciation of the slackness, incompetence, and corruption in the Kuomintang as indicating that there will be no essential change in our China policy. Certainly the statement came as a bitter blow to the groups, both in this country and in China, who had assumed that the appointment of Wedemeyer, known to be strongly anti-Communist and personally friendly to Chiang Kai-shek, automatically assured increased assistance to the Kuomintang regime.

It is quite possible that the Wedemeyer report should be considered merely the logical extension of the previous Truman and Marshall statements. If this is the case, it is difficult to see how the State Department could justify a request that Congress pour more funds into China. In view of Europe's needs under the Marshall plan Congress is unlikely to look with favor on a new loan in Asia to be administered by officials "whose conduct is notoriously marked by greed, incompetence, or both." In fact, some Congressmen, sadly disillusioned by China's past performances, are merely awaiting an opportunity to demand an accounting of the $500,000,000 loan made in 1942. It now appears that this loan was granted despite strenuous objections from Ambassador Gauss and the State Department.

Unfortunately, Wedemeyer's caustic statement might also be interpreted as forecasting a drastic change in our China policy—a change that would satisfy those who urge that this policy be made wholly consistent with the Truman Doctrine. Close scrutiny reveals significant differences between Wedemeyer's statement and those which preceded it. Although Wedemeyer denounced graft and corruption in language that was in many respects stronger than Marshall's, he did not even pretend to be neutral with respect to China's domestic politics. On the contrary, he placed sole responsibility for the continuation of the civil war upon the Communists, declaring that if they were "truly patriotic and interested primarily in the well-being of their country they would halt the voluntary employment of force in an effort to impose ideologies." To the Kuomintang he said merely that "military force in itself would not eliminate communism" (italics mine).

Nor did General Wedemeyer's report urge, as previous statements had done, the formation of a unified democratic regime containing representatives of all the main political groups in China. True, he called for immediate "drastic, far-reaching political and economic reforms," but the context makes it clear that he was primarily interested in eliminating inefficiency and corruption. He made no mention of the need for greater democracy, enforcement of promised civil rights, and an end to political terrorism; no reference to the previously avowed goal of American policy—the setting up of a broadly representative coalition regime. If the needed "economic reforms" include a new land policy and a general reduction of taxes—the chief demands of the opposition parties—that was not in any way suggested by the General.

Perhaps the most significant thing about his statement is the absence of the usual allusions to China's rights as a sovereign nation, the failure to disavow any intentions on the part of America to interfere in China's domestic affairs. Instead, Wedemeyer declared bluntly that "promises will no longer suffice. Performance is necessary." Of course, the United States has been intervening in Chinese affairs since the early days of the war. But mindful of the all-important consideration of Chinese "face," Wedemeyer's predecessors were careful to pay lip-service to the principle of non-intervention. In failing to observe the amenities the President's latest special envoy played into the hands of the very groups he so roundly denounced. For the Chinese of all political leanings are highly sensitive about foreign interference, and Chen Li-fu, head of the notorious C. C. clique, and other right-wing leaders were quick to capitalize on this feeling to strengthen their political position. According to recent reports, the C. C. clique is hopeful of forcing the resignation of Foreign Minister Wang Shih-chieh, a moderate, on the ground that he is too subservient to the United States. It is also reported that the arch-reactionary General Ho Ying-chin may soon be back in his old place as Minister of National Defense, replacing the far abler but politically moderate General Pai Chung-hsi.

THE skill with which reactionary groups within the Kuomintang have frustrated every effort on the part of the United States to modernize or reform the Chinese government points up the essential weakness of American policy from Hurley to Wedemeyer. Stilwell, it will be recalled, was determined to maintain neutrality in China's domestic affairs and refused to extend military aid on any other basis. But since Stilwell's departure the reactionary wing of the Kuomintang has operated on the conviction that in a showdown the United States could be counted on to support the Nationalists rather than see China overrun by the Communists. Right-wing groups have been generous with promises of reform, but by failing to come to grips with the problems of inflation, high taxation, and corruption, they have stimulated disaffection and thus accentuated the crisis which the United States is expected to alleviate with the taxpayers' dollars.

Read carefully, the Wedemeyer statement is not inconsistent with the frequently expressed proposal that all future American aid be strictly supervised or made conditional upon concessions that would reduce China, for all practical purposes, to the status of an American colony. It is quite possible, as the World Report of August 28 suggests, that Wedemeyer may urge aid on a project-by-project basis under close American supervision. Already the military and naval assistance given to the Chiang Kai-shek regime is supervised by a military and a naval mission, and there is talk of greatly enlarging the military mission. Although these missions are supposedly neutral in the civil war, their value to Chiang in the struggle against the Communists was illustrated in the recent amphibious operations in Shantung, where American-trained naval forces using American landing craft made a successful attack on one of the few ports in Communist hands.

The vague reports which have appeared in several American newspapers regarding possible American bases in Formosa and northwestern China undoubtedly reflect the desire of many American military leaders for advanced bases in Asia. Some American capital is said to be available for expanding the industries of Formosa under American supervision. General Wedemeyer took occasion, on August 20, to deny officially that he had been negotiating for additional American bases in China, but a Chinese source in New York has quoted T. F. Tsiang, Kuomintang delegate to the United Nations, as saying that demands of the United States for strategic facilities in China have been excessive.

If these demands have encountered resistance from China, it is presumably because the right wing of the Kuomintang is convinced that American aid will ultimately be granted without concessions in order to check Communist expansion. A further illustration of the way in which the Kuomintang is constantly seeking to play Russia against the United States to strengthen its own position is found in the recent speech by Premier Chang Chun before the fourth plenary session of the Kuomintang's central executive committee. Warning against American efforts to revive Japan's economy, Premier Chang declared that China's position with respect to Japan was closer to that of the Soviet Union than to that of the United States. Promise of substantial American aid for China would presumably induce Mr. Chang to change his mind on this issue.

Recent reports from China indicate that a number of well-known independents, together with members of several of the minor parties and perhaps a few moderates within the Kuomintang, are prepared to cooperate with the Communists in setting up a coalition regime in the event of a Kuomintang collapse. If the United States would persist in its previous policy of urging a coalition, China might become one of the few countries in a position to bridge the chasm between the East and the West. Such a role for China is conceivable because the basic interests of Russia and the United States come closer to coinciding there than in any other important area. If the United States, however, steps up its aid to the Kuomintang, the split between Russia and the United

Drawing by Seligson
General Wedemeyer

States will be extended in an area where both countries have tremendous stakes.

Wedemeyer's report may decide whether the United States will persist in its efforts for a democratic settlement of China's problems or will be maneuvered into a position of maintaining in power the elements we have consistently denounced as undemocratic, inefficient, and corrupt. If support is given to the Kuomintang, it will undoubtedly be defended as necessary to halt the spread of communism. Yet the experience of the past two years in China has shown conclusively that communism is strengthened, not weakened, by the perpetuation of a dictatorial, corrupt regime that has little or no support from the people. The United States, hailed as a liberator on V-J Day, has already lost much of its popularity among the Chinese people by its aid to a decadent regime that would otherwise have gone under. As Walter Lippmann has pointed out in his cogent analysis of the Truman Doctrine, a weak ally is not an asset but a liability. America's strategic position is not strengthened by the friendship of a government that requires constant propping up to prevent it from being overthrown by its own people. Nor is America's interest advanced in any way by feeding the flames of a civil war that has set China back for at least a decade and threatens, unless checked, to start a world conflagration.

Students Map the Future

BY CURTIS FARRAR

Madison, Wisconsin, September 8

SEVEN hundred delegates from colleges attended by a million American students very nearly split down the middle on two grave issues, one domestic and one international, during the constitutional convention of the National Student Association held here last week. If they had split, it would have been proof positive that prejudice, sectionalism, and nationalism have hamstrung America's most hopeful generation. Instead, under pressure of time, they hammered out two intelligent compromises. They were able to do this because of their tremendous enthusiasm and their real desire to find a program with which they could all work together for the progress of America and the peace of the world.

The domestic issue was the race issue. A great effort had been made to get a pre-convention agreement on the stand the organization should take on the question of racial discrimination in education. A compromise had been reached on the same issue at the preparatory conference held at the University of Chicago in December, but the dispute had left a bad taste in the mouths of some of the Northern delegates. As the Madison convention opened, various groups of Northerners urged a stronger stand against segregation. A few of the farthest left students approached Southern Negro delegates one by one and asked them to hold out against any compromise whatsoever. Immediately Southern white delegates rallied in violent reaction to the Northern "pressure." They insisted that it would be impossible for them to carry back to their campuses any resolution save one condemning "inequality of education." A few conservative Southerners seized the leadership of the entire group, and it looked as if the war was on.

The most critical hour came at four o'clock in the morning on the day the issue was to come up on the floor. As a last hope the steering committee sent two Negroes and two white Southerners off into a corner to try to work out a resolution that would be acceptable to all. No one believed it could be done. But it was done. A statement was produced which all four thought might provide a basis for an effective program to eliminate the injustices of the dual educational system in this country. It took cognizance of regional variations in statute and custom and yet advocated a program "to secure and maintain equal rights for all people . . . regardless of race . . . especially by securing the eventual elimination of all forms of discriminatory educational systems anywhere in the United States."

The compromise statement was passed from hand to hand among the members of the steering committee and overwhelmingly approved. A few hours later the plenary session convened in an atmosphere of great tension. There were hours of long, throbbing speeches, hours of taut discussion of the compromise. Then Jim Smith of Texas, president of the preparatory committee for the convention, got to his feet, so tired he could hardly stand, and in a slow drawl read the resolution as finally amended. It was carried unanimously, the tension snapped, and the delegates went out together happily to celebrate on Wisconsin beer.

CURTIS FARRAR is taking a year's leave of absence from Yale to work for the United World Federalists.

THE international issue was the definition of the relationship between the newly formed N. S. A. and the year-old International Union of Students, whose headquarters is in Prague. The I. U. S. is unquestionably oriented far to the left of the student body of the United States, as all observers who were at its council meeting this summer agreed. Many delegates here shuddered at the thought of having to explain the I. U. S. to isolationist student bodies and suspicious deans. At the same time they realized that their one chance for real knowledge of the students of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union would come through the union. In addition, they were told, the I. U. S. has a service program, and its relief work and provisions for low-cost travel throughout Europe will soon be in operation.

All through the week a compromise was carefully worked out, under the direction of Robert Smith of Yale, in the panel on international activities. It was designed to protect the N. S. A. from the political tentacles of the I. U. S. while allowing the American organization to cooperate fully in the constructive projects of the international group. It provided for a negotiating committee to go to Prague next summer to attempt to secure the I. U. S. council's approval of N. S. A. terms. It proposed to try to get as many students as possible from I. U. S. countries to come to the United States next summer, in exchange for working and traveling students from America.

By the time the resolution got to the floor, it was a carefully constructed and balanced piece of work. It was not naive, and it embodied the students' basic distrust of politics and partisan activities. And yet it showed an interest, a curiosity, and a desire for cooperation. The American student, this resolution clearly indicated, must learn to live with people he disagrees with.

It was passed, in the warm morning sun—somebody had forgotten to make arrangements for procuring the theater—by a vote of 436 to 35.

A GOOD many other things were threshed out here last week, none of them unimportant. But none of them came so close to wrecking the association, before it had truly set on its course, as the issues of discrimination and the I. U. S. The delegates discussed their right to take part in political activity, the place of student government in education, and the troubles of housing and costs which plague students all over the nation. Above all, they emphasized the fact that they consider their education just not good enough to prepare them to act as intelligent members of a world community.

Now Bill Welsh of Berea College, the new president, and Bob Smith, the vice-president in charge of international activities, have a good directive to work from. They have a sound yet flexible constitution and a broad and detailed program. Though they have very little money, they have a lot of eager man-power. If most of the colleges and universities which were represented here decide to join the new organization, N. S. A. will represent over half of the two million college students of the United States.

On the Sikh-Moslem Frontier

BY ANDREW ROTH

Murree, Pakistan, September 3

MURDER, arson, and rape are insuring that the line running through the Punjab dividing Western Pakistan from the Indian Dominion will not be a mere boundary line but an angry scar which for years will hinder the well-being of the two regions. Lahore and Amritsar, the two chief cities on either side of the border, have the crumbling, burnt-over look of blitzed London or Rotterdam. From the air one can still see bands of one community attacking the isolated villages of the other. The latest authoritative estimates give more than 50,000 dead in the last six months, most of them Moslems of eastern Punjab.

During the past week I have seen the main roads leading from eastern Punjab to Pakistan crowded with tens of thousands of poor villagers fleeing for their lives. The more fortunate families are perched precariously atop groaning, wooden-wheeled bullock carts. Others straggle afoot. Young mothers slog wearily along suckling sickly-looking newborn babies. Old men carry their grandchildren on their shoulders and tell of the father's death and the mother's abduction by raiding bands.

The boundary commission's report, leaving minorities of some four million on each side of the border, has caused one of the greatest exchanges of population in modern history. The exodus from the Pakistan areas now amounts to about half a million people, three hundred thousand having left Lahore alone. More than two hundred thousand Moslem refugees from eastern Punjab have entered Pakistan, and hundreds of thousands more are awaiting transportation and military protection. Only makeshift facilities have been provided for them. In Lahore twenty thousand miserable Moslems tax the capacity of the barracks which once housed the Chinese troops being trained for General Stilwell. In a caravan of a hundred people who had been walking seven days, one woman arrived without a stitch of clothing, clutching newspapers to cover her shame.

ANDREW ROTH has been in the Near and Far East for more than a year studying political developments in countries emerging from colonial status.

The trains plying between the new dominions are crammed with refugees, hundreds clinging to the roofs of the cars. I was in Kasur station when a train came in with its grisly freight of dead and wounded Hindus and Sikhs who had been attacked by Moslems while fleeing to safety. The train reeked with the sickly-sweet smell of death, and flies buzzed around the bodies of men, women, and children cut to pieces because they belonged to the wrong community. On the same day the crack Punjab mail arrived in Lahore from Delhi with some four hundred dead passengers. It was stopped first when passing through the Sikh state of Faridkot; armed Sikhs pulled out Moslem passengers and slaughtered and robbed them. Later, on the Pakistan side of the border, a Moslem mob killed the Hindus and Sikhs aboard. After these outrages train service between New Delhi and Lahore was halted.

Desire for loot has played a part in all these communal conflicts, and rape and abduction figure largely in them because there have always been fewer women than men. The attacking bands often contain thugs who use the religious-political warfare as a cover for their crimes. This is a time when an unsavory character can kill a member of another community, loot his possessions, carry off his wife or young daughter, and receive the approval of his own community.

BACKGROUND OF THE BUTCHERY

Behind this unprecedented communal butchery is a half-year of bitter political conflict over the strategic Punjab. The Moslems formed a 57 per cent majority in the undivided Punjab, and the Moslem League was determined to win this rich, food-producing province for Pakistan. The plan was opposed by the Sikhs, four-and-one-half million of whom—out of a total of five-and-one-half million Sikhs in India—live in the Punjab. It was also opposed by the Hindus, who, although forming less than 30 per cent of the population, have dominated industry, commerce, banking, and the professions in the province and who felt that if it went to Pakistan, discriminatory legislation would drive them out of business.

The first wave of communal riots in the Punjab came when the League tried to seize power early this year. With the support of the British governor, a provincial Cabinet had been scraped together from all the minorities; the League attempted to overturn it and to shake the strong police rule which had been imposed. Gigantic demonstrations by League followers reached strata of the Moslem population which had never before participated in politics, and the Sikh leadership decided to stop the movement by a show of force.

It is impossible to understand events in the Punjab without some knowledge of the peculiar mentality of the Sikhs. Recognizable everywhere by the fact that they never shave or cut their hair and always wear a kirpan, or sword, the Sikhs have incredible confidence in their own fighting ability. They ruled the Punjab before the British came and became favorites of the British when they helped quell the Sepoy Rebellion of 1857. Having supported Britain wholeheartedly in World War I, they were favored with land grants, special legislation to protect their holy places, permits to carry their swords, and much praise for their "martial character."

The Sikh community is led by one Master Tara Singh—"master" because he was once a schoolmaster—who suffers from delusions of grandeur, if not other delusions. When British fortunes were at their lowest ebb in World War II, he and other prominent Sikhs made plans and collected arms for seizing power in the Punjab if Britain collapsed. Last April I asked him if he hoped to establish Sikh rule in the province after the departure of the British. He smiled and said hopefully, "Who knows what can come out of chaos!" At the end of August I asked him again about his hopes to rule the Punjab, and he replied, "I always hope there will be Sikh rule," adding, "Just as the Jews hope to rule Palestine, it is my superstition [sic] to rule Punjab."

Last March, under such leadership, the Sikhs opened their campaign by slaughtering Moslem inhabitants of the Chowk Pragadas district of Amritsar. The Moslems of western Punjab, inflamed by grossly exaggerated reports of the Amritsar killing, retaliated by slaughtering three thousand Sikhs and Hindus. In this they were urged on by the landlords, who would rather see the hungry Moslem peasants killing and looting Sikh and Hindu shopkeepers and moneylenders than agitating for lower rents.

The present round of killings was occasioned by the division of the Punjab, on which the Indian Congress insisted before it would agree to the secession of Pakistan. Much to the surprise of everyone, the Sikh leaders indorsed the decision of the Congress; their idea was to divide the Punjab in such a way as to give India not only the eastern part, in which non-Moslems were a majority, but also those areas in which the Sikhs had temples or heavy investments—which would have taken the heart out of western Punjab with its Moslem majority.

Claims and counter-claims were pressed so hotly that the fires of communal conflict were ignited in Lahore, commercial center of the Punjab and sometimes described as the "Paris of India." First there were knife battles; then the Moslem goondas (thugs) began to set fire to the business houses and residences of the substantial Sikh and Hindu minority—consisting of 300,000 of the 800,000 inhabitants of Lahore. Moslems justified this as a way of establishing the claims of the majority. "Destroy their houses," they said, "and with them their claims to Lahore on the basis of property." Retaliation on the Hindu side came from a fascist-minded organization called the Rashtriya Sevak Singh, whose whispered reasoning was, "Bomb the Moslems to death and wipe out their majority in Lahore."

Despite curfew laws which kept people inside tight-shut houses in the 120° heat, and despite the presence of British troops who shot on sight, this grisly game continued. In Lahore the Moslem majority won out, and virtually all of the minority population fled from the city. In Amritsar the slight Hindu-Sikh majority drove out the Moslem minority.

THE BATTLE OF THE VILLAGES

When the conflict shifted from the big cities to the villages, the Punjab Boundary Force, composed of mixed Moslem, Hindu, and Sikh units under a British commander, proved utterly inadequate to check it. Maps at headquarters were sprinkled with colored pins marking villages that had been attacked, burned, looted. And the predominant color of the pinheads showed that in an overwhelming number of cases they were Moslem villages attacked by Sikh bands. Thus, in Amritsar District 100 Moslem villages were attacked as against 7 Sikh. A plane flight over Jullundur District on August 22 disclosed the same pattern.

The Sikh bands may contain as many as 800 men under the command of blue-turbaned leaders of the warrior caste. They usually attack in four waves. The first wave, armed with rifles, Bren guns, and Sten guns, aims to drive the Moslem villagers from the rooftops, where they have accumulated stones and perhaps a shotgun or two for a primitive defense. The second wave throws grenades, army-type and home-made, into the village to cause damage and confusion; the third wave follows with spears tipped with burning rags. As the terrorized villagers emerge from their houses, the fourth wave attacks the young men with swords, spears, and axes, carries off many of the young girls, and drives the others away with the warning: "Go to your Pakistan! If you dare come back here, we'll kill you to the last child!"

The Khan of Mamdot, Premier of West Punjab, accidentally received a first-hand account of an attack on a Moslem village from one of the participants. While driving back from peace conferences with officials of the East Punjab government he passed a smoldering village in which Sikh looters were prowling. One of them, seeing the Sikh soldiers accompanying him as a bodyguard, took him for an official of the (non-Moslem) East Punjab government and proceeded to boast of their deeds. "I myself," he said, "speared five persons to death." This man declared that the band had received a message from a Sikh member of the Legislative Assembly directing them to attack the village at a certain time. His story, coupled with the fact that hundreds of Moslem villages were attacked simultaneously by well-prepared Sikhs strongly suggests a planned operation.

Many British military and civilian officials believe that the Sikh leaders are responsible, though they may not have wanted the violence to go to such frenzied extremes. It is suspected by some that the operation may have been planned by Sikh veterans of the Japanese-sponsored Indian National Army, including General Mohan Singh, who deserted to the Japanese after three days' fighting in Malaya. No direct evidence links the General with the Sikh attacks, but there is evidence that Colonel Narinjam Singh Gil, who was associated with him in the formation of the I. N. A. and is still with him, is connected with one of the big Sikh bands. When I interviewed Colonel Gil, he told me that a civil war to prevent the Moslem secession would have been preferable to acceptance of partition. "The United States fought a civil war to prevent the secession of the South," he reminded me.

An added complication is the role played by the Sikh princely states in the area, particularly Patiala and Faridkot, in the center of eastern Punjab. Both apparently feel they will derive advantage from furthering Sikh expansion at the expense of the Moslems. Jeeps and trucks belonging to them have been repeatedly reported carrying arms to the Sikhs, and some weeks ago the Lahore residence of the Maharajah of Faridkot was found to be a storehouse of arms. For the last six months the Maharajah of Faridkot has been recruiting a "special police force" of ex-service men and offering a bonus of five rupees a month for men with mortar experience. This is a strange requirement for a policeman, but military authorities have been noticing that some of the Moslem villages have been attacked with mortars.

Considerable criticism is directed at the British, particularly for their location of the boundary line. While it is true that no boundary would have made everybody happy, a good many Sikh areas were left on the Pakistan side and a good many Moslem areas on the Hindustan side for no apparent reason. Among Moslems there is also criticism of the small size of the Boundary Force and its lack of observation and attack planes. The force was automatically limited in size by the decision not to use British troops, and its efficiency has been lessened by the fact that the soldiers are beginning to take sides. Sikh troops have stood by while Sikh bands have attacked Moslems, and Moslem troops have allowed their coreligionists to attack Hindus and Sikhs.

Perhaps the most incomprehensible mistake made by the British was their refusal to do anything substantial about the Sikh preparations for the current butchery, although these were fully reported by Political Intelligence. When Lord Mountbatten was warned beforehand about Sikh plans he is said to have replied, "Don't worry about the Sikhs; I can handle them."

EFFORTS TOWARD PEACE

The past fortnight has seen several conferences of officials on both sides, culminating in the meeting of Pandit Nehru, Lord Mountbatten, and M. A. Jinnah in Lahore at the end of August. One of the great obstacles to peace is the inflamed feelings on both sides; people believe and spread the most exaggerated versions of the atrocities of the other side but never seem to hear or remember what their own side has done. Even Pandit Nehru has revealed this lack of objectivity. On one occasion, although impartial reports indicated that probably twenty Moslems were being killed in his own dominion for every one non-Moslem in Pakistan, he made a statement emphasizing the terrible happenings on the Pakistan side of the border. And Nehru is certainly the least communal-minded of India's leaders.

Pakistan, which is smaller and weaker than India, is having great difficulty absorbing the two hundred thousand refugees thrust upon it. There is considerable suspicion among Moslems that some leaders of Congress, including its "strong man," Sardar Patel, regard the border crisis with equanimity because they think it will weaken Pakistan and hasten a request for admission to the Indian Dominion. Apparently Mr. Jinnah shares this suspicion, for in his appeal of August 24, calling on Moslems to exercise restraint, he declared, "Let me warn Moslems to beware of their enemies who . . . would like to see [Pakistan] destroyed at its very inception and would like nothing better than that widespread disorders should break out within its borders."

One day as I sat with a political leader discussing the situation, a villager came in with a new tale of death and destruction and ended by asking, "Tell me, sir, has war been declared between Pakistan and Hindustan?" To this villager and to tens of thousands of refugees on the roads across the blood-spattered boundary, the Dominions of Pakistan and India do not seem like the brave new world they hoped for.

Thomas Garrigue Masaryk

BY ROBERT BASS

TEN years ago, on September 14, the first President of the Czechoslovak Republic died. He was President of a country which attracts relatively little attention, but it is still appropriate to recall Thomas Garrigue Masaryk, for his teachings and his example have something of importance for our times.

His life shows what a man can accomplish. It is a success story hardly rivaled by the classic success stories of American history. Masaryk was born of a peasant family and was obliged from the very start to make his own way in surroundings much less favorable than he would have encountered in the United States of that day. In spite of everything, he was able to get the best education, and he began his professional career as a lecturer in philosophy at the University of Vienna. Later he was transferred to the Czech section of the University of Prague. His work there was eventually to lead him to the Presidency of the newly created Czechoslovak state.

The first step consisted in learning to understand the problems which his nation faced inside the Dual Monarchy. The second was to educate the Czechs through his work as a teacher, writer, and journalist. He realized early that Czech intellectual life was dependent on two developments: the reawakening which was begun by Palacky and Havlicek in the mid-nineteenth century must be carried forward; and the romanticism which had stimulated that movement must be replaced by a genuine historical insight and self-imposed criticism. The Czechs, he felt, must learn to evaluate their culture, abandon their narrow horizons, and try to relate their problems to the whole pattern of European affairs. Through his personal influence Masaryk stimulated the mental life of the university, and through his writings he introduced Czech students and intellectuals to the main currents of European thought and led them to examine carefully the true historical bases of Czech national life.

Masaryk's political career began in 1891 when he was elected to the Austrian Parliament. There he began to study the position of the Czechs and the other minority groups in the empire and found an urgent need for a redistribution of political power. It was necessary to devise a way by which the empire's many component groups could live together harmoniously and share the responsibilities of government. Greater political and cultural autonomy for the Slavs would have to be achieved if the regime was to continue in existence. That was Masaryk's conception of the problem, and it was a sound one.

In practice, of course, he could accomplish nothing against an aristocratic German oligarchy and a corrupt bureaucracy, but his efforts in the years before the First World War gained him a European reputation. In the Hilsner ritual murder case of 1899 he exposed the prejudice-ridden administration and the narrow-minded bigotry of its chiefs. Later, in the Agram treason trial which followed the annexation by Austria of Bosnia and Herzegovina, he revealed to all Europe the scheming ambitions of a ruling class which overestimated its own strength and tried by fraudulent means to extend its power in the Balkans. The first case won Masaryk the friendship of Jews all over the world and of men of every race who abhorred religious and racial prejudice. The second helped him to establish effective contact with the southern Slavs and proved him to be the champion of certain broad principles rather than a mere defender of his country's interests.

ROBERT BASS, born in Czechoslovakia, is a graduate student at Columbia University.

On the eve of the Great War Masaryk went into voluntary exile. He saw that no effective reform was obtainable inside the empire and chose the courageous alternative of working for the emancipation of his people and other Slav groups from abroad. The difficulties of the task were tremendous. Little thought had been given to the matter before, and no adequate plans existed. The foreign offices of the Allies were not acquainted with the details of the situation or aware of its urgency. The Czech resistance group was without funds and could give no material assistance to the cause.

Masaryk's genius as a statesman and as an organizer was proved in those years. He went first to Geneva, then to France and England. His primary task was to get a hearing and eventual acceptance of his ideas. To this end he believed he must create through the press an enlightened public opinion which would first understand and sympathize and then help him in his work. No less necessary was a real agreement with the Allied war leaders, which Masaryk achieved through a persistently historical and sane exposition of his own nation's stand. Both his purposes were accomplished when his program was made a part of the official war aims. His next mission carried him to Russia on the eve of the military surrender and the Bolshevik revolution. In spite of the difficulties he encountered there, he succeeded in organizing a Czech army which began its journey to the western front via Siberia, Japan, and America under his personal direction.

The end of the war found Masaryk in America, rallying American Czechs and Slovaks to his cause and extending his agreement with the American war leaders. He was in this country when news came of his election to the Presidency of a free Czechoslovak state.

During the seventeen years of his Presidency Masaryk was able to exert unchallenged influence in the state. His reputation was tremendous, and his personality soon became a tradition among the Czechs. Until his retirement in 1935 he worked untiringly to make Czechoslovakia a progressive democracy—as it turned out, the only one in Central Europe. Under his guidance and within the framework of the constitution, the government proved to be the most stable on the Continent and the parliamentary system very nearly as well disciplined as that of England or America.

MASARYK was unquestionably a world figure, and his services to the cause of democracy were many. His activity as a statesman was his historical contribution. In the realm of political theory he made another contribution which gives immediate pertinence to his memory. This was his appraisal of the scientific outlook as the really democratic one. Democracy, in his view, meant a complete outlook on the world and on life. He conceived of it as a condition wherein men live by knowledge and principle and order their lives through a concrete awareness of the nature of things. He saw that what passed for democracy in his day did not correspond with his idea of it, and he hoped that what he saw was not yet its full-blown form. His own concept of a "more profoundly humanitarian democracy" was a departure from the traditional concepts of individual irresponsibility. He saw clearly that one of the great problems of the present day was the disintegration of organized group and political life, and he felt that the only real chance for the formation of a stable political structure and ideology lay in making secure the principle of democratic authority in society. He pointed out that this principle would have to penetrate deeply into the consciousness of modern man and become the guide for individual conduct and thought. That meant, of course, a new emphasis on the ideal of citizenship, of which he was such a fine embodiment. It meant also that democracy could not be associated any longer with the middle class, which gave it its modern form. Implied in Masaryk's view is the active participation of everyone in the political life of the state. Healthy democracy is an organic thing, and it becomes the role of the individual to understand its cohesive character and to contribute to it. Masaryk sensed that anything which works to destroy this basic integrity of the social system is eventually itself destroyed, but he observed that the increasing complexity of the large democratic state does not necessarily foster disruptive tendencies; rather it makes the possibilities of individual participation in the working of the system infinitely greater.

Education was the crux of the new democratic ideology and action. The application of knowledge and intelligence to the conduct of life was democracy itself. An accurate appraisal of individual and social relationships became, when acted upon, the essence of democratic life. Ignorance, on the other hand, was the worst enemy of social living. It gave rise to false values and actually built the whole structure of social life on a lie.

These ideas are important today when everyone stands confronted with the need of understanding the bases of world conflict, and when a wholesale revaluation of world ideologies seems required. Masaryk, we feel, still has real pertinence to the effort. His analysis of the problem and the solution he envisaged are modern and fundamental. It is fitting, therefore, not only to pay him homage as an outstanding European statesman but to remember and study him when we face the questions on whose solution our survival actually depends.

Sun, Sea, and Sand

BY HORACE SUTTON

Hamilton, Bermuda

IT HAS been about a year since automobiles were introduced to Bermuda's roads, and six years since the United States came down to build an airfield at one end of the island and a naval base at the other.

These two events have caused marked changes in post-war Bermuda. The colony's cost of living has risen anywhere from 68 to 100 per cent. A beach hotel on the American plan which charged from $9 to $16 for a room and bath in 1939 is currently asking from $16 to $35 for the same accommodation. Rooms in the commercial hotels and rooming houses which were $1.50 and $2 are $3 and $5 today. Everyone made money during the war, and the colony seems to have developed a smug complacency which has been resented by visitors. One of the most barbed criticisms came from Norman Bel Geddes, who was here recently and was quoted as saying, "We are continually irritated . . . merely tolerated. Don't go to Bermuda, just send a check and stay at home."

Meanwhile, as the Bermudians like to point out, the sun, the sea, and the sand are still the same. And today, via a Colonial Airlines DC-4 Skycruiser, only three and a half hours after leaving New York or Washington you can soar over Bermuda's frosty white houses that sparkle among the cedar trees like lumps of sugar scattered on a lawn. Three air lines are flying in, but the ship service is still limited, with no relief in sight until the Queen of Bermuda goes back into service sometime next spring.

Whereas Bermuda formerly had accommodations for 4,000 tourists, only 1,621 beds are now available for occupancy. Less than ten hotels and rooming houses of those in operation follow an unrestricted policy. Among these are the Summerside, Buena Vista, Fairylands Club, Oxford House, New Windsor Hotel, American House, Everest Hotel, and Somers Inn. Three of the leading hotels—the Castle Harbor, the Bermudiana, and the St. George—have been purchased by an Anglo-American company headed by the Hilton Hotel Corporation, which includes among its interests the Plaza in New York and the Palmer House in Chicago. The St. George Hotel, the only one of the Hilton interests which is now open, maintains partial restriction, on a percentage basis. Colonel Joseph Binns, Hilton vice-president, has said, "The policy of the Hilton Hotels is to run each hotel in the manner best suited to the locality and surroundings." For the manner of the locality one need only walk up Reid Street in Hamilton, where a sign on a dingy "tu'-penny, ha'penny" luncheonette reads, "Koffee Kup—Quick Snacks—Restricted Clientele—Upstairs." Travel agents knowing of the restrictions have used the code names Oleander and Hibiscus in requesting accommodations in Bermuda. Oleander signifies the applicant is Gentile; Hibiscus means Jewish.

Bermuda's new miniature taxis, of which there are several hundred, will be a godsend to anyone who might have difficulty making the transition from the speed of American living to the horse-and-carriage pace which used to prevail here. The cabs charge 40 cents the first mile, 20 cents a mile thereafter, and they afford the tourist a chance to see more of the sights than he could take in on a leisurely carriage ride.

At Devil's Hole one can drop a hookless fishing line into a pool and try to pull up a grouper, a turtle, or a shark. The Angel's Grotto serves food on a water-side terrace and offers swimming, boating, and dancing. Descending into the Leamington Caves, one can wander among the stalactites and stalagmites, choose a live lobster from a subterranean crystal pool, and sit down to eat it at the end of the tour in a handsome, cedar-paneled dining room above ground. Dinner is $3.50. There is tennis on the government courts at Hamilton at $1 an hour; an aquarium at The Flats allows one to walk on the ocean floor in a diving helmet; and the home of Tom Moore, the Irish poet, is open for food and drink. Some hotels have swimming pools, but many people find Bermuda's greatest attraction in its secluded beaches, where one can swim in the lime-green sea. Coral Beach charges a dollar a day if one can arrange to be introduced, but most of the south-shore beaches are open to all at no cost.

Like everything else, the prices in the shops have gone sky-high, but they are nevertheless a substantial cut below prices in the States for the same articles. Perfume is at least 40 per cent below American prices. Fine cashmere cloth costs $16 a yard. British tweeds are about $5 a yard. Argyle socks are $3.50, and scotch is $4 a fifth. Many shops exhibit hand-carved cedar objects. You can bring home $100 worth of merchandise, including a gallon of liquor, duty free. Colonial Airlines allows you sixty-six pounds, which, if you are no clothes-horse, is about twice the amount of clothing you would need for a week's stay. The local costume for men is still knee-length shorts worn with high stockings, shirt, and tie, an ensemble born of tropical necessity and British severity.

Passports and tourist cards are not required, but American immigration demands proof of citizenship, a detail which can be established by anything from a driver's license to a strong argument.

Del Vayo—Will De Gaulle Come Back?

Paris, September 12

OCTOBER will be a crucial month for France. The municipal elections will take place. Under the constitution of the Fourth Republic general elections are not held as frequently as before; so the municipal balloting becomes an important test of the parties' strength and popularity. The new factor this time is Charles de Gaulle, for the General has decided to use the elections as a proving ground for his movement, the Rally of the French People.

Unquestionably he has chosen a propitious moment. It is a mistake to think of De Gaulle as a man totally divorced from politics, above the battle. His tactical skill in politics is no less highly developed than his mastery of military tactics. Despite repeated pleas from his friends, De Gaulle refused to leave his retreat at Colombey-les-deux-Eglises until two things had happened: the Communists had reached the peak of their popular strength, and the United States had assumed command of the drive to stop Russia.

De Gaulle's original ambition was not to head a simple rightist movement. He would have liked to lead the mass of the French people away from extremism along that middle road which appeals to his logical mind. But the struggle in France, as everywhere in Europe, is more and more between left and right, between revolution and counter-revolution, even when revolution takes only the form of nationalization, and counter-revolution that of sacrificing everything for an American loan. In Europe today the middle of the road grows less and less passable. Because they failed to see this the French Socialists have suffered a steady loss of votes. For the same reasons De Gaulle has been pushed back into the right—to which he had always belonged until the war made him leader of the non-party Resistance.

The General's return from voluntary retirement and his decision to enter candidates in the municipal elections were carefully timed. The R. P. F. will go before the voters as the "party of order," a title claimed in the past by every French movement that set out to "stop revolution." But a party of order can only justify its existence in a revolutionary period when the bourgeoisie is terrified by warnings that the country is on the edge of violent upheaval. Actually France today contains several revolutionary elements, and the reference in my last article to the 1789 Convention was no mere figure of speech. The Parisians who demonstrated before the palace of Louis XVI at Versailles were asking for bread. France's present bread ration has been cut from 250 to 200 grams a day, and a large part of the population gets even less. By October the ration may be cut again, to 150 grams. This year's wheat harvest is the poorest in more than a hundred years. Nor can the country hope for wheat substitutes; because of the severe drought the potato crop threatens to be seven million quintals below pre-harvest estimates.

Taken together, all this offers the perfect opportunity for the Rally of the French People to present itself as the only solution. It has merely to campaign on two issues: the danger that the Communists will play on the desperation of a people threatened by famine, and the government's inability to cope with the economic crisis. De Gaulle's program becomes very simple—anti-communism and a presidential state.

The Gaullist propaganda machine seems to have large funds at its disposal; current rumors credit American sources, but it is more probable that the contributions come from French business men who, together with the professional class and women, form the bulk of his following. De Gaulle has gathered around him a band of able men, notably Capitant, Soustelle, Pleven, Palewski, and Malraux. Malraux's literary talent has full play in the propaganda of the R. P. F., and he appears to be enjoying his role as apostle of action and exponent of the ego. However, in the final analysis the main asset of the movement is De Gaulle. Among all the historical allusions applied to De Gaulle the most apt is the remark of Louis Napoleon: "My name is my program."

All these factors tend to create the impression that the Rally of the French People is an irresistible movement. Yet Parisians who have just returned from summer vacations in the provinces tell me that the country is not nearly as enthusiastic about De Gaulle as his devoted followers plus certain foreign correspondents would have us believe. The General himself, recognizing the limitations of his movement, has cautiously declared that in next month's elections the R. P. F. will support candidates, regardless of party affiliation, who join and subscribe to its principles. They are even encouraged not to leave their party but rather to become the General's "companions in the test of public salvation." In this way De Gaulle remains above parties—as he has always desired—and at the same time takes full advantage of their support.

While continuing his attacks on the Communists and his denunciations of Russian expansionism, the General realizes that he cannot depend solely on American favor—after all, in France Americans have no votes. In his speech last Sunday he came out sharply against both Russia and the American plan to rebuild a strong Germany. De Gaulle understands French opinion, and he is working hard to win the broadest kind of backing. Those who hope he will resort to a coup de force if defeated at the polls would do well to ponder a warning he issued back in 1943: "If there are still any Bastilles left, I think they would do well to open their doors voluntarily. When a fight breaks out between the people and the Bastille, the Bastille always ends up in the wrong." Last week-end a million Parisian workmen demonstrated at another historic site; but the Champs de Mars is not far from the Place de la Bastille.

[This is the second of three articles on French politics. In the last Mr. del Vayo will discuss the chances of the left parties in the October elections.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Totalitarian Myth

THE LAST DAYS OF HITLER. By H. R. Trevor-Roper. The Macmillan Company, $3.

LIKE most other forms of writing, history is today pretty much a neglected art. A brilliant professional performance like H. R. Trevor-Roper's "The Last Days of Hitler" is for that reason the more welcome and reassuring. And Trevor-Roper's triumph is all the more astonishing because it is achieved, not at the comparatively easy game of writing about the past, but at the tougher and more complex discipline of contemporary history.

In his capacity as intelligence officer Trevor-Roper was ordered in September, 1945, to investigate the circumstances surrounding the death of Hitler. He interrogated those who survived the last fantastic days in the bunker, scrutinized all the evidence with a critical eye, and put together, as well as anyone can what actually took place in Hitler's last days. But the brilliance of "The Last Days of Hitler" lies not just in its meticulous sifting of evidence and reconstruction of the crime—a job which any good private eye could do—but in the historical imagination which brings the events to life and puts them in an almost classic setting.

Trevor-Roper's characterizations of the Nazi leaders are so precise, penetrating, and almost lapidary that it is hard to think they will be seriously revised in years to come. Himmler, credulous, indecisive, the real dupe of the Nordic nonsense; Goebbels, the jesuitical intellectual; Bormann, the persistent schemer; Göring, the tired voluptuary: as Trevor-Roper sketches them, the apparent inconsistencies which have long puzzled students of the Nazi nightmare fall into place. His special dramatic triumph lies in the confrontation of Hitler, that man of demonic will, and Albert Speer, the honest technocrat who liked to build and thought that politics were irrelevant.

They were the worst and the best in Germany. Yet, as Trevor-Roper concludes, in a sense "Speer is the real criminal of Nazi Germany. . . . His keen intelligence diagnosed the nature and the mutations of Nazi government and policy; he saw and despised the personalities around him; he heard their outrageous orders and understood their fantastic ambitions; but he did nothing. Supposing politics to be irrelevant, he turned aside, and built roads and bridges and factories, while the logical consequences of government by madmen emerged."

Though his focus is the death of Hitler, Trevor-Roper throws off many fascinating insights about the nature of Nazi dictatorship. His book corroborates the conclusion of the United States Strategic Bombing Survey that the Nazi economy was never fully concentrated on war production and that "total mobilization" remained a gleam in the eye of Goebbels. He also develops a striking theory about the impossibility of real totalitarianism. Once you have government by irresponsible absolutism, he argues, then "every man whose position makes him either strong or vulnerable must protect himself against surprise by reserving from the common pool whatever power he has managed to acquire. Thus there is, in the end, no common pool at all." The structure of the German state, far from being "pyramidal" or "monolithic," became instead a confusion of private empires, private armies, and private intelligence services.

Trevor-Roper does not refuse the opportunities for irony and moral judgment in which his material abounds. Thirty-three years old and an Oxford don, he has clearly set himself in the school of Gibbon. But the result is not the flatulent historical prose of an Arthur Bryant or the hopped-up rhetoric of a Guedalla; it is a successful transposition of the Gibbon manner into contemporary English. Like everything else about "The Last Days of Hitler," it is an astonishing and resounding success.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

Prelude to Planning

AMERICA'S NEEDS AND RESOURCES. A Twentieth Century Fund Survey Which Includes Estimates for 1950 and 1960. By J. Frederic Dewhurst and Associates. Twentieth Century Fund, $5.

AMERICANS have recently emerged from a great war victorious—with homes and factories undamaged, almost unrivaled military power, much the highest national income not only in the world but in their own history, and virtually full employment. Yet they are ill at ease and filled with forebodings. They lack confidence in their economic order.

Is their anxiety justified? The recent publication of this detailed and scholarly study has led some commentators to assert that it is not, for the volume not only shows, on the basis of a great wealth of economic statistics, the amazing upsurge of production and general welfare which has occurred in the past but also demonstrates the possibility of similar progress in the future.

The average per capita income in this country grew from about $270 in 1850 to $1,170 in 1944. The total net output of goods and services increased twenty-seven times in the same period, but the labor force employed in 1944 was only eight and a half times as large as in 1850 and the working week decreased from seventy hours to forty-seven. This almost miraculous achievement was due largely to the substitution of power derived from coal, oil, gas, and water for the muscle power of men and animals. We used seventy times as much mineral energy per man-hour of work in 1940 as we did in 1850; and if this tendency continues we shall be using in 1960 a hundred times as much as we used a hundred years earlier.

The great question is whether or not this trend will continue. Haven't we come to a dead end? Surely we can't go on forever increasing production at the rate that was possible in a new and developing country. After all, the frontier has passed, population growth has slowed down, and industry is already highly mechanized.

"America's Needs and Resources" makes it clear that we can still expand our production—if we satisfy all the wants and reasonable needs of the population. The authors of the report estimate the size of the population in 1950 and in 1960. They make a conservative guess at what the national product is likely to be in those years. In 1950, according to this estimate, the national product will be a little more than a third larger than it was in 1940 or, in money terms, $204 billion; it was $200 billion in 1946. Yet, assuming that there will be no marked change in the distribution of income and that people will continue to buy according to their means, those at the bottom of the scale will still lack enough for a "minimum of health and decency" as defined in standard family budgets. The deficiency in 1950 would be 11 per cent of the total output; in 1960 it would be 7 per cent. And progress need not stop even when everyone had been brought up to the minimum—a level which most readers of this article would find scanty indeed.

So far so good, but if this report is used only for purposes of reassurance that if we conduct our affairs in the future as we have in the past we shall have no cause for worry, the effort put into it will have been largely wasted. And in any case curves on charts showing trends of rising income are not sufficient to quell popular fears of economic disaster.

No sensible person has ever supposed that want has been abolished in America or that there will not be enough for all of us to do if human needs are well satisfied. Unemployment in 1932, 1921, or any other period did not spring from the fact that there were too many goods in the hands of those who needed them most. The fear that the nation might be equipped to produce more than people would need or want is a bogymen of the economic nursery.

"America's Needs and Resources" does not go into these questions. It does not show and does not pretend to show how we may avoid depressions and unemployment; it does not prove that production and wealth will actually grow in the future as they have in the past—but only that the increase is possible.

Let us look at America's needs and resources from another point of view. Suppose, instead of passively accepting historical trends as the pattern of the future, we assumed that everyone in the country should have adequate food, shoes, clothing, houses, transportation, schools, doctors, hospitals, recreation, government services. Suppose we recognized that, in view of the spotty record of the past and the shortages of the present, this consummation could be brought about only by careful planning. The first necessity would be a careful survey of the facts—and that is what this report provides. In chapter after chapter experts demonstrate in detail what the needs will be in many fields; they show what big jobs remain to be done in satisfying even minimum requirements. They indicate that at the lower levels of income the major lack will be food; at other levels housing, medical care, and so on. They point out the large government expenditures that would be required. They show that with an intelligent foreign-trade policy we would not lack the necessary raw materials, and that the question of how much we can produce depends on the rate of increase of output per man-hour and the number of hours worked.

These facts have little value as prediction; they have enormous value as a definition of the problem. The report is like a map of the topography of a region which the invader is about to enter. It does not tell us where we shall go, but it does tell us what we are likely to find if we follow any given route. The rest is up to us.

The right way to deal with anxiety about the economic future, like the right way to deal with any other anxiety, is not to pretend that everything will come out all right but to formulate and carry through a program based on a careful and balanced survey of the facts.

It may be too late now to prevent the recession which is likely to follow the present inflation of prices and profits. But it is not too late to plan against the depression which will probably come when the backlogs of demand for commercial housing and automobiles are satisfied.

GEORGE SOULE

Three Poets

POEMS OF DEDICATION. By Stephen Spender. Random House. $2.

LOVE POEMS. By George Barker. The Dial Press. $2.

LAMENT FOR THE SLEEPWALKER. By Dunstan Thompson. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

READING the three latest books of Spender, Barker, and Thompson—in that order—left me with an abnormal feeling. It was as strange as that. I felt as if I had traveled through three generations of poets whose family resemblance, decreasing in the ratio of one to one-half to one-quarter, was noticeable mainly through the coarsening of the features. The resemblance seemed largely a physical mystery, Thompson being present in his poems the most corporeally, and Spender the least. The less poet, the more poem.

Spender, like Barker and Thompson, writes of course from his own experience, his own feelings. But whereas Barker, to a large extent, and Thompson, almost entirely, write from their feelings, Spender writes from his feelings. The feelings are more important than the poet who feels them, simply because they are the bridge from poet to reader. Both can feel; they have that capacity in common. And if they do, understanding is at least possible. For the poet and the reader really go through the same creative process: through the medium of the poem the poet relates his own experience to universalized experience; through the medium of the poem the reader relates the universalized experience to his own experience. In that process lies the marriage of true minds in which both poet and reader are dissolved and only the poem remains.

Spender is one of the few poets today who can make his experience his reader's experience. Comparing his new book with his previous one, "Ruins and Visions," one can locate the general direction of his development. The main theme of the previous volume was separation, the struggle to relate himself to something larger than himself: the poetry derived from the struggle—not merely his own—and from the misunderstanding of it. In the new poems the theme is meeting—sometimes not quite meeting but correlation, connection: the poetry is in the coming together, the fusing, of what is inside the self with what is outside. Consequently, he can begin to express himself more fully and more truly. The title of the book is accurate; he is free to dedicate himself. In the new poems people, events, nature, function more freely and organically than before.

Spender's greatest shortcomings have always been his unsure ear and sense of form. Spender is an eye poet, and it is no accident that the eye is one of his favorite symbols. The eye to him is the intellect, meaning, the mirror which both discloses the inner world and discovers the outer world. The eye is also space as the ear is time. (Compare Eliot's use of eye symbols in The Hollow Men.) To a time-ridden civilization, Spender's insistence on the visible and spatial is a virtue, just as his refusal to surrender to facile sound (Barker, Thompson) is a virtue. But notwithstanding that, the meaning of a poem must be expressed through sound, which is to poetry what current is to electricity. When Spender writes, "The core of the day/Is these twin spheres of eyes," the sound annihilates any meaning the lines might possibly convey. Another poem (Lost) is inactivated by two bad rhymes which dissociate sound and meaning. Still other poems, while intellectually developed from stanza to stanza, fail because the sound does not bring the meaning close enough to the surface to create the current without which the total effect of the poem becomes inhibited. This inhibition, the central fault of many of the poems, occurs when, within the frame of the poem, a sure relationship of part to part and parts to the whole is not established. Then his metaphors sound forced and contrived; and it is the sound that tells the reader they are untrue. Spender also misuses run-on lines, sometimes to the point where a six-line stanza can be written just as well in three lines. It is significant that when his meaning is less directly personal, as in the third stanza of Midsummer, sound and meaning are beautifully fused.

On the whole, however, the new poems are more controlled and traditional; many of them contain their meanings more surely; and the general tone is less imperative than it is in "Ruins and Visions." The advance is clear, and that, in terms of Spender's

The Candide Press

IMPORTERS OF ENGLISH BOOKS PUBLISHED IN PARIS

are proud to offer an American edition of

THE WORLD-FAMOUS

Waggish Tales of the Czecks

NINETY-SIX LAYES OF THE LOWER DANUBE

Delightfully Illustrated

In a beautifully printed and boxed edition every copy numbered, at

$20 A COPY

To make sure of getting your copy

ORDER NOW

A detailed prospectus yours for the asking

Such pleasure has never before been made available for so little money

CANDIDE PRESS, 112 E. 10th Street, New York 3, N. Y.

Gentlemen,

- ☐ I enclose $20 for my numbered copy of WAGGISH TALES.
☐ Send me your prospectus of the WAGGISH TALES.

NAME _____

NO. & ST. _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____

STATE _____

- ☐ Send me WAGGISH TALES C.O.D. I enclose $2 as evidence of good faith and will pay balance to the postman.

development, is more important than the consideration that "Ruins and Visions" contains more examples of his best work, if also more of his worst, than the present collection. In the meantime, we have some half-dozen good poems—a large number—of which I would call the sixth poem of Elegy for Margaret and The Trance the most successful. I prefer the former—it is one of Spender's best—but a stanza from The Trance is more quotable:

To that deep care we are committed
Beneath the wildness of our flesh
And shuddering horror of our dream,
Where unmasked agony is permitted.
Our bodies, stripped of clothes that seem,
And our souls, stripped of beauty's mesh,
Meet our true selves, their charms outwitted.

George Barker's new poems do not, at least to me, reveal anything new in his poetic development. He is still almost all ear. He still produces orchestrations of sounds which move from and to the never-never land of the senses. At his best, the sounds reverberate on the senses of the reader, freeing them for a moment of physical weight like music, but as poetry, dissolving the fear rather than clarifying the meaning of the experience.

But it is seldom that "Love rises from her bed of senses." More often than not, Barker's meaning is so thin, so inexact, at times so empty, that his sound becomes disenchanted and breaks up, exposing a mere collection of now uninflated words, which, since they mean nothing, give the lie to the emotion that produced them. Most of the poems are all electricity and no current. When he writes, "I also go down all roads and/ Ask everything why," the reader can only conclude that to express a thought so badly must mean that it is not true.

Barker's love poems come in cycles; there are four of them, twenty-four poems, most of which can be read as fast as the eye can run. The best are in the Fourth Cycle where the sound rises to a distracted wail and his subjection to the burden of his experience is communicated.

Barker must find a way out of what he calls his "mnemonic room," the prison of his own experience. Right now, his endeavor to do so is unsuccessful; mostly he just manufactures meanings when he tries to find the larger connection. He is aware of his dilemma. One can only wait and see and, if one is concerned about poetry, hope hard.

The promise of Dunstan Thompson's first book is to no computable extent fortified by "Lament for the Sleepwalker." He is so far only a thick shadow of Barker—and of Whitman. Thompson's poems do not, even in terms of sound, free themselves from the burden of their author's experience. They are sodden with sound; they never rise from the sensual floor. They get under the reader's feet; he steps on them. His eye is unable to crawl its way through them on its fool's errand to the brain. Thompson is concerned only with his own feelings, which he sees through a landscape of sex so befuddled, festooned, and tricked out with poetic claptrap that when he writes "Guilt like a rust enamels me," the reader—this reader—must, while removing the slag from his brain, substitute "gilt."

Especially in the longer poems Thompson's form is sloppy; he indulges in empty trickery with unconscionable aplomb, and writes lines which, short or long, jerk along to nowhere while his sleepwalker goes "from one bed to another in search of himself." The endings of the poems—their proof—are forced, unarrived-at, and to all poetic purpose, dishonest. Failing to communicate through sexual imagery a general feeling, his poems become as impersonal as sex. At the very least, one thinks, he could, in the words of Shakespeare's Duke in "Measure for Measure," "let the devil/ Be sometime honor'd for his burning throne." But eventually, he must, in order to find out where he is, get out of bed.

H. P. LAZARUS

Labor and Politics

HISTORY OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT IN THE UNITED STATES.

By Philip S. Foner. International Publishers. $4.50.

MR. FONER has covered the history of the labor movement from the colonial period to the 1880's. It is a competent work, although the reader schooled in labor history will not find many new facts. The material and its division are generally similar to earlier works in the field, except that Dr. Foner has included some information on slave rebellions.

The author's purpose is to interpret American labor history and to demonstrate that the thesis evolved by the Wisconsin School—Professor John R. Commons and his students—is erroneous. This thesis is that the American worker is not inclined to be class conscious, that he is interested in pursuing limited objectives, such as improvements in wages and working conditions, and that he avoids independent political action and is, instead, inclined to follow a policy of pressure politics. Contemporary events, the author argues, have "completely exploded this analysis of the history of the American labor movement." But have they?

The Wisconsin School has never argued that common action of labor, skilled and unskilled, was not possible. Too many examples of such action can be found in the four volumes of Commons's History to demonstrate that such a charge is unwarranted. Nor has it argued that labor is not or has not been active politically. Moreover, the conclusions reached by the Wisconsin School are presented not as eternal dogmas but as generalizations based upon the observation of certain tendencies. Nowhere in the Commons History is the assumption made that the future must inevitably resemble the past. Yet those who advocate a new course must demonstrate its advisability by a preponderance of evidence.

It is incorrect to maintain that Gompers opposed political action, or that such was the view of the Wisconsin School. Being essentially a labor leader and not an armchair philosopher, Gompers could, if conditions made it necessary, change his mind. It was under his leadership that the modern trade unions embarked upon their first large-scale political activity, and the contemporary labor movement, despite its three-fold increase in membership, still follows the pressure policies of Gompers. Take away the trimmings, and it becomes clear that both the Citizens' and the C. I. O. Political Action Committees were the Gompers Labor Representation Committee of 1906 on an expanded scale. The demise of the Citizens' Political Action Committee and the official drawing away of the

C. I. O. leadership from its successor show that an organization even mildly tainted with class-struggle radicalism is regarded as a liability by responsible labor leaders.

Certainly, the labor movement has increased its political activity, and is likely to increase it still further in the future. However, this has occurred because of the growing importance of government in collective bargaining, the establishment of programs of social security, and the belief that government should, by its fiscal and tax policies, encourage full employment. To American labor, political action is a means of getting increased job and social security and not of replacing the social system.

Dr. Foner's attempt at Marxian interpretation is more ambitious than successful. The facts of American labor history are not so easily fitted into a Procrustean bed of Marxist dogma.

PHILIP TAFT

Fiction in Review

THE only thing that makes Anna Kavan's "The House of Sleep" (Doubleday, $2.50) worth writing about—nothing makes it worth reading—is the point of view it shares with a considerable section of our literary culture, the most "advanced" section, that madness is a normal or even a rather better-than-normal way of life. Although Miss Kavan's book is called a novel, it has no single characteristic of fiction—no narrative, no characters, no insight into or enlargement of our common reality. In fact, it deliberately avoids reality except in so far as it uses words which, however arbitrarily arranged, yet manage to evoke fleeting glimpses of a momentarily recognizable universe. A kaleidoscope of the subjective states of an increasingly disordered mind, recorded half as if from within the sick mind itself and half as if through the eye of an outsider much too closely identified with her subject, "The House of Sleep" seems to me to have been published only by virtue of our utter confusion as to what life and literature are all about. I haven't the slightest idea what it means to be told of such a pretentious piece of non-communication that it is a "penetrating insight into the subconscious world of dreams and shadows." To me, insight necessarily proceeds from some kind of organized vision of reality. And the subconscious world of dreams and shadows is interesting only if it adds to our information about the world of consciousness, which Miss Kavan's book does not.

But it is clear that Miss Kavan has a principled disagreement with this position. She explains her own stand in an introduction sufficiently brief to be quoted entire:

The creative impulse is the result of tension; without tension life would not exist. If human life be accepted as the result of tension between the two polarities of night and day, the negative polarity, must have at least equal importance with the positive day.

jean-paul SARTRE

EXISTENTIALISM

The first book to appear in America on EXISTENTIALISM
by its leader
and chief protagonist,
JEAN-PAUL SARTRE.

EXISTENTIALISM and JEAN-PAUL SARTRE are the postwar storm centers in philosophy and literature. They represent a "movement" involving the peculiar confusions that beset this generation in all aspects of its civilization. In this book, Sartre explains and analyzes the essence of the philosophy of EXISTENTIALISM.

At your Bookstore, or order from: $2.75

LIMITED EDITION ORDER
NOW!

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY, Publishers

THE PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY, DEPT. N, 15 EAST 40th ST., NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

Please send me copies of EXISTENTIALISM, by JEAN-PAUL SARTRE, at $2.75 per copy. Enclosed are $.....

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

At night, under the negative influence, subjected to cosmic radiations of a different kind, human affairs are apt to come to a crisis; at night most human beings die and are born.

"The House of Sleep" describes in the night-time language certain critical stages in the development of one individual human being. No interpretation is needed of this dream tongue we all, as a matter of course, have spoken in sleep and childhood; but for the sake of absolute clearness a short paragraph at the head of each section indicates the corresponding day situation.

Every sentence of this statement invites examination. It is the second sentence, however, that reveals the serious misapprehension under which Miss Kavan has conceived her book. For believing that human life is a tension between the two polarities of reason and non-reason and that non-rationality, instead of being an element in the human composition that normally is and should be under the dominion of reason, asserts an "at least equal" authority with reason, Miss Kavan sets herself firmly against our common social view. She distinctly refuses the usual attitude whereby the whole test of health lies in this delicate matter of degree, the attitude which says that when a person's non-reason approaches even a 50 per cent dominion over his reason it means that the person is sick and of only questionable use to society.

As to the sentences that follow this one, they too make rather singular assumptions. When Miss Kavan writes, "at night, under the negative influence," one is moved to ask her why negative; what makes night negative?

And when she continues, "... subjected to cosmic radiations of a different kind," one wants to know what is meant by a cosmic radiation of any kind. In support of Miss Kavan's affirmation that "at night most human beings die and are born," one asks for statistics; and in support of Miss Kavan's assertion that her text is written in the "dream tongue we all, as a matter of course, have spoken in sleep and childhood" one inquires whom Miss Kavan means by "we all." Certainly, even as a matter very much out of course, this reviewer was never capable of an infant- or sleep-speech of such fineness as the following: "the blessed genii who walk about in the light—gazing with blissful eyes of still, eternal clearness. The perennially clear eye of the Heaven-Born opens to a state of shockingly bright moonlight. The eye is located at presumptive Godheight so that the terrestrial globe is seen as if from an airplane cruising over it at about three thousand feet." And I pick my passage at random; there are others of an even more exacerbated delicacy.

But, as I say, none of this would be worth stopping over were Miss Kavan's book only an isolated instance of its kind, unrelated to the culture of our time. Actually, the author of "The House of Sleep" not only has a distinguished reputation both in her own England and in this country but also speaks for an attitude that is finding a frighteningly wide adherence among our literary advance guard. Almost in the degree that our popular writing has moved more and more into the power realm and tried to mold itself into an instrument to control a world of the most immediate realities, our art literature has moved more and more into the realm of shadow and dreams and tried to substitute for the grimness of reality the poetry of non-rationality. The very people who are in the advance guard of complaint that ours is a schizophrenic society have themselves, it seems, little better than schizophrenia to offer as a cure. DIANA TRILLING

In Brief

DR. CAMPBELL'S DIARY OF A VISIT TO ENGLAND IN 1775.

Newly Edited from the MS by James L. Clifford. With an Introduction by S. C. Roberts. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

THOMAS CAMPBELL was an Irish clergyman moved in his own small way by the same kind of curiosity which led Boswell and Walpole to record their impressions of men and manners. Most of his short diary is concerned with what he saw and heard on one visit to London, and the history of the manuscript is almost as strange as the document itself. Completely unknown for some three-quarters of a century after it was written, it was printed, in part, in Australia in 1854, and the book, because so little was known about it, came to be regarded by some students as a hoax. A few years ago, however, the relentless persistence of Professor Clifford succeeded in locating the manuscript in the Mitchell Library of Sydney, where it had lain uncatalogued for years. He has now printed it in full with an ac-

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, and staged."

Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4256
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. and Sat. 2:30. Air-Conditioned

NOTICE TO NEWSSTAND READERS.

The only certain way of getting The Nation regularly is to enter a subscription. By doing so you will not only insure prompt receipt of your copy, but you will make a considerable saving in money over the newsstand price. Why not fill in the coupon on page 263 and mail it to us today!

MOTION PICTURES

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
88th ST.
Bet. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
RECENT
23rd ST.

RKO NOW

"Tense Adventure"—N. Y. Times
ROBT. YOUNG SUSAN HAYWARD
JANE GREER

'They Won't Believe Me'

— RKO —
'Woman on the Beach'
JOAN BENNETT — ROBERT RYAN

BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
W.H. PLAINS
YONKERS

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

"PIQUANT ENTERTAINMENT"—P.M.
Gene Tierney • Rex Harrison
George Sanders

'THE GHOST and MRS. MUIR'
From R. A. DICK'S Novel

'MOSS ROSE'
VICTOR MATUR • ETHEL BARRYMORE
From JOSEPH SHEARIN'S Novel

QUEENS
BIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kelt's
FLUSHING
Kelt's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

count of the author and elaborate notes. The fact that Campbell was especially interested in Samuel Johnson will guarantee him readers, and he records several well-known sayings in unfamiliar form. In at least two famous instances Campbell either heard or at least remembered sayings as couched in language a good deal more Rabelaisian than any attributed by Boswell to "the great moralist," and one pronouncement concerning the principal pleasures of life may curl some hair. Professor Clifford's editing is a model of thoroughness which leaves very few of the many obscure references unexplained.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE last of the books on my desk for review is Kolodin's new edition of his "Guide to Recorded Music" (Doubleday, $3.50), which I would feel no need of concerning myself with (any more than with the later editions of Hall's "Record Book") if even one of the reviews of the first edition that I saw in 1941 had put on record an adequate description of what I read in the book.

Kolodin's revisions include elimination of inconsequential errors of the kind that are unavoidable in such a compilation (one of the readers whom he thanks for pointing them out might tell him that the Bach Toccata in D recorded by Pessl is the same work as the Toccata and Fugue in D recorded by Landowska). But also eliminated is an erroneous statement of a different and not inconsequential kind. Concerning the Beecham recording of Mozart's Symphony K. 201 Kolodin wrote in 1941: "It has been my reaction, after hearing Beecham's more recent performances of this work, that the interpretation he recorded was a transitional one, tending toward the conception he holds today." I knew of no Beecham performances of K. 201 in this country after the recording; an accidental meeting with Beecham enabled me to ascertain that there had been none; and other inquiries established the fact that neither Beecham nor Columbia had received from England a sample pressing of a new recording that Kolodin might have heard. The statement appeared, then, to be an example of the interesting points a writer can make about imagined material.

Another example was the statement that followed it, in 1941, about Koussevitzky's recording of K. 201—that "Koussevitzky has incorporated many of the virtuous elements of [Beecham's] conception into his performance." This also is not in the new edition; but still present is the similar statement that Beecham's more recent recorded performance of Mozart's K. 338 "is the authentic conception of the work, not, as Koussevitzky's seems to me, a duplicate of the previous Beecham recording." It makes interesting reading; but as I observed once, try to imagine Koussevitzky listening to another conductor's performance, if at all, with any thought other than to show how he did it; better still, try listening to the Koussevitzky and the old Beecham recorded performances of K. 338. Listen merely to the two statements of the opening phrase of the Andante movement—to the sharply clipped staccatos of Koussevitzky, then to the same notes held longer and released without sharp clipping by Beecham (and note that I am talking about such objectively verifiable physical facts, not about subjective evaluations of these facts): they constitute one of the many dissimilarities in the actual styles of the two performances that represent the differences in the two conductors and their feeling about the music—Koussevitzky's style brisk, chirpy; Beecham's slower-moving, spaciiously elaborating. And it is such dissimilarities that you will hear, not the similarities of a copy and its original.

Now my reason for discussing these details is that they are especially clear-cut and striking examples of Kolodin's method throughout the book. And I should add that the method is a normal one of Kolodin's writing: his program-notes for the works performed by the New Friends of Music, for example, have been a profusion of points about them which I have had to conclude were mostly churned up in his own mind, since I couldn't discover the things they referred to in the works.

That sort of thing doesn't make for reliable guidance; and Kolodin is an astonishingly unreliable guide even in the simple matter of whether the recorded sound of a performance is natural and agreeable or unpleasantly false or distorted. A reader who in 1941 acquired the Stokowski performance of Stravinsky's "Firebird" that Kolodin described as "carefully defined" by the Columbia recording, or the Stokowski performance of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony that Kolodin described as "splendidly reproduced" by Columbia, would have found himself with two of the horrors of orchestral recording that Columbia perpetrated in those years; and on the other hand if fear of the "weaknesses" Kolodin found in the recording kept this reader from acquiring the Budapest Quartet performance of Mozart's K. 499, it would have deprived him of a beautiful H.M.V. recording of the performance. True, Kolodin had been using an Astatic pickup and 12-inch speaker which cut down the range of the reproduction and in this way reduced the defects of the recordings; but his book was going to be read by some people with wide-range reproducing equipment. And now he has a wide-range Brush pickup (but the same limited 12-inch speaker); but it doesn't seem to have made him any more reliable a guide. A reader will discover the realities of "Columbia's skillful reproduction of chamber music" only after he has acquired the defective recordings of the Budapest Quartet that Kolodin praises; that is how he will find out also about the noisy confusion caused by excessive hall-reverberation in the recent Victor recordings of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë," and Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," about which Kolodin's enthusiasm is unqualified; and the learning process won't stop there.

SEND FOOD TO EUROPE • Reliable, Quick Service!

No. 77A—$8.95

- 1 lb. sweet cocoa milk
- 1 lb. dried fruit
- $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. corned beef
- 1 lb. butter
- $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. bacon
- 1 lb. dehyd. potatoes
- 1 lb. rice
- $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. egg powder
- $\frac{3}{8}$ facial soaps

POSTAGE PACKING
AND GUARANTEE ARE INCLUDED

No. 78A—$5.50

- 1 lb. lard
- 1 lb. Irish stew
- 1 lb. coffee
- 1 lb. sugar
- 1 lb. macaroni
- 1 can imported sardines
- 2 facial soaps
- $\frac{3}{8}$ Lipton soups
- $\frac{3}{8}$ lb. hard candles

Write for Further Information and Price List. P. O. Receipt on Request
An additional 33¢ postage on packages to Austria, Hungary & Russia

J. KOHLS - PERSONAL PARCEL SERVICE
315 WEST 102nd STREET NEW YORK 25, N. Y. ACADEMY 2-3844

Letters to the Editor

Spanish Canvas

[The following letter, recently sent to The Nation by its recipient, was written two months ago by a Yale student traveling in Spain. For the light it sheds on Franco's dominion, we print it now, despite the delay from the time of writing.]

Dear —: Yesterday at five o'clock in the afternoon my Harvard friend and I crossed the border into France after a trip of exactly two weeks in Spain—one week in Pamplona and a week in Madrid. To write all or even half of my impressions would be impossible. So much can happen in two weeks, averaging twenty hours a day of more or less complete consciousness.

Since we arrived in San Sebastian on the evening of the referendum, perhaps that story should be dealt with first. Of the cities we visited in Spain, San Sebastian was the most thoroughly propagandized. Our dinner at the small hotel near the station was accompanied by alternate male and female voices delivering their message from the national radio network. It was all very interesting for a newcomer to a government-police-controlled state. With our caldó we learned of the order prevailing in Spain in the midst of a chaotic world; with bacalao, a recounting of the atrocities committed by the foreign-dominated republic; with chulets, a panegyric on the success of the regime in aid of farmers, workers, Catholics, teachers, mothers, et cetera; with dessert, a warning that a vote "Si" was a vote for Spain, a vote "No" a vote for foreign intervention, killing of children, destruction of homes and churches, and all the rest. By the time we had finished our coffee the entire process had started again.

By 11 p. m. we were exploring the handsome streets of San Sebastian. Each smooth blank spot of wall between the steel-shuttered stone fronts was "decorated" with small (2' x 4'), thin, well-glued announcements. There were some dozen different types. Each was headed by a designating word—Catholic, Student, Worker, Spaniard, Soldier, Woman, et cetera—and each explained the benefit of a "Si" vote for the people falling under the various categories. There were no posters asking for a negative vote. This all was very interesting at first sight.

Midnight found us trying to pay for a cognac in a cafe of the section of the city where the streets are narrow and without sidewalks. We had been talking about life in America with the family at the next table while at other tables people were playing cards, drinking milk, beer, coffee, wine, or sipping cognac. With some shouts and the roar of a truck motor several bundles of colored circulars were pitched from a shovel into the open doorway. No one rose to pick one up. The card game continued without interruption while few even looked toward the door. There were, however, several smiles as S— walked to the front of the cafe to get a sampling of the multicolored papers.

Later when we went out into the streets we found them littered with the same colored papers. At this time occurred the only unpleasant incident. While we were watching a Falange worker pasting a poster on the wall, one of the men from the truck approached us and asked, "Do you come here to fight us?" Before I could answer one of his more sober friends told him to keep quiet and leave the foreigners alone. The people walking in the streets were paying no attention to the truck with its men, shovels, and colored papers. The first night in Spain was a realistic portent of what was to follow in the next two weeks.

I must omit the detail and write a few general impressions before I close. I talked to people of all classes in Spain. We rode third class to Madrid and first class back. We had a beer at Cuatro Caminos and a cognac at the "Palace." I should guess that one person in eight with whom I talked was in favor of the regime of Franco. That is not to say that the other seven were in favor of a civil war to put him out. Everyone seems very much afraid that something will happen to deprive his family of food. The failure to vote in the referendum brought a fine of a week's salary. A brush with the police would be even more serious for a man without savings.

Franco is right. He has brought order to Spain—by forbidding all opposition. Never have I seen so many uniformed police. There are nearly always two or three in sight. The largest group of police I happened to see at one time was in the line for bullfight tickets to see Manolete on July 15. Since early in the morning people had been lined up the length of several blocks; some had been there all night. At 10 a. m. when the ticket window opened, about seventy-five uniformed police formed their own line in front. As the police were served, others entered. The resale price of tickets for that fight was triple the official price. Some of the public began to complain and surge forward, but when the clubs came out of the holsters they fell back into their previous orderly line and waited for what was left of the public ticket sale.

The Spanish newspapers make interesting reading—till you get used to them. They specialize in describing the chaos of strikes and starvation in democratic Europe. The July 4 news from the United States explained the barbaric American way of celebrating its independence with 300 deaths. Only Argentina receives a good press, but among the people jokes about the recent visit of Señora Perón are still popular.

There is so much more to tell if there were time: the way the people smile and put their index finger to their right eye in a knowing way when you mention the official referendum returns, the equally knowing smiles as they read their newspapers, the poorly stocked bookstore windows, the shop windows filled to overflowing, the restaurant in Madrid where a dinner costs the week's wage of a factory worker. There was the Falangist in Pamplona who warned me that the two evils of democracy were free elections and free press (but I respected him more than the professor in Madrid who assured me that both press and elections were free in Spain). There was the entrance of Franco into the President's box at the bullring in Madrid with the wholly unsuccessful attempt of a few to start the chant "Franco, Franco, Franco," and the huge headlines in the Madrid newspapers the next day proclaiming the applause and shouts of "Franco" at the bullfights of the day before! I could go on and on, but there is not time.

We left Spain as we entered, stopping at the same hotel in San Sebastian. During dinner the same radio was blaring the same propaganda. This was the eleventh anniversary (July 18) of the "Crusade of Franco and Spain against the foreign intervention."

The radio harangue was no longer interesting as it had been the first day. It was a pleasure to hear the beginning of a period of music as the speech ended with the usual "Viva Franco, Arriba España."

As I reread my letter I am afraid you will get the impression that Spain was not pleasant for an American visitor. On the contrary, Spain is the most interesting country with the most friendly people I have ever seen. Everywhere we were treated like old friends in spite of the official attitude that most foreigners are enemies of Spain.

J. EAGLETON

Paris, July 20

The Ingersoll Association

Dear Sirs: The Robert G. Ingersoll Memorial Association was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York on February 19, 1947.

The purpose of the association is to make of the birthplace of Robert G. Ingersoll, on Seneca Lake, at Dresden, Yates County, New York, a museum to be open to the public during the summer months of each year, and, in due course, to build an additional structure to house original Ingersoll manuscripts, photographs, historical documents, letters, and other memorabilia, which would be placed on permanent exhibition.

The house was originally opened as a museum on August 11, 1921, but has been closed during the war period. The association plans to reopen the house on August 11, 1948, which will mark the 115th anniversary of Ingersoll's birth.

The object of the current membership campaign is to raise sufficient funds to complete the work of restoration of the house in time for that opening. Contributions to the association are deductible from the income tax.

In this current era, when totalitarian enslavement by church and state threatens from every side, the association hopes that this little birthplace will stand as a beacon of intellectual light, liberation, and inspiration to all seeking freedom for the person, the mind, and the spirit.

The Robert G. Ingersoll Memorial Association, Inc., cordially invites the readers of The Nation to membership in the association, and to active participation in its work. For further de-

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 229 By MR. Y.

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the third of six puzzles constructed by Mr. Y in competition with Mr. X. At the end of the competition, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

ACROSS

- 1 Where crustacea lie? (7)
- 5 Pert manner? (7)
- 9 Loaded thus? Refrain from it! (7)
- 10 Even a liar can be brainy. (7)
- 11 To lift from the lateral. (5)
- 12 Well-read passage by Roberts. (9)
- 14 Come back to Erin to see the lake. (4)
- 15 This caretaker has one drawback in the end. (7)
- 18 We go out from the middle in either direction. (3)
- 20 Comparatively easy. (3)
- 21 Contrived to have the clamps taken off? (7)
- 23 I repeat, it's a bird! (4)
- 26 It sounds anti-nose-counting, but actually is in agreement. (9)
- 28 Good at 8 down. (5)
- 29 Did we once pay this, but tire of it quickly? (7)
- 30 Drink wine for a bracer? (7)
- 31 Is it against the law to do this to the Commander-in-Chief more than once? (7)
- 32 Found in coils, wherever rocks are. (7)

- 5 Wires which don't bear direct current? (7)
- 6 Loud material. (5)
- 7 Does the porter wear different-colored head-gear at the beach? (8)
- 8 Does it go in and come out on Christmas day? (8)
- 13 Nothing before us but to be in debt! (3)
- 16 Pepsicola, well-shaken. (9)
- 17 To leave in tears. (3)
- 18 Actor due a leading role. (8)
- 19 Does it flow gently after dark? (8)
- 22 Upbraided after dinner. (7)
- 23 Its sins imply one dwells on a point. (7)
- 24 Like Leander's girl-friend? (6)
- 25 One shall never be a slave, so they sing. (6)
- 27 Don't let the right answer do this to you! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 228

ACROSS:—1 CHAMPION; 5 SCRAP; 10 MOTOR; 11 INTRUSIVE; 12 RAMPART; 13 BALANCE; 14 STONED; 15 EARNEST; 18 CONTENT; 21 ASTUTE; 24 EXAMPLE; 26 RELIANT; 27 UNIFORMED; 28 NIGHT; 29 ENTREE; 30 PERSISTS.

DOWN:—1 CAMERA; 2 AUTOMATON; 3 PERTAIN; 4 OMITTED; 6 CRULLER; 7 ALIEN; 8 ELEMENTS; 9 STABLE; 16 ESTRANGES; 17 SCHEDULE; 19 EXPLODE; 20 DREAMS; 21 ABRIDGE; 22 TALENTS; 23 STATES; 25 ARIOT.

DOWN

- 1 Struck with the trimming on my trousers? (6)
- 2 Get aboard to go here. (6)
- 3 Stews about 14's return. (9)
- 4 Angered, in a way. (7)

THE SEMINARY SCHOOL OF JEWISH STUDIES

(Established in Memory of Israel Friedlaender)

An adult school, offers courses in Hebrew Language and Literature, Jewish History and Sociology, Bible, Palestine, Religion, Philosophy, Jewish Music and Folk Dancing.

"Alertness" Credit for Public School Teachers

Registration: September 22 to October 1
Open Monday and Wednesday evenings
Classes begin Oct. 8.

For further information apply to

SEMINARY SCHOOL OF JEWISH STUDIES

Northeast Corner Broadway and 122nd St., N. Y. C.
Telephone: Riverside 9-8050

FREE Catalogues

Fiction and Non-Fiction
Out-of-Print Books

ATHENS BOOK COMPANY

262 East Hancock Avenue, Athens, Georgia

BOOKS TOO EXPENSIVE?

Choose your ~~own~~ and save 25%. Order any book you want. Pay for it after you get it. Receive 25% credit on its price. Do this four times. Then use your credit for further books. Let us send you our detailed brochure or simply place your first order now.

BONUS BOOK CLUB, Dept. N-3

576 Madison Avenue New York 22, N. Y.

OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

MILLIONS OF USED, RARE and out-of-print books stocked in 15 cities. Mention interests if catalogues are wanted. TAAB, 529 S. Melville St., Phila. 43.

TYPING SERVICE

MANUSCRIPTS EXPERTLY TYPED. Plays, stories, novels, criticisms, rewrite instructions; low rates, prompt delivery. "MANUSERVICE," 120 East 59th Street, Plaza 3-4789.

HARD-TO-FIND BOOKS

BOOK-FINDERS invite your want list. Send for our out-of-print catalogue. CARAVAN BOOK SERVICE 148-30 86th Ave., Jamaica 2, N. Y.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

BUSINESS PROPOSITION of interest to physician, M.D., astrologer, under 50 years, must speak French. Box 1728, c/o The Nation.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocation, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

CURRIES

HOW TO MAKE GOOD CURRIES: Your request with a 3¢ stamp will bring you our Recipe Booklet of precise Indian recipes for making curries of chicken, lamb, shrimp and vegetables. Learn the simple principles of using this condiment; it changes ordinary foods into new and delightful dishes.

JAVA-INDIA CONDIMENT CO.
IMPORTERS

442 Hudson Street New York 14, N. Y.

■ Say you saw it advertised
in The NATION!
■ To place an ad call BA 7-1066 ■

tails wrote the association, at 144 East Twenty-fourth Street, New York 10, N. Y. EVA INGERSOLL WAKEFIELD
New York, September 6

A Disservice to Readers?

Dear Sirs: I was profoundly disappointed in the review of Howard Ambruster's "Treason's Peace," by C. A. Welsh which appeared in The Nation of June 21 because it seemed to me that the review completely hid the significance of the book. More recently I read Mr. Ambruster's challenge to Mr. Welsh to document his criticism. Mr. Welsh's answer was as inadequate as his review.

Considering the importance of Mr. Ambruster's book in view of the present struggle to revive German industry, I would have expected The Nation's reviewer to treat "Treason's Peace" with at least as much understanding as was shown, for example, by Thomas L. Stokes in his column in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

To be frank, I think it is a disservice to readers of The Nation not to let them know that this book makes available a mine of factual material on what is certainly one of the most important issues of the day.

In my course in current world history at the University of Alabama I require my students to read Mr. Ambruster's book; I also require them to read The Nation. What am I to say to them when they bring me Welsh's review?

Men like Ambruster need every shred of liberal support. They should not be brushed off in this fashion. I am shocked.

ALFRED B. THOMAS

Tuscaloosa, Ala., August 22

Viet Nam Celebration

Dear Sirs: September 2 marked the second anniversary of the founding of the Democratic Republic of Viet Nam in Indo-China. There was no celebration of this event in the Orient this year—only a rededication to the cause of freedom and the fight against French imperialism.

Although almost no news leaks through the tight French censorship, we do know that the guerrilla forces of Viet Nam are continuing the fight against oppression throughout the length and breadth of their country. Eight months after the French began their ruthless campaign to end opposition, only the seaports and some inland cities are tenuously held by them. . . .

French propaganda has aimed at convincing the American people—progressives included—that Viet Nam is Communist-dominated. This assertion is made in spite of the fact that the Communists, the largest party in France, have stood by while the war continued in Indo-China. The fact is that the government of the republic is a coalition of all elements: liberals, Socialists, Catholics, Buddhists, Communists, and former Mandarin royalty. . . .

To express the solidarity of American progressives with the cause of Viet Nam—with the cause of freedom—a meeting will be held Tuesday, September 23, at the Hotel McAlpin in New York City. Pearl Buck, Harold Isaacs, Norman Thomas, Richard J. Walsh, and others will speak. A special message from President Ho Chi Minh is being smuggled out of Viet Nam to the meeting.

Readers of The Nation are invited to attend the gathering as an expression of faith in the Viet Nam cause—and as proof that the ideals of liberty and democracy are not dead in the West.

ROBERT DELSON

SOL W. SANDERS

Committee for the Celebration of Viet Nam Independence

New York, September 8

Wrongly Blamed

Dear Sirs: Your report on the case of the Brinks (August 23) contains an uncommonly slur on the welfare officers of Los Angeles County. Let me remind you that the case was entirely the work of the County Board of Supervisors, politicians all, whose experience in such cases was negligible. The ground for their action was a county ordinance limiting total relief checks for families to $125 monthly; this inspiration is also attributable to the supervisors' zeal for economy in relief.

A couple of minor inaccuracies: legal residence in California requires three years of "independent" residence; that is, independent of relief checks. The Brinks were therefore not legal residents. For Oklahoma officials their lack of residence in Oklahoma was sufficient reason to disclaim responsibility. Again, Ma Brink had not "held out" against returning to Oklahoma but rather inadvertently threatened to go there in retaliation for the relief cut.

Yours is the first report I have seen that the Brinks are on their way back, although the prediction has been freely ventured ever since they left.

L. G. WAYNE

San Gabriel, Cal., September 5

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 27, 1947

NUMBER 13

The Shape of Things

FEW MEN IN POLITICAL LIFE RATE THE tribute of public tears when they die. Franklin D. Roosevelt was one; Fiorello H. LaGuardia, another. People who had never seen New York's former Mayor in life wept as they filed past his coffin, and the sense of loss was apparent throughout the city. The genuine sorrow at LaGuardia's death reflected more than an appreciation of his color and his achievement, though they were great. The tireless, paternal, irascible, cocky, and often vituperative little man who raced to fires, delighted in surprise visits to city institutions, personally investigated the humblest citizen's complaint, read the "funnies" over the air during a newspaper strike, and, back in 1937, suggested making Hitler a central figure in the World's Fair Chamber of Horrors was without doubt, as one reporter describes him, "New York's most colorful mayor since Peter Stuyvesant." And his long record of accomplishments includes the breaking of Tammany power, the introduction of scrupulously honest municipal government, the unification of a fantastically scrambled transit system, and the building of enough parks, playgrounds, highways, housing projects, markets, and bridges to alter, to its vast improvement, the face of the world's largest city. But beyond all this was a warmth, a homey informality, and an identification with the people who had elected him that gave LaGuardia the status of a public protector. His utter scorn for party loyalty and "clubhouse loafers," on the one hand, and for the cold theorizing of traditional reformers, on the other, established a rapport with the voters that became the envy and awe of the professionals. LaGuardia's mayoralty proved brilliantly that political machines are no more inevitably a part of the modern city than typhoid epidemics. Citizens of Boston, Jersey City, and points west, take note.

✕

THE WORLD SUPPLY OF GRAIN IS FALLING short of the demand by 11,000,000 tons. Set beside this fact two others: Americans are consuming more food than ever before—they are, for instance, eating 25 per cent more meat than they ate in 1941, and meat is part grain; Europeans, on the other hand, will eat 5 to 10 per cent less food in the next twelve months than they have in the past twelve, and in the past twelve they have existed on 1,700 to 2,000 calories a day. The human answer to this state of affairs is as obvious as the steak on your plate. Those who have so much more than enough should share at least the excess with those who have so much less. Most Americans, as human beings, would accept that answer, and offer more. But that is not the answer Europe is getting from America. On the contrary, Europe is being told that it must tighten its belt. It is even being told that shipments of food to Europe have caused inflation of food prices here because the demands of Americans, who have thrown their belts away, outrun the unprecedented supply. Which is surely adding insult to injury when we consider that this inflation, which was induced not by any actual scarcity but only by a speculators' scarcity and was set off by the casual and triumphant removal of price controls, has cut Europe's capacity to purchase food by sharply reducing the value of the few dollars it has.

✕

AMERICA TODAY, IN RELATION TO THE REST of the world, is the biggest and blackest of black markets, and the fact that it "just grewed" and that many Americans are also its victims is not readily apparent 3,000 miles away. The practical immediate way to curb this black market, as The Nation pointed out last week, is to restore price controls at the source of production in industrial and building materials, especially steel—whose masters have been "cleverly" preparing for, and preparing, a depression, by pushing up prices—and in basic farm commodities like grain and livestock. The Administration should move quickly toward that goal. And in the process, it should go to the people on the question of food for Europe. It should go to the people not merely with the self-serving arguments that if we let Europe starve, it will go Communist and that feeding Europe, even at our own expense, will be cheaper than another depression and another war. These are cogent but graceless arguments. The question that should be put to the American people with all the force at the Administration's command is the simple human question: "Shall we let Europe starve?" We know what the answer would be, and that answer would not only give Europe a new lease on life; it might also serve to halt the moral depression in this country which is already far advanced.

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	297
Candor on the Right	299
Lay Down Your Weapons!
by Freda Kirchwey	300

ARTICLES

Duel in the U. N. Assembly
by J. King Gordon	301
Who Wrecked Bonneville?
by Richard L. Neuberger	303
Race and Politics in South Africa
by Michael S. Comay	305
Prosperity—How Long Will It Last?
by Fritz Sternberg	307
Poland Today: IV. The New Lands
by Alexander Werth	308
Bolivia's Two Worlds	by John H. Groel 310
New Wine in Old Bottles
by Charles A. Siepmann	312
Strength of the French Left by Del Vayo	314

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

What Is Truth?	by Helen M. Lynd 315
John Betjeman	by Rolphe Humphries 316
The Concentration Point	by Irving Howe 316
Brief for Canonization	by Carey McWilliams 317
Haldane with Left Angles
by Benjamin Harrow	318
Answer to Ingersoll	by Ralph Bates 319
The Mystical Tradition in Judaism
by Henry P. Van Dusen	319
Man's Beginnings	by Keith Hutchison 320
Films	by James Agee 320
Records	by B. H. Haggin 321

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 230	by Mr. Y 323
--------------------------	--------------

Editor: Freda Kirchwey

European Editor J. Alvarez del Vayo Literary Editor Margaret Marshall

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

J. King Gordon, Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams
Aylmer Vallance, Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Editor Copy Editor Research Editor

Jerry Tallmer Gladys Whiteside Doris W. Tanz

Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting

Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillia Schultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One Year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

ARE THE BONES OF DEAD MEN BLACK AND white? This question is suggested by the objections of Representative John Rankin to a measure authorizing War Department use of federally owned lands for national cemeteries. Some time ago, the War Department issued an order forbidding race segregation in such cemeteries. Annoyed by this, Mr. Rankin induced Representative Richard Welch of California to agree that the new authorization measure would have no application in the Southern states. The "white boys" of the South, as Mr. Rankin put it, will now be buried in local, segregated graveyards. No additional federal lands in the South will be used for burying veterans. That not a single member of the House had the decency to object to this, the crassest of Rankin's bigotries to date, is some measure of the mentality and moral fiber of the Eightieth Congress. ★

IN ITALY, THE STRIKES AGAINST HIGH PRICES and food shortages had clearer political implications than elsewhere in Western Europe. The recent French work stoppages, for example, were limited to the main industrial centers; in Italy, they spread swiftly to the countryside, where 1,000,000 farm workers joined in the greatest agrarian strike Italy has ever experienced. The movement reached a climax last Saturday when the Socialists and Communists organized a gigantic demonstration to demand representation in the government. The speakers directed their attacks not only against the De Gasperi Cabinet but against the Vatican as well. The truce initiated some months ago when the Communist leader, Palmiro Togliatti, voted to ratify the Lateran treaties, is now over. In recent months, the Vatican has become increasingly outspoken in its support of De Gasperi, and Pope Pius's speech of September 7 was interpreted in left circles as an open challenge to the workers' parties. The extension of the political fight to the religious domain is deplorable, but the Vatican can no longer claim that it stands above politics; it has abandoned all pretense of neutrality and tossed its tiara into the ring. Though Saturday's demonstration was not the "prelude to revolution" which the rightist press has long been announcing for reasons of its own, it nevertheless was a clear indication of the present temper of the Italian masses. In Europe today, and particularly in Italy, where bitter memories of twenty years of fascist rule are still fresh, the people are determined to prevent reactionary governments from exploiting economic difficulties to stop the swing toward the left.

★

PHILIP MURRAY IS REPORTED TO HAVE remarked that bickering among the leaders of the United Automobile Workers has "sunk to a level of complete moral degeneration." The president of the C. I. O., who is unusually sensitive to the dangers of factionalism, may have been laying it on a bit thick, but there is no doubt that the country's largest union is about to indulge in a brawl that will have its effects on the entire C. I. O. On one level, the fight is the usual struggle between groups designated, with more convenience than accuracy, as left and right. More immediately, it is the campaign battle between Walter Reuther, running for reelection as president, and the faction led by R. J. Thomas, George Addes, and Richard T. Leonard. In electing Reuther last year, the union boxed him in with an executive board made up largely of his opponents. Reasonably enough, Reuther is out to get a board that will support him, and he is hitting hard. Against his present colleagues he makes two principal charges: that they have blocked his efforts to implement the union's constitutional provision barring Communists from office, and that they have sanctioned the "scandalous waste" of $500,000 in a fruitless and badly bungled drive to organize a single company in Cleveland. Reuther further accuses his opponents of "pork-chopping," or living off the union pay roll without delivering much in return, and of having made personal loans to individual delegates at the last convention. Confusing the issue almost beyond untangling are numerous personal feuds, with Thomas characterizing Reuther as a man "drunk with personal ambition" and Reuther returning the compliment by branding Thomas a "vindictive and poor loser." Perhaps, after all, Mr. Murray was right.

Candor on the Right

WE WOULD not blame Governor Dewey if on reading the remarks of his rival, Senator Taft, he should be more convinced than ever that Republican Presidential candidates should be seen and not heard. In the first week of a thinly disguised campaign tour, the Ohio Senator delivered himself of two boners either of which should be enough to wreck his chances. On the decisive issue of prices, he gave the press a field day with the formula "eat less meat and eat less extravagantly"—a bit of advice rendered the more piquant for having been delivered at a beefsteak banquet. And a few days later, he told an audience that while the Republican Party had a social-legislation program in mind, it was "loath to proceed" with it until 1949, when it could safely be "inaugurated under a Republican President."

Reporting Taft's "eat less" pronouncement from Los Angeles, Roscoe Drummond of the Christian Science Monitor wrote that "no one who heard him thought he was urging any heartless soak-the-poor program," and he admitted the next day that "there are a lot of people who can only just get enough" to eat. But the phrasing

Ezekiel Schloss

"Let 'em eat less!"

of his first comment was characteristically bourbon in its vast ineptness. As we point out on page 297, Americans are in fact consuming much more than their fair share of the world's food, but the distribution is so far from equitable within our own country that a flat prescription for voluntary retrenchment is hardly the answer to our run-away price problem. Lower-income Americans, now spending fully half their income on food, are perforce practicing the Taft eat-less formula right now—and it will doubtless work if only their diets get low enough. As one of Taft's party colleagues put it, "The cure for high prices is high prices," which is to say, there is nothing wrong with the economy that enforced malnutrition won't cure. No unhealthy boom that won't produce its own corrective bust.

More revealingly than by his prescription for prices, Taft's highly publicized candor is exemplified by the statement on social-welfare legislation. Here is probably the most cynical avowal by a major political figure since Andrew Jackson openly made a national policy of the wardheeler's slogan, "To the victors belong the spoils." As his party's chief in the Senate, Taft sponsored a mild and watered-down housing bill. This is his way of telling scores of thousands of homeless veterans that if they want even this degree of relief they will have to wait until 1949—and they will have to elect a Republican President to match a Republican Congress. It is his way of serving the same notice on teachers and parents who might have taken seriously his bill for federal aid to the schools, and on those who might have set some store by his bill for improving the public health. On none of these measures, carrying his name, has the Republican boss of the Senate pressed for action. Now we know why.

Yet there are those who profess to see in Mr. Taft's frankness a redeeming quality—as though reactionary views and selfish politics were rendered less reactionary for being openly declared and less selfish for being flaunted. This is the inverted logic feared by the defense attorney who once told a jury: "My client may talk like an idiot and he may act like an idiot. But don't be deceived, gentlemen of the jury. He really is an idiot."

Lay Down Your Weapons!

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

SINCE President Truman declared war—political and economic war—on Russia last March, the campaign has progressed steadily. The uncompromising speech by Secretary Marshall in the General Assembly last Wednesday opened a new, major offensive. Vishinsky's defiant counter-thrust was notice that no ground is being given by Moscow; it did not alter the terms of the conflict.

Most of those who listened to Marshall's cold denunciation of Russian obstruction and his proposals for action described the speech as "impressive"; some said the same of Vishinsky's sarcasm, so reminiscent of Chicherin's biting attacks on the West after World War I. Impressive these speeches may have been, but so is a bomb exploding in a crowded street. Both men threw bombs—each after his fashion—and the effect of their action can be summed up in one word: dismay. Delegates at Flushing who tried to discuss, on its constitutional or practical merits, the Marshall proposal for parallel Assembly security machinery seemed to be wrestling with a shadow. Is it a good plan? Would Mr. Evatt's substitute plan work better? Could either be instituted without violating or rewriting the Charter? Could the Charter be changed with the veto in effect? In every mind, questions like these were overshadowed by the larger question: Was the new Marshall plan, or any proposed modification of it, more than a device to freeze the Western bloc into a U. N. within the U. N.—thereby undermining the organization as a whole without appearing to do so?

Secretary Marshall

It was the French Foreign Minister, Bidault, who best expressed the profound anxiety of the other nations, caught up in the struggle of two clumsy giants prepared to force every issue to a showdown ending inevitably in stalemate. Bidault's sharpest words were directed to Vishinsky, who had accused the Western states of serving as tools of Washington by collaborating in the Marshall plan for economic aid. He denied this imputation with a vigor that time may perhaps justify; the issue is still unresolved. But on the broad problem of international cooperation, he said that France would attempt mediation and urge compromise up to the very limit of decency and honor. His central appeal was to both great powers to end their implacable hostility and begin to negotiate instead of continuing to denounce and obstruct.

Now that Mr. Marshall's proposal for a "Little Assembly" has been put on the agenda, it is likely to be adopted, since Russia's record of stubborn non-cooperation has stiffened the anti-Soviet majority. And if Mr. Vishinsky demands a vote on his resolution calling for U. N. condemnation of "criminal propaganda for a new war," it will almost surely be defeated. But the Marshall proposal will be regarded with skepticism and distaste even by those who vote yes; and those who vote against Vishinsky will do so recognizing that behind his reckless and ill-chosen accusations was a solid chunk of truth. The enthusiasm that greeted Bidault's eloquent plea for conciliation was a sign that the other Western nations understand this fact and bitterly deplore it. Even those most friendly to the United States, or most inescapably dependent upon us, would go no farther than to agree that Russia has so seriously obstructed the functioning of the existing international machinery that we had no choice but to scrap or retool it. None would assert that the Marshall proposal offered a serious hope of salvaging the U. N. as a world organization or of improving relations between West and East.

WHAT else could we do, faced with Soviet expansion in Eastern Europe, the threat of communism in Western Europe, and the Russian veto in the U. N.?

To answer that, one must ask another question. Is it established, beyond doubt, that Russia cannot be negotiated with but must either be isolated or fought? A well-known foreign correspondent, commenting on Vishinsky's speech last Thursday night over a major network, said that he and some of his fellow-correspondents had been reviewing the long series of misunderstandings between Russia and the United States in an effort to figure out where the trouble started—or started to get bad. They recognized that Russia's suspicion and intransigence had been problems even before San Francisco, but they agreed that the moment when the whole thing got out of hand was during the winter of 1945-46 when Byrnes abandoned the tactic of patient, friendly negotiation followed by Roosevelt, and accepted the idea of a clique of Western states. The same analysis was offered in The Nation on August 24, 1946, in an article by our European editor, who used these words: "It is hard to fix the precise moment when things started to deteriorate, but I believe the United Nations meeting in London last January marked the point at which mutual distrust and ill feeling began clearly to dominate the relations between Russia and the Western powers. It was there that the talk of blocs and the organization of blocs emerged as a distinct factor."

The Washington analyst believed that the Marshall proposal at Flushing Meadow was the ultimate step in this process of bloc-building begun two years ago in London, and wondered whether the time had not come, in spite of the piling up of provocations, for the United States to lay down its weapons and make a last try for peace on the Roosevelt line. The man who spoke was not a radical; he did not question the difficulties we would face, especially now that the Russians feel themselves both challenged and affronted. He only believed that no difficulties could be as alarming to contemplate as a continued cold war, crystallized in the shape of the new Marshall plan for "world peace."

[In a second article, Miss Kirchwey will discuss ways of breaking the deadlock between Russia and the United States.]

Duel in the U. N. Assembly

BY J. KING GORDON

Flushing Meadow Park September 20

THE day the General Assembly opened, nineteen camera men surrounded Secretary Marshall as he took his seat on the aisle on the left of the American delegation. One of them put his chin and his camera on the Secretary's desk and shot him at a point-blank range of two feet. There was little doubt about who was Number One man in the second General Assembly of the United Nations.

Marshall's speech showed quite clearly that the United States had seized the initiative which, in previous meetings, it had left to others. Even Vishinsky's spectacular diversionary foray on Thursday failed to change the picture. Throughout Mr. Vishinsky's extraordinary display of sustained oratory Marshall sat calmly, his hands folded, listening impassively to the earphones. It will be the Marshall speech that will be the focus of discussion during the next few weeks.

The crux of the speech was the proposal that an Interim Committee on Peace and Security be established by the General Assembly to meet in constant session for a year. The Assembly, under the terms of the Charter, has certain powers that parallel those of the Security Council to investigate disputes and make recommendations for a settlement. Its successful intervention in the Palestine problem effectively established this authority. Only where matters are under the active jurisdiction of the Security Council has the General Assembly no right to intervene.

What opens debate on this parallel right of the Assembly is the frank recognition that the free use of the Russian veto has frustrated the actions of the Security Council. It is proposed, then, that the General Assembly, through the interim committee of the whole, attempt to function where the Security Council has failed. In a sense, this "Little Assembly" will supersede the authority of the Security Council, to which the Charter gives primary responsibility for matters of peace and security. This will be the basis of the Russian attack. As Mr. Vishinsky put it: "In spite of the reservations in the American proposal to the effect that this committee would not impinge on matters which are the primary concern of the Security Council or of special commissions, there is not the slightest doubt that the attempt to create the Interim Committee is nothing but an ill-conceived scheme to substitute and by-pass the Security Council."

But according to opinions expressed public and privately by other delegates, a large majority are convinced that it is intolerable to permit the situation created by the veto-bound Security Council to continue. The second American proposal that the veto rights of the Security Council be waived in matters which fall under Chapter VI of the Charter (dealing with conciliation and the settlement of disputes) might be considered as an alternative means of achieving the same end. The difficulty here is that such a proposal falls outside the effective jurisdiction of

Sketches made from life by Oscar Berger

Vishinsky

the Assembly. The liberalization of the veto would entail either an amendment to the Charter—which could be blocked by a Security Council veto—or the voluntary relinquishing of a right which the Security Council now possesses; and this action too could be blocked by a Russian refusal.

AS CAN be judged from Mr. Marshall's sharp words in defining the American position on Greece and Korea and Mr. Vishinsky's even sharper retort, these two matters are going to be the occasion of bitter debate. And on neither issue has the head of the American delegation as good a case as in the broad contention that "the untapped resources of the United Nations must be brought to bear with full effect through the General Assembly and its other organs." For in both instances the strategic interests of the two major world powers are in sharp conflict. The implementation of the Truman Doctrine in Greece and Turkey and the gross mishandling of the situation in South Korea by the American Military Government leave the United States vulnerable. The independence of the Greek and Korean people is secondary to the maintenance of American influence at critical points in the eastern Mediterranean and on the Asiatic mainland. From the American point of view these positions must be maintained as bastions against threatened Soviet expansion. From the Russian point of view Greece and Korea represent advance positions in a threatened war against the Soviet Union. No amount of debate will change these conflicting opinions.

The sober fact brought out, then, by Secretary Marshall's references to Greece and Korea, and Mr. Vishinsky's retort, is that the major world problem today is how to persuade the two giant powers that an inevitable conflict is not just in the offing. As Mr. Evatt put it in his very effective speech, unfortunately blanketed in the press by Mr. Vishinsky's:

The first of these two objectives [of the United Nations] is the prevention of war and the substitution of methods of conciliation and arbitration for those of force and violence. We should be concerned primarily with that objective and, in a secondary way, with that of fixing the rules and conditions under which future wars may lawfully be conducted. The injury and damage that may be inflicted as a result of modern scientific invention is so vast and so rapidly extending that war, however conditioned and restricted by rules and regulations, is bound to threaten permanent devastation of the human race. Enemy No. 1 is therefore war itself.

I AM not one of those who take the view that the main intention of Mr. Marshall's proposals for an Interim Committee for Peace and Security was to begin to organize the Western world for the inevitable war. The wide disillusionment of the great majority of the nations of the world over the abortive activities of the Security Council was enough in itself to justify a drastic effort to devise new machinery for the peaceful settlement of disputes. But that a Russian refusal to consider any modification of the present machinery of the United Nations might lead to such a Western alliance is a development that must be faced.

Such an unhappy alternative was specifically outlined in the speech by Mr. St. Laurent, head of the Canadian delegation. He said:

Nations in their search for peace and cooperation will not and cannot accept indefinitely and unaltered a council which was set up to insure their security, and which so many feel has become frozen in futility and divided by dissension. If forced, they may seek greater safety in associations of democratic and peace-loving states willing to accept more specific international obligations in return for greater national security. Such associations, if consistent with the principles of the Charter, can be formed within the United Nations. It is to be hoped that such a development will not be necessary.

THIS morning the news of Fiorello LaGuardia's death muffled the drums of war that had been sounding earlier in the week. The nations which had had the best opportunity of witnessing his work as head of UNRRA—Yugoslavia, Byelorussia, Czechoslovakia—came forward to bear testimony to the courage and the human sympathy of this "one-world man." Delegates who had grown used to a world in which the struggle between the great powers was the single outstanding fact were reminded of yesterday, when the Allies talked of carrying through the common task of victory into the building of peace.

In the speeches of the delegates of Czechoslovakia and France there was more than a wistful harking back to the days of cooperation. Jan Masaryk and Georges Bidault, representing nations, one in the Eastern and the other in the Western bloc, asserted their right to speak as Europeans. Mr. Masaryk, after recalling the trade treaty his country had entered into with Rumania and Russia, said, "If anyone thinks that being helped by neighbors or helping them means that we are cutting ourselves off from normal economic intercourse with the whole world, he is wrong." Mr. Bidault, after challenging Mr. Vishinsky sharply on his interpretation of the Marshal plan, held out the hope that the rebuilding of Europe might still go forward as a cooperative effort of all nations.

Mr. Masaryk reminded the representatives of the great powers "of the craving for peace throughout the world by all the little people . . . the only people worth while." Mr. Bidault, striking the same note, suggested that the men and women who worked and sacrificed to win the war think that peace, "their greatest hope, is also a simple and easy thing. . . . They are right because many things have been revealed to the humble which have been concealed from the powerful."

And Hector McNeil, British delegate, at the close of a speech that had its passages of blistering rebuttal to the Vishinsky charges, added an extempore postscript. "We represent," he said, "the common men to whom Mr. Masaryk referred. Their heroism, their perseverance, is the very matter of history. They are the real authors of the Charter. If we betray them, history will damn us forever."

Thus the first week ends with the issues sharply drawn. There are, however, two facts which may assume increasing importance. It is clear as one listens to the debates and moves around the corridors and the lounges that no nation wants war. It seems equally clear that the Soviet Union does not want to withdraw from the U. N.

Who Wrecked Bonneville?

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Bonneville, September 21

ON SEPTEMBER 28, 1937, Franklin D. Roosevelt dedicated Bonneville Dam. Standing on the bank of the Columbia River, at the foot of steep hills covered with fir and vine maple, he announced his decision to establish in the Pacific Northwest an agency which would seek to conserve and develop natural resources in the interest of all the people. This agency, the Bonneville Power Administration, became a dominant force in the region's great expansion of population.

A decade has passed since F. D. R., bare-headed in the sunlight of an autumn morning, prophesied that the project would bring "more wealth, better living, and greater happiness for our children." The agency which he created is in crisis now, its morale weakened, its personnel decimated, its facilities strained and in disrepair.

In ten years of existence the Bonneville Power Administration has returned to the federal treasury more revenue than any similar agency in the country. It has collected in power payments a total of $105,322,497. As the New York Times recently pointed out, more than one-fourth of the investment at Bonneville, including interest charges, has been paid back to the government. Yet it was gutted by the Eightieth Congress in the name of economy.

Last year Bonneville had 1,393 full-time employees to maintain and operate the largest wholesale high-voltage power network in the United States. This year the number is 851, and many of these have accepted drastic cuts in salary at a time when living costs are at an all-time high. Paradoxically, this agency which has returned such substantial sums to the national exchequer cannot draw on its own revenues.

A year ago Bonneville received $4,300,000 to service and maintain a power system extending from the Canadian boundary to northern California. This year Representative Taber and his cohorts have sliced the amount to $2,500,000. At the Oregon town of McMinnville, which has a public system entirely dependent on Columbia River energy, a bank of Bonneville transformers is so overloaded that it must be sprayed with 10,800 gallons of cold water every twenty-four hours. McMinnville expects power rationing to begin soon—this in a river valley which has 41 per cent of the potential hydroelectric reserves of the nation. Outside The Dalles, another community with public power, Bonneville insulators hang on the poles, no wires strung between them.

But worse than the system's physical impairment is what has happened to the moral climate. The heart of Bonneville has always been the Division of Resources and Development. This division made the studies which led to the partially successful efforts to shatter the aluminum monopoly. It fought against discriminatory freight rates, worked to bring steel plants to the Far West, urged increasing development of the limitless water power of the Columbia Basin to save the country's waning oil reserves. It warned of depletion of the virgin forests of the Cascades and advocated a program of perpetual yield in sawmills and logging camps.

The Division of Resources and Development made virulent enemies—men and interests influential with the members of the Eightieth Congress. The division was not merely curtailed; it was abolished. By specific act Congress wiped out its functions, authority, and personnel. It was not even allotted funds with which to box and store the files which contain the most exhaustive research ever undertaken on the potentialities of our last frontier.

Dr. Paul J. Raver, the Bonneville administrator, has fought bravely for his staff. Baited and taunted at Congressional hearings, he made an unassailable case for supporting a federal agency which has consistently shown a favorable financial balance. He pointed out that the first great industries set up in the Northwest—the Boeing aircraft plants, the Kaiser shipyards, the aluminum mills—all depend on Bonneville power, and that while this industrialization was occurring, the population of the state of Washington increased 26 per cent, that of Oregon 33 per cent.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is an Oregon journalist who writes frequently for The Nation on the political and economic problems of the Northwest.

But Congress was not interested in facts. While spokesmen for the oil companies were warning that America might soon need Arabian oil, Congress refused to protect a domestic source of energy which will endure as long as snow mantles the great ranges of the West. Congress was out to "get" Bonneville. Bonneville symbolized Roosevelt. The Bonneville Act, drafted at the President's request by Senators Bone and McNary, specifically provided that public systems must receive preference in the sale of power—not a popular policy with the men who now rule Congress. So the Bonneville appropriation was slashed 40 per cent. Even Senator Wherry, the Republican whip, confessed, "Bonneville's fund is one item I am ashamed of."

WHO wrecked Bonneville? Part of the press in the Northwest has laid the blame on "Eastern interests," particularly on "Eastern Congressmen." This is pure fiction. Republicans from the West helped to tomahawk Bonneville. Democrats from the East tried to stave off the blow. The Congressional Record tells the story. On April 23 of this year the House of Representatives rejected by a vote of 197 to 140 a motion to increase the funds given Bonneville and other Department of Interior agencies. Every Democrat from New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio voted to enlarge the appropriation. Of the twenty-five Republican members from the states of the Pacific slope, only five—Russell of Nevada, Angell of Oregon, and Johnson, Poulson, and Welch of California—voted to return the utterly inadequate appropriation to committee.

Drawing by Golden

Seldom has a region had its throat cut so mercilessly by its purported representatives. The Westerner on the subcommittee that considered Bonneville's financial needs was a Republican, Lowell Stockman of Oregon. He demanded Dr. Raver's immediate resignation, insisted that additional transmission lines were not needed in the Northwest, opposed increasing the meager appropriation. Even the usually reserved Oregon Grange Bulletin described Stockman editorially as "Benedict Arnold, Western style." To explode the East-versus-West myth even more completely, I need only point out that the foremost champion of Bonneville on the subcommittee was Michael J. Kirwan, a Democrat from Ohio.

The lack of funds has made it necessary to take 616 permanent and part-time employees from the Bonneville pay roll. Congress, which claims to have so much sympathy for the veteran, may be interested to learn that some of these men landed at Omaha Beach or Iwo Jima. Among Bonneville's remaining employees morale has sagged. Men with families, men paying for homes, suddenly have seen that federal tenure is ephemeral indeed when Congress puts the Indian sign on an entire agency.

Among the men dropped were lifelong Republicans who had been contributing money each month to the Oregon State Republican Committee. The letters they addressed to their political party will not bear reprinting. Suffice it to say that these disillusioned people are aware of changes for the worse in the G. O. P. In 1937 the Republican Senate leader was the wise and urbane Charles L. McNary, who sponsored the Bonneville Act. Now McNary is gone, and Taft, Taber, and their counterparts reign on Capitol Hill.

Because the Bonneville Power Administration also distributes Grand Coulee power, it serves the atomic-energy plutonium works near Hanford, Washington. Columbia River hydroelectricity is vital for this final stage of the atomic process. How ironic if the Congressmen who most fear Russia should by their blind hatred of a New Deal agency cripple production of the weapon on which they rely in the event of war with the U. S. S. R.

Water power is the sole source of energy in the Northwest. The region has no oil and no coal. The virgin forests are all but gone. Bonneville's record has been impressive. In its domain the average residential rate for power is 1.7 cents a kilowatt-hour; in the nation as a whole it is 3.2 cents. Large industries on the Columbia River pay only 0.4 of a cent for power, less than half the national average.

Bonneville probably will survive the unhappy crisis which now limits its operations. But the power shortages of the next few years will keep new industries out of the Northwest; development of the fastest growing region in America will be impeded. This is a costly way for the people of the Northwest to learn that the G. O. P. does not always fulfil its pledges: in both 1940 and 1944 the Republicans promised that the great power projects constructed by the New Deal would not suffer under Republican administration.

On the tenth anniversary of the day President Roosevelt spoke on the bank of the surging river the residents of the Northwest may recall his words. His political enemies, by making their policies the opposite of his, have chosen a poor way to intrench themselves in power.

Coming Next Week

Hunger and Politics in Italy

BY MARIO ROSSI

Nation Correspondent in Rome

Race and Politics in South Africa

BY MICHAEL S. COMAY

Capetown, South Africa, September

ALMOST every week a batch of emigrants leaves the bleakness of Mr. Attlee's Britain for the sunshine, the fruit, the black servants, the easy living—for whites—of Marshal Smuts's South Africa. They have totaled more than 25,000 persons in the past year or so. So far they have been easily absorbed; war-time prosperity still lasts, and there is talk of further big expansion in the goldfields and in industry. In farming, however, there are few opportunities for the man without money or training, and unskilled work is done by the non-whites.

Newcomers find the political situation depressing. Afrikaner (Boer) nationalism is still an active and undigested force, and the color question is becoming not only difficult to manage at home but also more subject to criticism from abroad. In the general elections next year Dr. Malan's Nationalist Party, which now holds nearly a third of the seats, will make a bid for power. Malan can hardly succeed, but he is likely to wipe out much of the lead which Smuts piled up in the last election. The Nationalists have shrewdly soft-pedaled anti-British and anti-Jewish slogans and concentrated on two safer targets—blacks and reds. Their pro-Nazi war-time attitude may well be overlooked by business men who grouse at a few controls and by housewives inconvenienced by a few shortages.

Smuts is seventy-four years old. His heir apparent is J. H. Hofmeyr, now Deputy Prime Minister and Finance Minister. Hofmeyr, not yet fifty, is in some ways an even able man than his chief. But he is not personally popular, and what is worse, he is more "liberal" than Smuts on the color question. (In South Africa it is political abuse to call anyone a liberal.) He will be hard put to keep intact a United Party which is a disunited mixture of Britons, Afrikaners, and Jews, of town and country people, of farmers, merchants, and mine owners. If this unwieldy party breaks up it may let the Nationalists in. Or a new center bloc may emerge, combining the more conservative of the Marshal's followers with the less fanatical Malanites. In that case, the man most likely to emerge as leader of the new group is Klaas Havenga, for fifteen years Minister of Finance under General Hertzog. Always a steady, middle-of-the-road man, Havenga has now suddenly left his farm and joined up with Malan, thus strengthening the latter's new "moderate" claims. He may intend to use the Nationalists as a stepping-stone, but it is more likely that they will use him as a catspaw.

AFRIKANERS AND JEWS

Whether the Nationalists play up the "Jewish problem" or play it down, it remains an important weapon in their armory. They have carefully disowned out-and-out Nazi groups such as the Oxtwagon Sentinels, modeled on the S. S., and the New Order group of Oswald Pirow. But they have behind them a more sinister body. It is called the Brotherhood, and is a reactionary secret society of some 2,000 men in key positions in the administration, the professions, the schools, and the church.

The Nationalists are trying to split the unions on racial lines. Since the small Communist Party is active in many unions and since a number of Jews are active in the Communist Party, it is not difficult to make the danger of "Judeo-Bolshevism" seem real. In the middle-class urban occupations ordinary competition does the trick. The 100,000 Jews in South Africa are concentrated in business, law, and medicine and enjoy a high standard of living. It is natural that young Afrikaners, now flocking from the farms to the towns, should resent the Jews' entrenched position.

As a rule, however, the Afrikaner is an easygoing individual, with no traditional aversion to Jews. And of course the Jew is a white man and therefore, in the last resort, one of the privileged minority. The Jews in South Africa today are not under any real pressure, though they have a sense of insecurity and indulge in a lot of worried talk; but things could easily go wrong if the country's economic situation deteriorated.

While the political anti-Semitism of the Afrikaner has been damped down, the social and commercial anti-Semitism of the English has risen sharply. Of late it has made much of the terrorism in Palestine. About Palestine, curiously enough, the Afrikaner press takes quite a different line from the English press. It shows a certain fellow-feeling for another little people struggling with the same imperial power against which the Boers fought and lost their own war. But coupled with the demand that the Jews be let into Palestine is MICHAEL S. COMAY was born in South Africa and became a practicing barrister in Capetown. He served for six years with the South African forces during the war and represented South Africa at the conference on British Commonwealth relations at London in 1945. He is now living in Jerusalem, after a recent trip to South Africa.

the even stronger demand that they be kept out of South Africa. An astonishing fuss has been made about the tiny number of Jewish refugees allowed to join relatives in South Africa—75 in 1945 and 303 in 1946.

REPRESSION OF THE NON-WHITES

Politics in South Africa are the pastime of a little over two million "Europeans" (whites). Of every 100 whites 55 are Afrikaner, 35 are English, 5 are Jews, and 5 are of other races. Only whites can enter Parliament, and, with some exceptions, only they can vote. Outside this charmed circle stand eight million blacks, nearly a million Cape colored (Eurafricans), and a quarter-million Indians—forming 80 per cent of the population.

The situation is quite comparable to that in the Southern United States. In many ways the Jim Crow pattern is similar, although it has a different background.

Sketched from life
by Oscar Berger
Marshall Smuts

White South Africans conquered the blacks only after a century of Kaffir wars and are still outnumbered by them four to one. There is always the vague fear among whites that if they relax their repression for a moment, their "white civilization" will be swamped.

What is South Africa's native policy? A generation ago men spoke of "segregation," but that is dead. For better or worse, millions of blacks have broken away from the tribal reserves and the tribal folkways to become farm laborers and menial town workers. This dusky proletariat is the base of South Africa's economic pyramid. Push the black out, and the whole structure will tumble down. The fashionable by-word is now "trusteeship," which means improving the black man's appalling living conditions without giving him political rights or upsetting the master-servant relationship.

The present set-up is by no means static. The mines and the farms are worked by cheap black labor, but this does not suit the new industrialist, who wants effective local markets even at the expense of the cherished economic discrimination. A few of the more enlightened mine owners are breaking with the bad old system of compounds and planning model villages where miners can live in decency with their families. Political liberalism is a dying creed in South Africa, but the belief is growing that a measure of economic emancipation can be squared with white interests.

In discussions about the black man's future it is often overlooked that he may have something to say about it himself. He is picking up white ways fairly fast and becoming less docile. One political safety-valve is an advisory council of prominent "natives" which is supposed to be consulted about bills directly affecting the blacks. Weary of the farce of "advising," this council now refuses to meet. The natives are also beginning to boycott the elections for their representatives—three white members of the House and four white Senators, who honestly speak up for their colored constituents but are powerless to bring about any marked changes.

What may be more important than such political devices is that native workers are forming their own unions. These have a curious status: they are not illegal, but they are not recognized as negotiating agencies under the labor laws. They have nevertheless shown themselves capable of running big strikes.

The most depressed class in the country is black farm labor. Many of its members work for a bag of cornmeal and ten shillings (two dollars) a month. Yet to leave the farms in order to seek other employment is a prison offense. On the other hand, actual physical brutalities sit uneasily on the public conscience, and last July a succession of floggings by Transvaal farmers caused a nation-wide uproar. Lynch law is unknown.

SMUTS AND THE U. N.

The South African color-caste system, having yielded very little to internal pressure, is now under serious attack from the outside world. White opinion in the Union was not so much angry as bewildered by Smuts's double defeat in the U. N. Assembly—on the Southwest Africa mandate and the South African Indians.

That Southwest Africa will become part of the Union of South Africa is inevitable. For all practical purposes it is that already. The U. N. refused to approve the formal change because of the Union's color policy. Smuts in turn refused to put the territory under U. N. trusteeship and has taken steps to incorporate it de facto. He has, for instance, given its white population direct representation in the Union Parliament. By such measures he may legally be able to defy the U. N.; none the less, he has put his country in an embarrassing position.

The two new Indian dominions will doubtless continue to harass Smuts. A quarter-million South African Indians are concentrated in Natal, having been brought in originally to work the sugar plantations. It was as their champion that a young lawyer called Gandhi first took up the weapon of passive resistance. Since then the Indians have advanced their standard of living to a degree and a few of them have become wealthy, but they have been denied political rights and their "penetration" into white sections has been "pegged." Both restraints were incorporated in a special bill passed last year. As in the Palestine land laws, settlement and property-buying are dealt with in three zones—Indian, white, and mixed. Indians have a limited voice in local government; they have two seats in the Natal Provincial Council, and are represented by four whites in the Union Parliament. But like the blacks they are boycotting the whole business.

It is going to be hard for South Africa to maintain its color policies in a world society which is mainly non-white. Its delegate at Flushing Meadow sits at the same table with brown and yellow men, and even with black Africans from Ethiopia and Liberia. Some outraged South Africans want to withdraw from the U. N. altogether.

Prosperity—How Long Will It Last?

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

WE STILL have prosperity: profits are exorbitant and unemployment is low, even though workers are less well off because wages have not kept pace with rising prices. In his recent report President Truman said: "Americans today live in a richer and more productive economy . . . than ever before in peace-time history." But the fact that we have prosperity today does not assure our having it tomorrow.

"The United States has produced and consumed more goods . . . in proportion to population than ever before in its history. Our standard of living has therefore been the highest in our history and is, of course, the highest in the world." These words are taken, not from the Truman report, but from the 1926 Annual Report of the Secretary of Commerce, Herbert Hoover. Three years later we had the worst economic crisis in our history.

There are several significant ways in which the situation today differs for the worse from the situation in the years before the crash of 1929. Then there was peace and, what is even more important, no visible threat of war on any horizon—Hitler's rise to power was four years off. Then American military expenditures were negligible, amounting to about $500,000,000 a year, less than 1 per cent of the annual national income. In the array of forces which produced the crisis of 1929 military expenditures played almost no role.

Before 1929, although the United States had already started its career as a creditor nation, its loans to other countries were still comparatively modest: from 1919 through 1929 foreign loans floated in the United States provided some $7,500,000,000 of new capital to other countries, according to "The United States in World Economy" (Department of Commerce, 1943). In the same period average annual exports of American capital amounted to no more than $1,000,000,000, and our export surpluses were about the same.

What about today? The Truman report was published approximately two years after the ending of the Second World War, but we are not really at peace. Our economy reflects this uneasy situation. We are in a truce economy. Our military expenditures are no longer limited to $500,000,000 annually, as in the years before the crash, or to $1,000,000,000, as before the Second World War. They range somewhere between $11,000,000,000 and $14,000,000,000. It is impossible to give exact figures since a realistic military budget would include not only expenditures for the army and navy but enormous indirect expenditures, such as the costs of scientific research and the stockpiling of raw materials which are essential for industrial mobilization in modern warfare. Taking it all together, we are spending about twenty times as much for our military establishment as in 1929.

That is only one difference. The position of the United States in the markets of the world has also changed. Today the United States is the only great power that is exporting capital; the other powers have stepped out of the ranks of creditor nations. When the Marshall plan gets under way next spring—if it does—the amount will be multiplied to an unpredictable total. As for exports, at the moment we are sending abroad an export surplus valued at $1,000,000,000 a month—as much, in other words, as we formerly did in a year.

Let's lump together some of these figures. Before the crash of 1929 American military expenditures plus American export surpluses amounted to about $1,500,000,000 a year. Today military expenditures plus export surpluses come to about $25,000,000,000 a year, almost seventeen times the pre-crash amount. It is probable, in the light of events abroad, that our military expenditures will be maintained at least at their present level. It is not likely that our export surpluses will remain very much longer at the unprecedented level of $12,000,000,000 a year. This level was made possible only by the fact that foreign countries, in addition to cutting down their long-term credits, were drawing heavily upon their gold balances and their short-term dollar holdings as well. Naturally, that can happen only once and, as the present situation in England and France shows, for a very short time.

FRITZ STERNBERG, a German economist now living in this country, is the author of "The Coming Crisis."

Yet increased American exports are largely responsible for our recent increase in production. The Truman report says: "This increase in the annual rate of the net foreign balance constituted about three-fourths of the increase in the annual rate of the total gross national product from the last quarter of 1946 to the first quarter of 1947." Since prices have gone up so fast and so far that the real income of many laborers and white-collar workers has been seriously lowered, our rising production can be accounted for only by the tremendous increase in exports for which foreign countries did not pay in goods.

In other words, this country's very expensive prosperity is precariously balanced on an export surplus which cannot long be maintained unless foreign countries are supplied with enough dollars to keep our factories producing. Will the Marshall plan support that "richer and more productive economy" the United States is now enjoying? Not unless Congress authorizes expenditures far in excess of any sums yet mentioned. Indeed, present estimates fall so far short of our present export surpluses that the London Economist recently remarked, "By no possible stretch of the imagination can it be conceived that aid under the Marshall plan will be of such magnitude as to make possible continuation of an excess of exports of anything like $1,000,000,000 a month."

Today, when military expenditures together with export surpluses—which in great measure are instruments of foreign policy—amount to $25,000,000,000 annually, it is easy to see that American foreign policy has taken on a new and decisive importance. When we consider our unique prosperity and inquire, "How long will it last?" we are asking not a purely economic question but a political one as well.

Poland Today

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

IV. The New Lands

Wrocław (Breslau), September

I HAVE spent the last month traveling in the new or, as the Poles call them, the "recovered" northwestern and western territories of Poland. An old German Baedeker I have with me explains that the original name for Breslau was "the Old Polish Wrocław," and innumerable place names in these parts are meaningless German corruptions of descriptive Polish names. Thus the German Kolberg in Pomerania was formerly and is now again called Kolobrzeg, which means "Near the Coast." Pommern (Pomerania) was derived from Pomorze, which means "Along the Sea." The Poles love giving you these little lectures in etymology. Archaeology is also sometimes invoked: for instance, I was shown the eleventh-century Polish foundations under the fifteenth-century German castle at Stettin. I suspect, however, that many Poles who use these etymological and archaeological arguments do so with their tongue in their cheek, knowing perfectly well that but for Germany's total defeat and its earlier decision to annihilate Poland, the question of Poland's "recovery" of eastern Germany would never have arisen. Stettin and Breslau were obviously German cities until 1945.

The Poles do not like the theory that the annexation of eastern Germany was "compensation" for the territories they lost to Russia. Apart from the familiar "historical" arguments, they prefer to regard the annexed lands as reparations, or even as a sort of revenge for the temporary obliteration of Poland from the map of Europe. The Germans are, indeed, getting some of their own medicine, for who if not they started the mass transfers of populations? Were not the provinces of Lodz and Poznan cleared of Poles and formally annexed by the Reich? There is also this: during their occupation of Poland the Germans aroused such passionate hatred that any possibility of a future friendly democratic Germany struck the Poles as something remote and almost purely theoretical. Whether or not it was "excessive" to take, say, Stettin, whether the Germans hated the Poles 5 per cent more or 5 per cent less, did not matter; they would make war on Poland if they had a chance. It is said that former Vice-Premier Mikołajczyk did not much favor the present frontier but in deference to popular feeling on the subject associated himself with the Polish protest against the Marshall-Bevin suggestion that the question of the border be "reconsidered." The view now held in authoritative British quarters in Warsaw is that since the Polish government has settled nearly five million people in the new territories, it would be futile to start pushing them out again; Poland would only be driven farther into the arms of Russia.

The fact that Russian strategic considerations had much to do with the fixing of the new frontier is not overlooked by the Poles, but that does not lessen their determination to keep what they have. It seems clear that the Russians will maintain some forces in the trans-Oder bridgeheads. In Swinemünde, for instance, which used to be something like a Coney Island for Berlin, I found their troops solidly established, with wives and families. They were living a strictly segregated existence in a part of the town separated from the rest by barbed wire, but I noticed that the soldiers' wives were pushing little German-made prams—in Russia babies are carried in the arms—and enjoying other products of Western culture. The Poles may not like the presence of the Russians, and occasionally there are anti-Russian incidents, but in general they feel that the Russians are there to protect them against the Germans or against anyone who would use the Germans against them.

The completely easy and natural attitude of the Poles in the new territories made a strong impression on me. Already they seem to feel completely at home. On a Saturday night Stettin resounds with Polish songs—some of them toughly anti-Russian—and Polish rowdiness. Railroad trains are packed with Polish school children and working people going to rest homes and bathing resorts in Pomerania for their paid holidays.

ONE of the great questions affecting the whole European economy is whether the Poles, with a population of twenty-four million, will be able to integrate the new territories into their own economy. After traveling for a month in these parts I can say that they have made remarkable progress toward that end. Everywhere I saw evidence that not lack of settlers but lack of housing was the great obstacle to development of the new lands. Where the fighting had been heavy and many villages were destroyed, there were many fallow fields. "We can't expect new settlers to live in dugouts," say the Polish resettlement authorities. There is also a great shortage of work horses and stock. Some tractors have been provided by UNRRA.

Between Kolberg and Köslin, where hardly a house is left standing, I traveled through miles of thistles. On the other hand, around Stargard and Naugard, east of Stettin, I saw hundreds of prosperous farms of ten to twenty acres well run by farmers from central Poland and beyond the Curzon line. They were living in good solid German houses and seemed thoroughly contented. There may still be some reluctance to settle too close to the border—partly for this reason the border zone is being "reserved" for soldiers still to be demobilized from the Polish army—but a little farther away there seems complete confidence that this "is and will remain Poland." One Pomeranian farmer, originally from Vilno, said to me, "The roads and houses are better than around Vilno, though the soil and climate are not so good; but if I thought the Germans would come again, I'd not take the trouble to breed these pigs."

Stettin province, which constitutes the greater part of Pomerania, had nearly two million inhabitants before the war; now it contains 800,000 Poles and 120,000 Germans. The Germans, most of them women and children, are being sent to Germany at the rate of about 2,000 a day. While 72,000 Polish farms have been set up in the province, state farms still hold about 40 per cent of the arable land. Most of these state farms will in due course be split up among the peasants; two-thirds of the total arable land of one million hectares will have been distributed by the end of next year. It is claimed that by 1949 there will be no land left fallow.

To revive important industrial cities like Danzig, Stettin, and Breslau much new machinery is needed. The destruction here was far worse than in Upper Silesia, and many of the factories that survived the bombings were dismantled by the Russians. You could not find two more lively and cheerful cities than Gdansk (Danzig) and Gdynia. The Poles revel in being "on the sea again." They recall "all that nonsense of the Polish corridor and the Free City of Danzig" and rejoice that "it is all Poland now." The beautiful old city of Danzig is dead, but the harbor has been brought back to life. Gdynia, after being almost completely wrecked, has also been largely rebuilt. The capacity of the two ports is now 70 per cent restored.

IN LOWER SILESIA resettlement has been on an even greater scale than in Pomerania. Breslau is 70 per cent destroyed and Glogau and other towns 100 per cent, but a new life is rising from the ruins. Already 200,000 people are living in Breslau, as against 600,000 before the war. Some 7,000 students are attending the university and the celebrated Polytechnic Institute which was moved here bodily from Lwow; factories are turning out 1,000 railway carriages a month; an excellent opera company and several theaters, one of them playing Shaw, attract large audiences. Incidentally, I heard Poles speak of the Russians with greater warmth in Breslau, for which the Russians and Germans fought so furiously for three months, than anywhere else.

If half of the country north of Breslau is fallow, it is because so many towns and villages have been destroyed. The latecomers from Lwow who have settled here in the few intact houses are living rather miserably, though not without hope. One of the men spoke nostalgically of his two hectares of black soil near Lwow, which he said "were worth more than ten hectares here." But such conditions are not typical. In the less devastated areas near the Czech border every inch of ground was cultivated, and the people were living in good houses in picturesque towns and villages. Over a million and a half Poles live in Lower Silesia now. The 100,000 remaining Germans, like their fellow-countrymen in Pomerania, are being sent to the Soviet zone of Germany.

There are three forms of land tenure in Silesia, apart from the state farms: the individual farm; the cooperative farm of ten families or more—after five years it must be divided up among the members; and the group settlement, which combines a system of instalment payments with a state grant—20 per cent of the peasant's earnings go into the group fund, the state puts in 25 per cent, and at the end of five years the peasant receives the capital he needs to equip his plot of land.

Silesia is not quite the show place I was led by some in Warsaw to expect. There is much hardship still among the new settlers, and many difficulties must be overcome before the country can produce anything like its possible maximum. But when I recall the desolate stretches of Silesia in 1945 and compare them with the present scene, I am convinced that the Poles have not wasted their first two post-war years. If this economic progress continues at the same rate, and no internal or external political complications intervene, Poland should be on the high road to prosperity in two or three years. The reconstruction of the big cities, however, especially Warsaw, Wroclaw, and Gdansk, will be a long and arduous task which can only be hastened by large foreign credits.

Bolivia's Two Worlds

BY JOHN H. GROEL

La Paz, Bolivia, August 29

THROUGHOUT its 122 years of troubled independence, Bolivia has faithfully adhered to the eighteenth-century physicians' cure for all ailments—bloodletting. A little more than a year ago the people of La Paz resorted once again to the old formula. This time, however, it was no traditional revolt. Neither palace plotters nor politically ambitious military gentlemen were its leaders. It was a revolution fought by an aroused citizenry, determined to free itself of Gualberto Villaroel, the Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario, and a regime which had made terror the law of the land. Because it was their revolution, the people had reason to hope that this time the bloodletting would not be in vain.

Through their sacrifice Bolivia has been able to take at least two firm steps toward greater democracy. On January 5 the nation celebrated the new year with one of the freest elections in decades. The victorious candidate, Dr. Enrique Hertzog, recently furthered the democratic cause by accepting members of opposition parties in a Cabinet dedicated to national unity. As a result, optimistic Bolivians and their friends abroad feel that democracy is at last adapting itself to life in the rarefied atmosphere of the Altiplano—that mountain-walled world that is the heart of the Bolivian nation.

Yet in spite of undeniable progress during the past year, Bolivia is much farther from achieving anything like a working democracy than most of its friends care to admit. Even the January elections, honest though they were, could not be called democratic ones. They mirrored the will of only a small fraction of Bolivians. Three-quarters of the population were automatically barred from the polls because they could not read or write. Of those who were literate, perhaps one-half were women, still without the vote. Under these conditions, no more than 12 per cent of the people, at best, could have taken part in the balloting. One important Bolivian newspaper, in fact, concluded that the January results were determined by but 2 per cent of the nation.

Thus political power in Bolivia is a commodity possessed by a very few men. Those men belong to the white world. There is, however, another and much larger world in Bolivia—the world of the Indian and mestizo, who together form about 75 per cent of the population. They are the workers of the nation. They toil in the tin mines of Catavi, in the copper mines of Corocoro, in all the mines of this mineral-rich land, to produce the raw materials which Bolivia sends abroad to purchase the food and manufactured goods the people must have. On the great Bolivian Altiplano the rock-strewn soil is tilled with wooden sticks and hand plows of Incan design. The dwarfed potatoes, barley, and quinua raised are carried by the Indians or by llama and burro to the markets of La Paz, Oruro, and Cochabamba.

The Indians and mestizos seldom own the land they cultivate. Their position in agriculture is little higher than that of draft animals. Their only pay is usually the right to live in a small adobe hut and till a patch of soil for themselves. A form of feudal dues frequently binds them to give personal service in the city homes of the hacienda owners. Their ordinary dress is rags, and their food may be little more than a handful of toasted corn.

The plight of the mine workers has often been described in terrible detail. It is bad enough, but the position of the Indian enslaved in agriculture is far worse. Both groups are frequently attacked by white Bolivians and foreigners alike for their vices—coca-chewing, drunkenness, unreliability, and an addiction to long and often brutally orgiastic fiestas. Yet these are simply the inevitable responses to filth, ignorance, and hopelessness.

With all the abuse that may be heaped upon him,

JOHN H. GROEL is a teacher at the American Institute at La Paz. He has traveled extensively in South America and written for Plain Talk and Pan-American.

the Indian remains the chief producer of wealth for the Bolivian nation. Individually, he may do little, and that little quite inefficiently, but collectively he supports the national economy. Yet he has neither economic nor political rights. Barred from the polls for illiteracy, he is left with no peaceful method of expressing his wishes and needs. Burdened by semi-feudal obligations and untaught in the ways of politics, he is the raw material of which revolutions are made.

SINCE March of this year the Hertzog regime has unearthed at least two revolutionary plots. Both of them called for strikes and violence by Indian laborers in the mines and on the haciendas. Early in the year the natives of Los Andes, a province of La Paz, refused to work. Property owners, they said, had failed to support schools on the large haciendas, as required by law. At the end of May La Paz police raided the headquarters of the Federación Obrera Local to arrest more than seventy "agitators" accused of urging the Indians of the Altiplano into bloody uprisings. The F. O. L., which has Trotskyite leanings and is accused of relations with the discredited Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario, retaliated by declaring a general strike of its rural members. The union claims that its sole purpose has been to organize these Indians for legitimate purposes: to obtain more schools, wages in money, and a fair redistribution of the land.

Whatever the truth may be, the strike brought terror to the Altiplano, where drunken natives killed at least four whites, including a nineteen-year-old girl who was attacked and terribly beaten by her assailants. Representing the propertied classes, the Bolivian Society of Rural Landowners was quick to demand that President Hertzog deal out immediate punishment to the cabecillas—the Indian leaders—of the movement. The Women's Civic Association of La Paz organized a public protest meeting against such a violation of the honor of Bolivian womanhood but failed to protest against the conditions which make men capable of such crimes.

In replying to the indignant citizens, President Hertzog revealed himself as a man willing to voice unpopular truths. He pointed out that the uprisings were due to the exploitation and cruelty to which the Indians were subjected by certain landowners. He went on to say that he considered himself the President of all Bolivians, not of one single class, and he promised that his government would dedicate itself to ending abuses which inevitably bring a violent reaction from the oppressed natives.

None the less, the Hertzog regime has taken one step which carries with it possibilities of grave injustice. Without benefit of trial, it has sent a group of Indian agitators to the remote tropical region of Ichilo, ostensibly for colonizing purposes. According to the government, the exiled Indians will be given adequate health protection and the tools and guidance needed to build up homesteads. The suspicion remains, however, that the highland Indians are going to their deaths. Ichilo is notoriously unhealthy; it abounds in malarial areas, and the inhabitants of the Altiplano are poorly adapted to life in the lowlands. To be successful, the Ichilo venture will require much planning and expert assistance, neither of which is apparent at the moment.

Whatever the government's intentions may be, the uprisings continue and appear to be spreading from the Altiplano to the valleys of Chuquisaca. Perhaps they can be suppressed by force. But fear of the Indians will plague Bolivia's ruling classes until they are willing to risk their monopoly of political and economic power by guiding the natives out of feudalism.

THE Indian problem is, of course, enormous. It cannot be solved overnight. It will never be solved by accepting the myth that the Bolivian natives—Aymarás and Quechuas alike—are incapable of progress and addicted to filth and poverty. That is a myth created by men whose centuries-old position of privilege is threatened. Historically, the Quechuas proved their capabilities by forging the great Incan empire; the Aymarás formed an important part of that realm. Since those remote times both groups have been degraded by the white man's conquests, but they have given repeated evidence of their anxiety to move out of degradation.

Their faith in education is childlike in its sincerity. At Caquiaviri, they voluntarily spent over 150,000 work hours in the construction of school buildings. The American- and Bolivian-financed Educational Foundation is receiving astonishing cooperation from the Indians in its attempt to develop a practical program of rural education. The students, organized into community-improvement clubs, leave their classes to build latrines, animal pens, and drainage ditches.

On the shores of Lake Titicaca, not far from the Straits of Tiquina, is another answer to those who claim that the Indian cannot be brought out of his windowless adobe hut into a better way of life. Here, sprinkled about the green countryside, are neatly whitewashed cottages, complete with tiled roofs and glassed windows—the homes of Indians who have learned through the work of North American missionaries that some of the white men's customs are worthy of adoption. They live like men. And the change is apparent in their faces, which are much brighter and more alert than their depressed, coca-chewing brothers.

The truth is that too many members of the dominant white and semi-white world do not wish to find an answer to the Indian problem. Every effort to educate the natives and to improve their lot is systematically undermined. Only 20 per cent of the national education appropriation goes to rural projects. At the same time a large part of the government's income is spent to maintain an army whose chief purposes have been to put down native uprisings and intervene in revolutions.

Happily, there are some signs of change. The present government at least realizes the gravity of the Indian problem. President Hertzog has been courageous enough to place the blame where it legitimately belongs—not on the agitators who take advantage of social injustice, but on the landowners who by their cruel shortsightedness drive the natives into brutal reprisals. Moreover, intellectuals and labor groups are leading a movement to organize the army as a useful social unit which would devote itself chiefly to the task of building roads and bridges, so essential to the transport of agricultural products. Among the youth of the nation one senses a genuine revolt against unbridled militarism and a commendable determination to lessen the gap between the world of the white man and the purgatory of the Indian.

There will be no miracles in Bolivia. Political stability and democracy are goals for the future and not realities of today. They will not become realities until the Bolivian Indian is regarded as a man rather than a beast of burden.

New Wine in Old Bottles

BY CHARLES A. SIEPMANN

RADIO has once more made the headlines. Prodded by public agitation and by the "Blue Book" strictures of the Federal Communications Commission, it has developed a welcome mood of self-reform. Its trade association, the National Association of Broadcasters, has just published "a new code of standards of practice." (This code was printed in the New York Times of Tuesday, September 9, or may be obtained from the N. A. B. in Washington.) Adoption of the code, pending discussion of its terms and of certain legalities, will be deferred for some weeks. It will be a thousand pities if, meanwhile, the listener fails to give it sympathetic, critical examination.

The code has three sections, two of which particularly merit public consideration. The third, dealing with commercial policies, will not be discussed in this article. In the first section radio makes its deferential bow to conventional standards of propriety and morals. Institutions of religion are to be respected. (Atheists, by implication—and in defiance of the FCC—are not to be allowed air time.) The sanctity of marriage is to be sustained. "Brutal killings, tortures, or physical agony should never be presented in detail [sic]. . . . Sex crimes—seductions, rape, etc.—and sex abnormalities are not desirable subjects. . . . Profane, salacious, obscene, vulgar, or indecent material should not be broadcast." Nothing much, here, for comment—unless you care to ask why such "Keep Off the Grass" signs still need posting.

Section Two covers "standards for specific programs."

News, politics, controversy, religion, crime, mystery, and children's programs are dealt with successively. Among many welcome—and some possibly debatable—provisions of this section the following deserves emphasis: "Broadcasters should be at all times responsible for the control of the content and format and presentation of all news-commentary and news-analysis broadcasts. In no circumstances should such responsibility be delegated to a sponsor. . . ." This is admirable—in so far as it restores program responsibility to the broadcaster, where it belongs. Many listeners believe, though it is not true, that William Shirer left the air because his sponsor disliked his liberal opinions. The new code, if observed, removes the possibility of such suspicion. It does not, however, assure us that news commentators will now be exempt from restrictions on the free expression of their point of view by a station or network. One hopes that such assurance will be given.

Very welcome is the provision that "broadcasters should exercise particular discrimination in the acceptance and placement of commercial announcements on news programs. Special care should be used to avoid those sound effects, singing commercials, or other devices which, while acceptable in programs [sic], would not be appropriate when used in connection with news programming." But the code goes farther: No "middle commercial" is to be allowed in newscasts or commentaries of less than fifteen minutes. Note this, too: "Commercial announcements in connection with news programs should be distinctly set apart from the news content." This raises high hopes. Can it mean that Gabriel Heatter can no longer slide—with, oh, so slight a variant inflection—from the subject of starving Europe to the virtues of hair tonic?

On the treatment of controversial issues the code

CHARLES A. SIEPMANN is chairman of the Department of Communications of the School of Education of New York University and author of "Radio's Second Chance."

is less clear and explicit than one could wish. "Time for the presentation of public questions, including those of controversial nature, should be allotted with due regard to all other elements of balanced program schedules, and to the degree of public interest in the questions to be presented." What does this gobbledygook mean? What is "due regard" to all other "elements of balanced program schedules"? Are Hooperatings to be the criterion of the amount of controversy that we get? If so, we may be in for less than is at present provided. Is public interest, at any given time, the measure of a subject's importance? Or is public interest aroused in proportion to the prominence which planned publicity accords a subject? It looks as if radio were here trying to perpetuate the heresy that it is wholly subservient to its audience. This is false—and disingenuous—modesty, a half-truth with dangerous implications. Radio, like other mass media, creates as much as it reflects interest. Like the statesman, or even the politician, its function is to be leader as well as servant of the public.

Another provision of this section raises nice questions: "The presentation of viewpoints in connection with controversial public issues should be confined to periods or programs specifically designed for that purpose." Does this mean that expression of controversial opinion, which means neither more nor less than individual opinion, is to be confined to forums, round tables, and the like? Specifically, is opinion to be excluded from news commentaries? Does it mean that Fulton Lewis will report only facts? Does it imply that Monsignor Sheen's recent — unanswered — philippics against communism, broadcast as a series of religious talks, are to be the last of their kind?

Perhaps we misread here the intention of the code. But it would seem that the gains and losses of this edict need to be carefully appraised. In so far as it precludes the further use of air time for the unchallenged expression of prejudiced opinion it offers us pure gain. If, on the other hand, it means the roping off of controversy within a "restricted area" of air time, it threatens the expansion of the free market place of thought. We need more and better controversy, not less. It should permeate most programs, as it permeates most of life. Controversy is troublesome. It is not calculated to "make friends," but it is a way "to influence people."

The danger of this proposal is well illustrated by a later provision of the code: "Religious broadcasts should place major emphasis on broad religious truths. They should not be used for the presentation of controversial questions." The practice of keeping truth "broad" enough to divorce it from practical living has a long and disreputable history. A king once claimed it of a turbulent priest, one Thomas à Becket. It is what Hitler demanded of Niemöller.

In its handling of crime and mystery and of children's programs the code leans, as in Section One, on popular convention and cultural myth as well as on the use of safe but equivocal terms. "Criminals should always be punished either specifically or by implication." Again we confront avoidance of reality. Then, children's programs: these should be "based upon sound social concepts . . . contribute to healthy personality development . . . provide opportunities not only for entertainment but also for cultural growth." And "no program or episode should contain material . . . which will create in the child's mind morbid suspense or other harmful reactions." Who is to be judge? Parents in general? Psychiatrists or social workers or teachers? Fortunately for broadcasters, there is no common mind on this question of influence and effects. Under the shelter of fine phrases radio can still get away with what to many will seem murder.

All this is not to disparage the code but rather to emphasize the range, the real complexity, and the broad social implications of the problems which daily confront broadcasters. The new code is an important, if belated, forward step. Those who believe in the American system of broadcasting have always maintained that it is safe and sound only as the three partners in this great enterprise—the industry, the FCC, the listening public—fulfil their respective roles. The lead is now where it should always have been—with the industry. Had the code been drafted long ago, it would have made at least some of the strictures in the Blue Book redundant.

It is still far from satisfactory, and an important condition attaches to its value and relevance to listeners. Will it be honored? Is this another paper front? The previous code was much honored in the breach. Can we have higher hopes for this one?

This, at least, can be said: the N. A. B. enjoys greater prestige today than perhaps at any previous time. Its membership is larger. All four networks and a significant majority of independent stations belong. But it remains a voluntary trade association without power to enforce its rulings—other than the power of its prestige and the support that it can muster from the listening public. That is why responsible public comment on the code and a wide canvassing of opinion on its provisions are important. The radio industry alone is not involved. Listening is in a sense at stake. The N. A. B., to its credit, conceived the code. Listeners can help in its refinement and correction. It is high time that they—and not least the so-called intelligentsia—took a hand in this game. For it is being played for high stakes.

Drawing by Golden

Del Vayo—Strength of the French Left

HOW the French left fares in the October municipal elections will depend, in the final analysis, on the strength of the two major working-class parties, the Socialists and the Communists. Only by a generous stretch of the imagination can the Radicals be considered leftists; the presence of a man like Daladier in their parliamentary bloc is a stigma they will not easily erase. And though the Trotskyites are stronger in France than in any other country of Europe, one cannot speak of them seriously as a party capable of influencing the outcome of the elections.

As the campaign opens, the Socialists find themselves laboring under a double handicap. In the first place, they are the government party—but without a majority; and in the second place, their ranks are split wide open. A Socialist, Vincent Auriol, is President of the Republic; another, Paul Ramadier is Prime Minister. But while their position of leadership has undoubtedly enhanced the prestige of the Socialists, it has at the same time exposed them to criticism and attack. The average Frenchman, like the average citizen anywhere, is inclined to blame the government for all his present miseries.

In the nine months since he became Premier, Ramadier has been confronted with more crucial problems than any of his predecessors since the liberation. Living costs have soared, and the Blum experiment of decreeing two 5 per cent price cuts made no break in the inflationary spiral. The franc is back at 300 to the dollar in the black market. Industrial output is good, considering the lack of coal and the dollar famine which has forced France to slash imports of raw materials. But with winter only a few months away, production has been slowed by a wave of strikes in protest against the high cost of living and the food shortage. The "bread strikes" that broke out in some sections of Paris a few weeks ago, following the cut in the ration, quickly spread to Clermont-Ferrand, Lyon, Lille, and other important industrial centers. The Socialist ministers were in the unenviable position of having to pit their strength against workers who were asking only for a little more food in order to increase their efficiency—strikers who had worked unceasingly for two years to lift France's economy out of the ruins of war.

The Ramadier Cabinet is also identified with a new, unpopular shift in French foreign policy. Backed strongly by public opinion, the government was until recently intransigent in its opposition to the American plan for reviving German industry; now under pressure from Washington it is gradually becoming more amenable.

In France, where the people have reached a high degree of political maturity, a Socialist leader must possess a number of qualities: he must be an intellectual of high order, an astute politician, a man of courage, a brilliant orator, a first-class journalist, a Socialist historian and theoretician; in addition he must feel an identity with the working class. The French Socialist Party had such a leader in Jean Jaurès.

Since then the only man who has approached that mark is Léon Blum; the party is still feeding on the ideas and prestige of its seventy-five-year-old chieftain.

For the first time since 1945 the Communists face an election without a single representative in the government. Their position has both advantages and disadvantages. The theory that no one could govern without the Communists has been exploded. Moreover, they have lost a powerful campaign argument by being unable to point to a good ministerial record—in previous elections even their opponents had to concede that Billoux, for instance, was an excellent Minister of Reconstruction. On the other hand, they share no responsibility for the catastrophic price-wage policy. In foreign policy they are on solid ground when they denounce the government's failure to take a strong stand against the American plan for Germany. And finally, on the positive side of the ledger is their appeal for working-class unity against the growing threat of Gaullist gains.

At first glance, asking for unity of action seems as unrealistic as asking for the moon. Relations between Socialists and Communists have deteriorated steadily since the liberation. In 1945 the Socialists rejected organic unity with the Communists; nevertheless, sentiment for a single Marxist party was then so strong that the leadership was obliged to promise close collaboration. At the 1946 Congress fusionist enthusiasm was already on the wane, for Communist denunciations of the Socialists as Wall Street agents and reactionaries had created deep resentment; even so, the delegates left the door open for unity of action on specific issues. This year at Lyon the majority took the position that such unity was neither necessary nor possible. The minority resolution affirming the community of interests between the two parties received only a handful of votes.

In spite of this breach the Gaullist threat in the coming elections may yet produce a kind of spontaneous alliance between the Socialists and Communists. The latter are clearly trying to prepare the ground for such an eventuality: they have limited their attacks to Ramadier, assumed a less insolent tone, and called for the formation of a popular-front government based on the two parties and including the Radicals and some smaller political groups.

Actually only a popular front can pull France out of its present impasse and bring to life the program of the Resistance. If the French people were given hope that this program would be carried out, the election outlook might change in the next few weeks. But first two things must happen: the Socialists must disavow the extreme anti-Communist tendency that dominated the Lyon meeting; and the Communists must once and for all accept the Socialists as allies on an equal footing. The tactic of proposing unity one day and denouncing the recipients of the proposals as lackeys of Washington the next will bring about not a popular front but the victory of reaction.

[This is the last of three articles on French politics.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

What Is Truth?

THE METAPHYSICAL SOCIETY:
VICTORIAN MINDS IN CRISIS,
1869-1880. By Alan Willard Brown.
Columbia University Press. $4.50.

FROM the time of Socrates, at least, men have struggled with the question which Köhler has recently called "The Place of Value in a World of Facts." What is the source of our conceptions of truth and goodness? What is the relation of these desires of men to the "natural" world?

The rise of modern science forced more intensive searching of these questions. Through the nineteenth century an increasing number of people answered them by affirming the identity of science and truth, while religious leaders and some philosophers continued to assert that truth and goodness are distinguishable from observed reality. Today this controversy continues between pragmatists and logical positivists on the one hand and philosophers who reaffirm the independent role of "objective reason" on the other. But the discussions are usually carried on at a polite distance in scholarly journals. Rarely do thinkers of strongly opposed views sit down together to consider each other's assumptions with the aim of enhanced understanding.

In England during the seventies of the last century, when the battle between science and theology was most bitter, a group of sixty-odd leaders of Victorian thought, including extremists of both schools, met monthly to discuss the fundamentals on which their life work was based. The Metaphysical Society was an unusual attempt to seek truth, or at least to further mutual understanding, through candid and penetrating exchange of thought. It is much less well known than are other activities of its famous members. Mr. Brown has performed a valuable service in discovering and bringing together in a thoughtful study the records of the society's proceedings.

The society included Huxley and Cardinal Manning, Tennyson and Bagehot, Tyndall and Gladstone; Frederic

Harrison, Father Dalgrains, and Henry Sidgwick were charter members; John Morley, Leslie Stephen, Frederick Pollock, and Balfour joined during its later years. Froude said in the early days of the society that if it hung together for twelve months that would be one of the most remarkable facts in history. The fact that it continued to meet for nearly twelve years suggests both the interest of the discussions and the remarkable character of the members.

Naturally a group which represented such diversity of belief, even when meeting with the aim of discussing basic questions "with the freedom of an ordinary scientific society," did not always follow all the Victorian canons of compromise and tolerance. At an early meeting W. G. Ward responded to a request to avoid expressing moral disapprobation: "While acquiescing in this condition as a general rule, I think it cannot be expected that Christian thinkers shall give no sign of the horror with which they would view the spread of such extreme opinions as those advocated by Mr. Huxley." To which, after a moment, Huxley replied: "As Dr. Ward has spoken, I must in fairness say that it will be very difficult for me to conceal my feeling as to the intellectual degradation which would come of the acceptance of such views as Dr. Ward holds."

This, however, was unusual. In general scientists and bishops advanced to the discussion of "Verification of Beliefs," "The Emotion of Conviction," "The Incoherence of Empirical Philosophy," "Generic and Symbolic Images" (a paper by Pollock), "The Metaphysical Basis of Toleration" (by Bagehot), intent on enlarging the area of their common ground.

A paper by Mark Pattison on "Double Truth" not only sought the fuller understanding of Pascal's "reasons of the heart," which was a central preoccupation of the society, but also of the role of language in reaching such understanding. He began by pointing out that a "contract to speak the truth" as a basis for all communication is "implied in the use of language" but went on to show that in description of "fact," as well as in the expression of poetry, religion, or personal feeling, there is an inevitable gap between what is seen or apprehended and what can be communicated through language.

The society itself succeeded in communicating its discussions far beyond its own group. Sir James Knowles, editor of the Contemporary Review, was the founder of the Metaphysical Society, and when in 1877 he left the Contemporary to found the Nineteenth Century, members of the society were the chief contributors to the new review. Indeed, most people would have been surprised to know that for several years the articles which were the main body of the Nineteenth Century had first been given as papers before the Metaphysical Society.

But the main interest of Mr. Brown's book lies in the light it throws on questions of which the Metaphysical Society and the Victorian Age itself show only certain important phases: Does the fact that division of labor is necessary in the pursuit of truth mean that truth itself must remain divided—and that every individual must be divided within himself? Or is communication possible between those who start from "facts" and those who start from "values"? We may agree with Mr. Brown that "many kinds of truth are attainable by many kinds of men," but what is the relation among them? The question is not whether truth lies in "experience" or in "reason," but whether by experience we mean something more than the facts most obviously derived from sensory impressions, and whether reason is based on one segment of human nature or is derived from all human experience. (Horkheimer in his recent "Eclipse of Reason" in more than one place uses reason as synonymous with intuition.) A further question is whether conflict is something to be resolved through discussion and understanding or is inherent in reality.

Mr. Brown points out that when Pilate asked "What is truth?" he did not stay for an answer. The Victorians, whatever their shortcomings, stopped at no boundaries in their search.

HELEN M. LYND

John Betjeman

SLICK BUT NOT STREAMLINED.

Poems and Short Pieces by John Betjeman. Selected and with an Introduction by W. H. Auden. Doubleday and Company, $3.

SORRY, but this collection is a vexation, if not a disappointment. Perhaps the trouble is that the reader has to stoop below too many low bridges, duck under too many falling arches of archness: a not too engaging title, some much too cute packaging, needlessly quaint typography, a ghastly-kitchenish introduction by Mr. Auden, another introduction, somewhat over-protestant, by the author himself. Topophilia, schmopophilia; and speaking of Greek, Messrs. Doubleday and Company, cannot someone in your employ be found to do a better proofreading job on that language than was done in the third line from the top of page 132?

This said, and distraction overcome, let us consider the poems of Mr. Betjeman. These, we are admonished by Mr. Auden, are not trivial; and Mr. Betjeman seems to think they are not funny, either. So all right; what then are they? They must be serious, and sad; and so they are. But not heavy-sad; little threnodies on the flute, a watery, airy music whose metrical ripple and run are contradicted by the unrecurrent of sorrow. Flute music, such as went with old Greek elegiac verse; flute music, mournful, meditative, and short.

Mr. Betjeman's material, at first glance, seems more imported and foreign than it actually is. There are American correspondences to the British suburbs and provincial towns, their decaying seaside resorts, even the subtle quarrels of rival religious sects. But these the American writer has not much cared to commemorate, nor the American reader been trained to notice, though every loved spot that our infancy knew teems with such phenomena. The most we do in this direction is an occasional herd-swooning after something like "Life with Father," or some of the minstrels of the American corn. Mr.

Betjeman, however, reports in an individual way on what he has come, as an individual, to like; guided by passion, not fashion, he is fond, but not sentimental.

Pages 25-107 in the present collection consist of poems; pages 110-185 of essays. This arrangement adds to the effect of clutter, no matter how eager one is to find more books, in America, with at least a touch of belles-lettres. The essays are easy and readable; the longest, a satirical examination of various types of dons, carries on just a little too much—is the whole business that important?

Is it impossible to hope for a complete collection of John Betjeman—all the poems of "Continual Dew," "Old Lights for New Chancels," and "New Bats in Old Belfries," all in one volume, and the format as simple, delightful, and neat as was the last volume, published in London by John Murray?

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The Concentration Point

THE OTHER KINGDOM. By David Rousset. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.75.

TO READ this book is to be so shaken by its picture of life in the Nazi concentration camps that in writing about it one's first impulse is to burst into rhetoric, to strive for a sort of Ersatz communion with the sufferers by charging words with the extremities of feeling actually experienced by the prisoners. Fortunately, it cannot be done. Between those victims of totalitarianism who have made the ultimate journey into the night, and us who live—however unhappily—in the twilight of modern society, there can be only a tenuous and incomplete understanding. We may understand what has happened, but they know. And so all I wish to say here is that this is a terrible and tragic report of the time we live in and the life man lives; that it is the most terrifying of all the reports on the concentration camps, even though it recounts the fewest atrocities; and that it is written by a man of fine feeling and genuine talent who has the capacity to shape his emotion and increase its power by restraint.

It is the most terrifying of all the memoirs by inmates of concentration camps because it gives meaning and order to their experience. If the behavior of the S. S. were some form of collective madness or atavistic reversion, or if it were a national quirk or an inexplicable outburst of man's irrational nature—then the terror would not be so great. Then we could resort to medicine or hospitals or jails or ropes; or we could declare the situation hopeless and try to run away. It would be, so to speak, a natural terror.

But Rousset shows us that it was an organized terror, a policy. He tries to answer the basic question which must always arise when we discuss the concentration camps: Why didn't the Nazis just kill off their victims? Why did they torture them for years, destroy them and yet preserve them?

I think Rousset gives the best answer that has yet been provided to these questions. The Nazis didn't want to kill their victims because the camps, with "living" prisoners, provided the most effective means of paralyzing the peoples of Europe into subjection. They convinced millions of people that death was not the worst possible fate, but that there was a kind of death-within-life which was worse than death. And since the Nazis were able to control both life and death to the most refined and exquisite point, they arrogated to themselves not merely the existence but also the destiny of those whom they ruled. Nor is this peculiar to the Nazis. As Rousset insists, it is characteristic of all modern societies as they sink into their bureaucratized and mechanized despond.

There were, of course, other uses for the camps: they were collecting points for slave labor, places to isolate oppositionists of conquered nations, and a source of workers for secret projects who would never be able to divulge the secrets they learned. But, basically, the camps served as the specter of fear. They were the concentration points—the Nazis named the camps quite perfectly—of all the characteristics of modern totalitarianism, which is, in turn, the concentration point of capitalist society. It is this simple but commanding view on which Rousset insists, and which prevents us from grasping, with cheap comfort, at the belief that Buchenwald was somehow remote from us. If we accept Rousset's analysis, then Buchenwald impinges crucially on our existence: it is the mirror which distorts, in order to clarify.

And there lies the terror of Rousset's book. For now we are connected with what happened at Buchenwald; we see the evil of modern life tied to its social matrix. That it all makes sense and that we allow it to continue—is this not more terrifying than all the accounts of concentration camps which pile horror on horror but fail to explain them?

Buchenwald mirrors modern life, not only in terms of the relationship between the S. S. and its prisoners, but also in terms of the relationship between groups of prisoners themselves. One of the most sickening revelations of Rousset's book is that the routine beatings were administered, not by the S. S., but by a bureaucracy of prisoners who, in gratitude for a second piece of bread or one less slash of the whip, were the most merciless persecutors of their fellows. Among the inmates there broke out a deadly struggle between the "greens" (criminals and non-politicals) and the "reds" (politicals) for control of the camp administration. Through superior discipline the politicals finally won. They had faced the bitter choice of letting themselves be tortured and slaughtered by the "greens" or of taking over the camp and accepting Nazi domination in order to save a few more of their comrades than otherwise. They chose the latter, and they were right. If one wants to survive in the house of the damned—and the politicals felt their group survival to be imperative—then one must realistically face one's narrow area of moral choice.

Rousset mentions Kafka several times, and not by accident. "The Other Kingdom" fills in some of the space between Kafka's bare structures; it develops, in specific incident, what Kafka presaged in dramatic abstractions.

Rousset's use of elliptic narrative and fragmentary exposition, which makes for dramatic and speedy sequences, is strange to American readers. But its effects are on the whole very successful; they remind one of a speeded-up montage. Other than that, all one can say of this book is read it, for it is part of the essential experience of our time.

IRVING HOWE

Brief for Canonization

A. P. GIANNINI: GIANT IN THE WEST. A Biography. By Julian Dana. Prentice-Hall. $4.50.

TIME was when the tycoons of American finance, conscious that they were making both money and history, were arrogantly indifferent to contemporary opinion. But today the career of a tycoon is not complete until an "official" biography has been prepared, in his lifetime, for his careful scrutiny and personal approval. While this procedure doubtless shortens the gap between achievement and chronicle, it makes more difficult a real understanding of the careers of these extremely important public figures.

In this instance, it would take a dozen investigators armed with the power of subpoena to unravel the truth from the fiction in Julian Dana's biography of the great "A. P."—Amadeo Peter Giannini of California. "Biography," however, is not the term with which to describe this book: it is a brief for canonization. Dana would have his readers believe that this ruthless, domineering, aggressive financier is by nature and achievement a friend of the common man—the Thomas Jefferson of Montgomery Street.

The story of A. P. is, indeed, a fascinating chronicle. Born in San José in 1870, the son of a poor Italian immigrant couple, A. P. was a successful produce broker at fifteen, and at thirty-one had retired with a modest fortune. He entered the banking business in 1904 and is today the head of the largest banking business in the world, with hundreds of branches, 15,000 employees, and 500,000 stockholders. His is one of the great success stories of this century, to be compared only with that of Henry Ford. With the perverse sense of history that seems to characterize the "official" biographer, Mr. Dana describes Giannini as the "torrential force" behind the remarkable economic expansion of California, when in point of fact the economic and industrial growth of California since 1900 should be regarded as the key to the remarkable success of A. P. Giannini. Certainly it was the amazingly rapid growth of the produce industry in California that gave the original Bank of Italy its initial impetus.

Always wary of Wall Street, the usually shrewd A. P. walked into a trap in the early thirties when, with his ac-

Christ. God, Man or Myth?

Did Christ himself write down any record of his life? If so, where are these writings today? Do they exist in any museum or library or sacred shrine? Can you find a trace of them in the vast and mysterious subterranean archives of the Vatican in Rome? The answer is NO! Nowhere has any man been able to discover a single word that Jesus wrote!

Who, then, wrote the Christian Gospels? And when were they written? By some historian after the death of Christ? Or are these Gospels merely myths and legends handed down to us from a civilization that existed long before the time of Christ?

At last you can get the FACTS about Christ and the Christian Church in a startling new book just off the press called "A Shield Has Two Sides" written by the eminent author, scholar and historian Wallace Stockwell.

Here is a book for people who are not afraid to look reality in the face! A book for men and women who refuse to wear mental blinders! It reveals TRUTHS about the Christian Church of today—both Catholic and Protestant—that will shock many. For it pulls no punches and presents facts known to but few.

"A Shield Has Two Sides" is not sold through bookstores for reasons you will readily understand after you have read the first few pages. But the Publishers will gladly send a copy on approval to any sincere seeker of knowledge, over 21, who seeks unbiased facts about the Christian Church and how it functions today. Dramatic illustrations. Send only $1.00 in full payment.

Read "A Shield Has Two Sides" Without Risking a Single Penny

If you are not "squeamish"—if you can stand frank statement of fact without being upset—then mail the coupon below with $1.00 and "A Shield Has Two Sides" will be mailed to you at once. Read the book for 5 days. Then if you are dissatisfied in any way simply return the book and we will refund your dollar. Act at once as the Second Edition is limited.

A SHIELD HAS TWO SIDES

LIGHT on the DARK SIDE of the SHIELD

MAIL THIS TODAY

Allace Publishing Co., P. O. Box 100 Mount Prospect, Illinois, Dept. 8

Send "A Shield Has Two Sides" as offered. I enclose $1.00 and postpaid. If I am not delighted with this book I will return it within 5 days and you will refund my $1.00

Name

Street or R.F.D.

City Zone State

quisition of the House of Blair, he decided to place Elisha Walker in charge of his gigantic financial empire. Within a year Walker began to liquidate the vast holdings which Giannini had acquired, presumably at the bidding of "the corner" (J. P. Morgan and Company). But neither Walker nor his colleagues had reckoned with Giannini's fighting qualities. Returning secretly from Europe, A. P. won a sensational fight with Walker for proxies and regained control of the Bank of America empire. It was a great personal triumph; it was also an important victory for Western industry, for it freed California to some extent from Eastern financial domination. It is also apparent that Giannini has been a "progressive" banker in the sense that he has never been infatuated with tradition; that he has had the imagination to back what have appeared to be risky ventures—such, for example, as the motion picture industry—and that the branch-banking idea, in which he was so successful a pioneer, has been "progressive" in terms of operating efficiency and banking service.

Having admitted as much, we still face the question: to what extent is a Western monopolist any different from an Eastern monopolist? To be sure, Giannini has fought the battle of the West, that is, of large-scale Western agriculture, business, and industry. But has it made any difference to the 250,000 agricultural workers in California that Giannini won this battle? In 1936 California Lands, Inc., a subsidiary of Transamerica Corporation (Bank of America), boasted that it had developed into "the largest diversified farming organization in the world, owning and operating approximately 600,000 acres of land." In that year the company harvested seventeen major crops totaling 4,121 carloads of produce. "These crops," crowed the company, "placed in one continuous train would take 56 engines, each pulling 74 cars, a train crew of 336 men, and would stretch out for over 36 miles." On October 31, 1939, the company owned 1,718 farms totaling 395,000 acres and valued at $25,000,000, and its income from farm operations was $2,511,643. Nor do these figures include farm mortgages held by the Bank of America on 7,398 farms, totaling 1,023,000 acres, mortgages representing an indebtedness of $40,340,000. Needless to say, these figures are not garnered from Dana's book, they come from the files of the La Follette committee investigations. Nor does Mr. Dana so much as mention the Associated Farmers of California, an organization with whose formation the Bank of America had much to do.

On the subject of his hero's social and political views Mr. Dana is a little less than frank. A. P., he writes, has "a deep and abiding American contempt" for totalitarian practices. Perhaps he has today, in 1947; but there was a time when he extolled Mussolini to the skies as "the Sun God of the Italian people." Nor was his "contempt" for fascism so abiding as to preclude important financial backing for Italian fascism through the Banca d'America e d'Italia. Mr. Dana's infatuation for Amadeo Peter has another rather curious aspect. For example, he devotes several pages to proving that A. P. is not anti-Semitic. Has the great man been accused of being anti-Semitic? If so, by whom? on what evidence? In the absence of some such explanation, the reader can only conclude that Mr. Dana protests too much.

Apart from the social consequences of his career, the great A. P. is obviously an attractive individual: noisy, frank, full of bounce and vigor; a remarkable combination of Italian showmanship and California breeziness. Many things he may be, but he is not a stuffed shirt. On the eve of the 1932 Presidential campaign Herbert Hoover telephoned to ask for his support. Giannini declined. "Was that really the President you were talking to?" he was asked. "Oh, no," he replied. "I was just chatting with a political tumbleweed caught in a high wind."

CAREY MC WILLIAMS

Haldane with Left Angles

SCIENCE ADVANCES. By J. B. S. Haldane. The Macmillan Company. $3.

HALDANE knows more about most things than most people. These simple essays, delightfully written, were published in large measure in the Daily Worker in Great Britain, and they deal with men, animals, plants, physiology, evolution, medicine, hygiene, inventions, Soviet and Nazi science. Haldane knows his facts, but since he is a Communist, the facts have always to be explained according to "dialectical materialism."

In his essay on Marx Haldane tells us that Newton's work was possible because "people needed exact knowledge of the movements of the stars for navigation and of cannon balls for war." Darwin could make his generalizations because "the exploitation of colonies had disclosed the distribution of living animals and plants through the world." Since "material systems develop and perish according to dialectical principles," Engels foresaw that chemical atoms could be subdivided. Far be it from me to deny that the world around us is a vital factor in influencing human actions. Long before Marx was born, Shakespeare was described as "a product of his time." But having described Shakespeare thus, have you also described his genius? Were Newton and Darwin merely the products of their times? Did they not also, so to speak, modify the times in which they lived? Is it merely the environment which rules the world? Is it not rather a matter of environment and heredity acting and reacting one against the other? Was Einstein's work supplementing Newton "possible" only because "exact knowledge" was needed for the development of the atomic bomb?

We are told that half a century ago almost everyone—except the dialectical materialists—believed that the elements were created by God or had existed forever. We are also told that every teacher "even slightly influenced by Marxism" can show that human progress is dependent on technological improvements. But why is it necessary to be even slightly influenced to explain the more or less obvious? According to Haldane, we owe to Lenin the distinction of prophesying that the electron is probably not the simplest piece of matter. But Mr. Haldane, several hundred thousand other people prophesied that too!

Haldane's chapter on Genetics in the Soviet Union places him in an awkward position. How is he to evaluate the dispute centering in Lysenko's attack on genetics in general and Vavilov in particular—the Vavilov who is among the foremost geneticist in Russia? "I am convinced," writes Haldane, "that he [Lysenko] went too far." Here we find Haldane the geneticist contending with the follower of "dialectical materialism." For once the geneticist wins.

Vavilov has been silenced. Several other Russian geneticists managed to escape the country to get jobs abroad. "But," writes Haldane, "several good British geneticists have recently lost their posts, one for marrying a Chinese wife, another for trying to expose corruption in an institute, and a third for disproving one of his professor's pet theories." But surely this merely shows, according to his own evidence, that the British are just as bad as the Russians, not that the Russians are so much better than the British.

The chapters on Nazi science—let's call it Nazi pathology—are excellent. Blood and soil, the race theory, and experiments on human beings are treated as the ebullitions of deranged minds.

If the reader is ready to dismiss the constant side excursions into communism as relatively unimportant, he will find Haldane's book all that one would anticipate from a brilliant mind and an effective writer.

BENJAMIN HARROW

Answer to Ingersoll?

OPERATION VICTORY. By Major General Sir Frances de Guingand. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

MONTGOMERY'S Chief of Staff, Major General De Guingand, is the first British officer of high rank to offer an account of the war and its strategy. "Operation Victory" is a lucid, easily read book, not at all brass hat and modestly critical of operations and personalities. The author makes little reference to the larger political aspects of the war, and for the greater part he accepts the over-all strategy that was decided upon in London. However, he always believed that the Greek adventure was a total mistake, undertaken for political reasons, one of which was the government's fear that Britain would lose further credit with the United States if no aid were offered to Athens. The projected campaign "had no military advantage," and Sir Francis was distressed to note that his soberly calculated figures were enthusiastically inflated by the British mission, which apparently persuaded the Greeks to resist the Nazi invasion. There is an excellent chapter on Montgomery, for whom Sir Francis has a great but not dazzled admiration. Better in set battles than in a fluid situation, the Field Marshal had all the qualities required to lead the British armies in their lonely predicament. He was the military counterpart of Churchill. His confidence, or egotism, was of untold value to men who were beginning to lose faith in their leaders.

Americans will naturally read "Operation Victory" with Mr. Ingersoll's criticism of Montgomery and the British strategy in mind. There is no reference to the debates over the second front in this book. One may assume that General Guingand was orthodox in the British sense, though to judge by his views on the Soviet-German pact—as set down in 1940—he was not unsympathetic to the Russian demand, made in July, 1939, for a free hand in the Baltic countries and Poland. In dealing with the battle for Caen and the Falaise thrust the author replies directly to Mr. Ingersoll. His defense of his superior in the Caen affair is, I think, somewhat weak, but he shows that the American writer underrated both the importance of the Falaise breakthrough and the German resistance. Sir Francis did not approve of Montgomery's original proposal for a narrow breakthrough into Germany. He sees neither weakness nor impropriety in his superior's conduct of operations during the Battle of the Bulge. If Montgomery did not throw in his reserves when American critics thought he should have done so, he had good reasons. The German objectives were Liège, Brussels, and Antwerp, not a general breakthrough into France. Montgomery therefore kept his reserves in hand to meet the expected thrust.

Sir Francis has a very high esteem for the generalship of Patton and Bradley but offers no extensive discussion of major "if's" such as whether the war could have been ended in 1944 had the paramount effort been made on the right wing, as Bradley urged. There is nothing polemical about his replies to American critics, and the temper of his writing throughout is that of a professional soldier who believes that every nation has its own necessary strategy.

RALPH BATES

The Mystical Tradition in Judaism

MAJOR TRENDS IN JEWISH MYSTICISM. By Gershom G. Scholem. Schocken Books. $5.50.

MORE than one eminent Jewish scholar has hailed this volume as a "classic of Jewish literature." A Christian may be permitted to add his tribute by recognizing it as a major classic in the history of mysticism.

The biography of the writer and of his book supplies an illuminating and suggestive background for an appreciation of the book itself. Dr. Scholem was born in Berlin and has found refuge in Jerusalem, where he is now professor of Jewish mysticism in the Hebrew University. The material here gathered together was first offered as lectures at the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York and first published in Jerusalem in May, 1941; it is now reissued in an admirably printed and annotated American edition by Schocken Books.

"If the great task of Jewish scholarship in our generation, the task of re-writing Jewish history with a deeper understanding of the interplay of religious, political, and social forces, is to be successfully carried out, there is urgent need for a new elucidation of the function which Jewish mysticism has had at varying periods, of its ideals, and of its approach to the various problems arising from the actual conditions at such times." The motives of the author and certain of his presuppositions

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIANS

ATTENTION!

Hear ERVIN

NYIREGYHAZI

*Famous Piano Virtuoso in a Concert Featuring Favorites
by Grieg, Liszt and Chopin*

SAT., SEPT. 27, 1947—8:30 P.M.
STUDIO "A"—6000 SUNSET BLVD.

HOLLYWOOD, CALIFORNIA

Admission by Contribution of $1.50 or More Per Person—Send for Tickets Today

INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY COMMITTEE

2984 W. 8 St., L.A.5 or call Drexel 2802

are thus set forth in his Preface. The arduous and ambitious assignment which he has essayed is brilliantly discharged; his objectives are abundantly fulfilled.

Dr. Scholem brings to his task unequaled gifts. A linguist with competence in the varied tongues in which his sources are imbedded, a research scholar who unites sympathetic understanding with penetrating insight, and insight with balanced critical judgment, he holds his voluminous materials under ready and confident command, and presents their often forbidding complexities and obscurities with never-failing lucidity and no little literary charm.

The work opens with a brilliant essay on General Characteristics of Jewish Mysticism, one of the most masterly discussions of the characteristic features of mystical apprehension, of the distinctions and interrelations of mythology, religion, and mysticism, cosmogony and eschatology, allegory and symbolism, philosophy and prayer, and of the comparison and contrast between Jewish and Christian mysticism, known to this reviewer within the compass of a single chapter. This introductory lecture alone will richly repay the casual reader who may not have interest or time for the detailed historical exposition which follows.

"The first phase" of the two-millennia development is discovered to have had its sources in the first century of the Christian era, and in Palestine. (To Christians, it is of special interest that this neglected aspect of Judaism should have taken its rise in the same land and at the same time as their own offspring of Judaism.) This first period carries the student through ten centuries, with special attention to theological presuppositions and to the parallel emergence of gnosticism. "Its subject is never man, be he even a saint. . . . Its gaze is fixed on God and his aura. . . . All its originality is on the ecstatic side, while the moral aspect is starved" One could wish that more generous space had been allocated to this first millennium with more detailed delineation of successive epochs.

The heart of the volume, four of its nine chapters, deals with the medieval period, first the rise of Hasidism in Germany contemporary with St. Francis of Assisi, and then the longer, richer, and more esoteric pilgrimage of Spanish Kabbalism to the mass expulsion of the Jews from Spain in the year of Columbus's great discovery. Three concluding lectures summarizing respectively the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries deal with Isaac Luria and his followers, with Sabbatianism, and with the Hasidism of Poland as the most recent significant expression of this many-sided impulse within Jewish piety—"three stages of the same process."

Dr. Scholem's treatment throughout is no less rich in its penetration to the deeper springs of the successive phases, often more striking in their contrasts than in their similarities, than in its detailed exposition of the phenomena themselves. Moreover, his purview is in no sense restricted to the faith of his own people; some of the most illuminating passages point up kinships and contrasts with other types of mysticism, especially Christian. The struggle with intolerant rabbinical orthodoxy is a tragic but not unexpected motif.

One would suppose that this work would be "required reading" for all serious Jewish students of their own tradition. Christians will discover themselves graciously introduced to phases of a sister faith of which they must confess almost total ignorance. Finally, all who are alive, whether sympathetically or not, to the never-quelled longing of the human spirit for direct experience of the Divine will find here a mine of invaluable testimony, presented with a sympathy which is all the more attractive because tempered by discerning judgment.

HENRY P. VAN DUSEN

Man's Beginnings

THE ORIGIN OF THINGS. By Julius Lips. A. A. Wyn. $5.

DISCOUNT the publisher's claim that this is "a book to take its place on the standard shelf beside Frazier's [sic] 'Golden Bough'." Neither its matter nor its manner justifies such "hyblurbole." What can reasonably be said is that Dr. Lips, a distinguished anthropologist, has written a good popular account of the beginnings and early evolution of human ideas, institutions, and tools, using this last word in its widest sense. The illustrations by Eva Lips are copious and good. Chapter headings such as Of Hearth and Home and Pots and Pans, Accessories of Allure, Wall Street in the Jungle, Education Without Books, give a good idea both of the scope of the book and its over-journalistic style.

Dr. Lips has gathered facts diligently and organized them well. But some of his generalizations will raise the eyebrows of his fellow-anthropologists. For instance, he attributes female and animal figurines of the Aurignacian period to "a purely aesthetic expression," though most students of the subject agree that the idea of "art for art's sake" was foreign to primitive man; he was concerned with art for magic's sake. Again we find Dr. Lips in a sentimental mood declaring, "Wherever we pay our visit among the primitives, we find a like nearness to the gods and a like peace of mind." Clearly he has yet to visit Ruth Benedict's neurotic Dobuans.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Films

JAMES AGEE

THE GREAT DAWN" is a quasi-biography of the Italian musical prodigy Pierino Gambina, starring Pierino Gambina. Now and then the picture faintly promises to show how a prodigy is really manufactured and sold; and Pierino, a haunted-looking little boy, looks as if under wise direction he could carry whatever they handed him, of that sort. But the promise never pays off, whether because this is a highly "authorized" biography, or because of everybody's genuine affection and admiration for the child, or because this particular prodigy is as lucky in life as he is on film, I don't know. What you get here is a simple little story about a gifted child; his pretty mother, a runaway bourgeoisie; his musician father, who runs away from her; her solid father, who detests "artists"; and an engaging, slap-happy priest, who rather suggests Keenan Wynn and who is chiefly responsible for developing and placing the boy's talent. In many respects the whole business is rather thin, even silly, but there are redeeming features which make the picture, at worst, pleasant to sit through. It is done more like a charade than a would-be work of art or even of professional entertainment, with quite a nice sense of comedy, and with little jets of that free talent and fearless vitality which seem to abound today in Italy. I couldn't be sure, thanks in part either to flaws either in the sound-track or in the theater's equipment, whether Gambina is a good conductor or a madly over-rated one. I am sure that the strings catch fire nicely in one passage in the William Tell Overture, that the well-known Four Notes in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony should not be performed as if they said Fee Fie Fo Fum, and that unless movie people can manage to present pieces of music whole rather than in bloody gobbets, they'd better not try at all.

"The Tawny Pipit" is an English pastoral comedy about bird-lovers, both lay and professional, and what happens to them when, in mid war time, a pair of very rare birds decides to breed in an English pinfold. The English reviewer C. A. Lejeune was rather chilly about this film. I think she was right, and that a good many other Englishmen must agree with her; for what might, with sharper treatment, have been a real beauty of a comedy is blunted by that special simpering affection which some of the English are so ready to feel for themselves. It is an almost unimaginably genteel picture, and if you had, as it were, to sit in the same parlor with it, you would probably suffer a good deal. But at this comfortable distance in blood as well as space I was able, rather to my dismay, to take all this extreme Englishness almost in the spirit in which it was offered. For one thing, the picture is so obviously a labor of love, and the job of a lifetime, for Bernard Miles, an actor who has always seemed to me a particularly nice guy; he not only acts in this—rather badly—but co-wrote and co-directed it, with Charles Saunders. For another, in spite of its profuse cuteness and genteelism, it has a good deal of genuine charm, humor, and sweetness of temper.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

TO CATCH up now on the August records, and to begin with what I thought would be especially interesting, RCA Victor's set (1129; $2.85) of the Suite No. 2 from Prokofiev's music for the ballet "Romeo and Juliet"; it turns out to be an adaptation of the resources of Prokofiev's idiom to the purpose of the action—expertly made, suitable, agreeable to the ear, but, for me at any rate, with no inner life to command interest in it for itself. Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony seems good and is excellently reproduced—though in my review copy the conclusion wavers in pitch.

Stokowski, conducting the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra, produces the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique"

Symphony one would expect: eccentric and wilful in pace, mannered and fussy in phrasing, distorted in shape (Set 1105; $6.85). It is not always clear on the records; and occasional vagaries of balance and volume lead one to suspect that Stokowski did some twiddling of control-knobs.

The materials, plant, and labor that RCA Victor can't waste on any of Schnabel's new H. M. V. recordings, or even on keeping his old ones available, it expends on a four-record set (1133; $4.85) of Glazunov's music for the Ballet "Raymonda," which one tolerates with the dancing but which has no claim to attention without it. The playing of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler is excellent and well reproduced.

Even the two sides of the H. M. V. recording of Schnabel's beautiful performance of Mozart's wonderful Rondo K.511 is something on which RCA Victor can't waste the materials, plant, and labor that it expends on Mozart's inconsequential Adagio and Rondo K.617 for glass harmonica, played on the celesta, not always clearly, by E. Power Biggs with a quartet of excellent winds and strings (11-9570; $1).

Columbia offers Liszt's enjoyable "Mephisto Waltz," played by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set X-281; $3). The performance has a little of Rodzinski's tenseness; but I find this less disturbing than

MOTION PICTURES

MOTION PICTURES

LIZABETH SCOTT
John HODIAK • Burt LANCASTER
in Hal Wallis' Production
"DESERT FURY"
IN TECHNICOLOR
— IN PERSON —
DESI ARNAZ and his Orchestra
featuring DULCINA
Rudy Cardenas—Mexico Juggling Wonder
EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION
MARION HUTTON
Singing Star of Stage and Screen
PARAMOUNT
55¢
TO 1 P. M.
(Tax. incl.)
Mon. to Fri.
Inclusive
NOW
TIMES SQUARE
Midnight
Feature
Nightly

MANHATTAN

ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
88th ST.
81st. Lex. & 3rd
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
23rd ST.

BROOKLYN

BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island

RKO NOW

"GAY AND NOSTALGIC."—N. Y. POST
JUNE HAYER • MARK STEVENS

"I Wonder Who's Kissing Her Now"

IN TECHNICOLOR and William Elliott
Vera Ralston
John Carroll
"Wyoming"

BRONX

CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

QUEENS

ALDEN, Jamaica
MIDWAY
Forest Hills
Kew-Forest
FLUSHING
Kew-Forest
RICH. HILL
ST. LOUIS
Far Rockaway
MANHATTAN
COLONIAL
B'way & 82 St.

"Tense Adventure"—N. Y. Times

ROBT. YOUNG SUSAN HAYWARD
JANE GREER • RITA JOHNSON

"They Won't Believe Me"

— and —
"Woman on the Beach"
JOAN BENNETT • ROBERT RYAN

STAGE PLAY

"A very funny play, brilliantly written, acted and staged."

Garland.
Journal-Amer.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 43rd Street, East of B'way, CH 4-4256
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

- SUBSCRIBE TO THE NATION TODAY! -

"In your mind and your heart, you will go on seeing it again and again!"

My Father's House

PALESTINE'S FIRST FEATURE FILM
with an English-speaking Palestinian cast

Directed by HERBERT KLINE • From the novel by MEYER LEVIN
COOL AMBASSADOR, FORTY-NINTH STREET
West of Broadway

the over-emphatic distortions of Koussevitzky's recorded performance. Its recorded sound is clear but without the luster of Koussevitzky's; and one side of my copy wavers badly in pitch.

On a single disc (72047-D; $1). is the one good performance that Maryla Jonas gave at the one recital I attended—of Schubert's Impromptu Opus 90 No. 3; but on the reverse side are her more characteristic performances—excessively mannered, oscillating between the extremes of loud and soft—of a group of Schubert waltzes. The recorded sound is the best Columbia has achieved with the piano so far.

The English Decca set (ED-30; $7) of Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite offers an excellent performance by Ansermet with the London Philharmonic, reproduced with the depth in space and the rich sonority of the best Ffrr recording. Choice between this and the recent Columbia set of the new version of the suite recorded by Stravinsky is difficult. Stravinsky includes one more excerpt than Ansermet—the pas de deux of the Prince and the Firebird; but Ansermet includes the wonderful transition from the Berceuse to the Finale that Stravinsky omits. As for performance, I prefer the characteristic power and clarity of Stravinsky's which is well reproduced if not with the luster of Ansermet's.

Concord Recordings has issued a set of three black vinylite records with the first five Preludes and Fugues of Book I of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier, played on the harpsichord by Dorothy Lane. I can't report on No. 2, since my copy of the set has instead a repetition of No. 1 (of which, incidentally, I find the Fugue to be an extremely uninteresting piece of music); but Miss Lane plays Nos. 1, 3, and 5 with clarity, grace, and both brilliance and variety of tonal color. In the great Prelude of No. 4, however, her execution of the ornaments destroys rhythmic continuity; and in the great Fugue she does a great deal of pounding that produces thick sonorities in which the counterpoint is not clear. The performances are well reproduced.

International Records has issued Villa-Lobos's String Quartet No. 6 ("Quartetto Brasileiro"), played by the Stuyvesant Quartet. The work is still another example of this composer's appalling fluency in the production of worthless music; the performance is first-rate; its recorded sound is somewhat brash on my wide-range machine, perfectly agreeable on one of limited range; surfaces are not quiet.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

In Defense of C. A. B.

Dear Sirs: Since an article by Dr. Charles A. Siepmann in your issue of July 5 (Radio: Tool of Reactionaries) has been distributed to the Canadian press, I hope you will in fairness permit us to correct as briefly as possible certain misapprehensions of fact appearing in it.

The Canadian Association of Broadcasters' brief before the parliamentary committee took pains to point out the close constitutional relationship between the government-owned Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the "government of the day"—that is, the "executive" arm of government. The situation is similar to what would exist if the FCC not only possessed its present powers over stations but also operated stations, had a network monopoly with power to add non-government stations to that network, had power to censor all material broadcast, including news, and to set network rates for stations, told stations from what sources they might draw news, possessed power to make all stations carry such material as it might dictate, could expropriate the stations at any time, and was responsible to the President, not to Congress.

The brief does not attack or seek to discredit the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Before previous parliamentary committees C. A. B. has made it clear that the independent stations have no quarrel with the concept of the nationally owned broadcasting system in Canada. Our case is simply and solely (a) that such a system should be as directly as possible responsible to Parliament rather than the executive arm, and (b) that both it and the independent (non-government) stations should be licensed and regulated by an impartial semi-judicial tribunal, removable only (as in the case of Canadian judges) by joint address of Parliament, not by whim of the executive arm, such body to hold meetings and render decisions open to the press and public. . . .

The cost of our advertising campaign, as pointed out to the parliamentary committee, came to about the same in a ten-year period as the published cost of one C. B. C. station's own promotion campaign in a six-month period. There are no "high-powered public-relations concerns," to use Dr. Siepmann's phrase, connected with, paid by, or employed by this association, nor were any such utilized in any way to put our case before Parliament and the public, this year or at any time. . . .

The public-opinion poll to which Dr. Siepmann refers did not purport to prove that "the majority of Canadians support a system of commercial enterprise." It showed the preference of Canadians with respect to various types of businesses and their ownership. In some cases government ownership was preferred; in others, private ownership. The survey firm presented to the Parliamentary Radio Committee only that section of the poll which dealt with radio, and it showed that Canadians were generally not in favor of a government system of radio.

The independent stations of Canada did not and do not seek "expanded activity through the creation of a Canadian FCC." It is difficult to see how a Canadian FCC would permit such expanded activity.*

The C. A. B. brief asks for (a) legal right to freedom of speech on the air in Canada and (b) safeguarding of that and other rights by means of a licensing and regulatory body as far removed as practicable from political pressures. The C. B. C. would continue as a broadcasting body, but would not possess licensing or regulatory power over its non-government competitors. . . .

Dr. Siepmann charges that outlying areas would not receive good service from independent broadcasters. We can name dozens and dozens of areas now served by independent stations and only by them. The ten C. B. C. outlets are located in or near the largest metropolitan centers of Canada. Most of the 103 independent stations serve small communities, some extremely remote.

Independent radio in Canada has a first-class record of public service—a fact admitted even by most of its enemies. If it didn't have, the fault would lie as much with the C. B. C. as with the independent stations. The C. B. C. has complete network control; it has power to take into account the public-service record of stations when recommending license renewals. United States programs are now brought into Canada by C. B. C. and fed to its networks. It is from this source that the C. B. C. derives a substantial portion of its revenue. It is doubtful whether the government enterprise could carry on at all without this aid from non-government United States networks. Only four independent stations, all on or very near the border, bring in and broadcast United States programs.

* But that it would be a paradox Dr. Siepmann took some pains to establish.—EDITORS THE NATION.

French-speaking Canadians get satisfactory service from independent stations; did so long before the C. B. C. ever existed. There are three C. B. C. French-language stations, seventeen independent French-language stations.

It should be pointed out, too, that the C. B. C. itself possesses all the international clear channels in Canada; has monopoly on the high power—independent stations are limited, in the main, to five kilowatt, and only 3 out of 103 have power above that. They are almost all limited to Class III channels or those of lower preference.

H. S. DAWSON, Manager,
Canadian Association of Broadcasters
Toronto, September 18

[Mr. Dawson's letter was submitted to Dr. Siepmann for a possible reply. Dr. Siepmann's answer was that he believed his article spoke for itself, and he did not care to make further comment. —EDITORS THE NATION.]

[SPECIAL NOTICE! This is the fourth of six puzzles constructed by Mr. Y in competition with Mr. X. At the end of the competition, The Nation's regular crossword puzzle man will be selected on the basis of letters sent in by puzzle-solving readers.]

How to Fix Things

Dear Sirs: A large number of labor leaders have been appearing before Congressional committees and have expressed their opinion regarding proposed labor laws that the committees are pretending to consider—as a concession to what is humorously called public opinion. Inasmuch as I am very greatly interested in labor laws, I beg for a small amount of space in your valuable publication to give a little kindly advice to those dear labor leaders.

In your testimony regarding proposed labor laws, with practical unanimity you declared that the proposed laws would destroy labor unions. Well, bless your dear stupid souls, that is what the laws are intended to do, and when you assure the committee that the laws, as written, will accomplish their intended purpose,

INSTRUCTORS!

Take Advantage of the Nation's Special Class Room Rate—

30¢ Monthly per Student for orders of ten or more copies to be sent to address —

Desk copy is supplied free.

Address your order to
The NATION

20 VESEY STREET • NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

ACROSS

- 1 A slab of flesh. (5)
- 6 Gold on brass. (5)
- 9 Back to greeting a jealous lover? (7)
- 10 Not a mere man. (5)
- 11 He's O. K. for a pilot. (5)
- 12 Passenger vehicle and a truck make one, of course. (7)
- 16 Worn at back, with diminishing returns. (6)
- 19 Tackled with cogs? (6)
- 22 Makes quite a fuss with the food supply. (9)
- 23 Is the weather forecast negative in one direction? (4)
- 24 Since I precede, I'm in Shakespeare. (4)
- 25 This sounds a mess! (5, 4)
- 26 There must be a use for him! (4)
- 27 It's easy to see I hurried out of here! (4)
- 28 Nice standard, but a nicer riot. (9)
- 31 Thick with jam? (6)
- 33 In short, 30 notices these nymphs. (6)
- 36 Not the chewing gum, but next thing to it. (7)
- 39 Socks a minor prophet. (5)
- 40 Usually attributed to Gus. (5)
- 41 Did such a song make a wreck out of Ulysses? (7)
- 42 Sometimes cornered in the pit. (5)
- 43 As well known a lake as any in Africa. (5)

DOWN

- 1 You'll have to do this before finishing this puzzle. (5)
- 2 Seven the hard way smooths off the rough spots. (5)
- 3 Was the army this to win? (6)
- 4 Dark woman, not for light work. (4)
- 5 He is almost a serf! (4)
- 6 Carried nothing to this place? (6)

- 7 A bit of this sounds divine! (5)
- 8 Didn't stand in dread of anything. (5)
- 13 Not found in equilateral triangles? (9)
- 14 Pretty low-down for a cellar? (9)
- 15 Makes quite a commotion. (9)
- 17 Remember the Maine, as an opposite state. (7)
- 18 Good price for a buck-saw, to show where to use it. (7)
- 20 Article I string along with, just for color. (7)
- 21 Poetically a good place to be on April Fool's day. (7)
- 29 To edit part of a Russian Play? (6)
- 30 One out of many under Washington. (6)
- 31 An afterthought, and not "Geel", for an expletive. (5)
- 32 In America stern, in India strict. (5)
- 34 Where Selassie's ancestors chased Mussos. (5)
- 35 Did Uncle get his degree at a School for the Dance? (5)
- 37 Green river. (4)
- 38 A military policeman is around for these mischief-makers. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 229

ACROSS:—1 CRABBED; 5 ARCHWAY; 9 FORBEAR; 10 CRANIAL; 11 ELATE; 13 NORTHWEST; 14 EIRE; 15 STEWARD; 18 EWE; 20 PIE; 21 DEvised; 23 IBIS; 26 CONSENSUS; 28 CHEER; 29 TRIBUTE; 30 SUPPORT; 31 REELECT; 32 SILICON.

DOWN:—1 CUFFED; 2 ABROAD; 3 BREWERIES; 4 DERANGE; 5 ACCORDS; 6 CRASH; 7 WHITECAP; 8 YULETIDE; 13 OWE; 16 EPISCOPAL; 17 RIP; 18 EDUCATOR; 19 EVENTIDE; 22 DESERT; 23 INSISTS; 24 HEROIC; 25 BRITON; 27 ELUDE.

the committee is encouraged to urge their passage.

The Republicans, as political agents for the "economic royalists," have been seeking to abolish labor laws ever since they were placed on the statute books, but this is the first opportunity they have had to accomplish their purpose and they propose to take full advantage of that opportunity. If you had assured the committee that the laws as written would strengthen unions, they would have made haste to rewrite them. The "economic royalists" and job owners have but one purpose—to make private profits—and the members of your unions are mere tools or accessories to the iron tools that they employ in the profit-making process. All tools, including men, require expense of maintenance: so much for oil and repairs for iron tools, so much feed for mules, and so much wages for hired hands as tools. By repealing or rewriting labor laws, Congressional stooges of the job owners hope to reduce the expense of maintenance for the human tools.

Of course, if you had enough sense to pour sand down a rat hole, you would advise your readers to take possession of the iron tools they have made and operate them for their own wages instead of for profits that are squandered at Palm Beach and similar resorts. That would abolish strikes, unemployment, and poverty and elevate your readers from tools to human beings.

FRANK SIMPSON

San Diego, September 17

Love That War!

Dear Sir: The naming of the new political party in California, Independent Progressive, lacks punch, zing, conviction, and recruiting force. Apart from its length and the musty smell of the library, it has too much "for" in it and not enough "agin."

Americans are born "aginers." They were agin King George. They were agin slavery. They were anti-federalists and they were abolitionists.

There's a lot to be agin these days. High prices. Trend toward atomic war. Taft-Hartley Act. How to focus, how to funnel the "agin" feeling?

Fred Wakeman's book, "The Hucksters," and the movie have shown the American people for the first time the arrogance, the swinishness, the tyranny of big business.

Why not an Anti-Huckster Party with a slogan, "Throw the hucksters out!"

Such a party has a tremendous job. It has to show how the hucksters smashed OPA and rent control, how the hucksters killed the housing act, how the hucksters put over the Taft-Hartley law.

The relationship between hucksters and fascism has to be revealed. It was the National Association of Steel and Chemical Hucksters in Germany who put Hitler in. It was the Federazione of Hucksters in Italy who put Mussolini in. It was the Honorable Hucksters Society in Japan that invented the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere.

If the Honorable Hucksters Society in Japan and the National Association of Hucksters in Germany seem remote to the average American, let him study the boards of directors of German and Japanese companies prior to World War II. He will find many famous American hucksters on the boards—and they were enjoying themselves and getting profits out of war with China and the concentration camps in Germany.

The German and Japanese hucksters have been cut down to size but their American pals are swarming all over Washington, passing laws, setting national policy, sabotaging the U. N.

Love that soft soap! Love that soap made out of children's bodies! Love that war! Or throw the hucksters out!

NORMAN BURNSIDE

New York, September 15

Requests Bourne Letters

Dear Sirs: Alyse Gregory, widow of Llewelyn Powys and formerly managing editor of the Dial, now living in England, is writing a book on Randolph Bourne. She asks that those who have letters from him send them to me at 282 West Forty-second Street, New York. I will have them copied and promptly returned.

AGNES DE LIMA

New York, September 10

CONTRIBUTORS

HELEN M. LYND is the author of "England in the Eighteen-Eighties: Toward a Social Basis for Freedom."

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is the author of several books of poetry, of which the most recent is "The Summer Landscape."

BENJAMIN HARROW is professor of biochemistry at the College of the City of New York.

HENRY P. VAN DUSEN is the president of Union Theological Seminary.

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

The NATION

☐ with Harper's Magazine . . . $8.50 You Save $2.50

☐ with Consumers Union . . . $9.75 You Save $1.25

☐ with Harper's Magazine
and Consumers Union . $12.25 You Save $3.75

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ 1 Year $6 ☐ 2 Years $10 ☐ 3 Years $14

☐ SERVICEMEN'S RATE $4 A YEAR

Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed.

☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____

STATE _____

9-27-47

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 165

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • OCTOBER 4, 1947

NUMBER 14

The Shape of Things

MR. TRUMAN'S APPEAL FOR LESS WASTE OF food has now been supplemented by the Harriman committee's suggestion of "self-rationing" of meat, butter, and eggs. Neither proposal measures up to the problem of balancing the world's food budget. Cold statistics in the report of the Cabinet food committee, issued last week, show how desperately serious that problem has become following the partial failure of the corn crop in this country. Although bad harvests in Europe mean greater need than ever, the committee feels unable to recommend the export of more than 470,000,000 bushels of grain in 1947-48—20 per cent less than last year's shipments. Yet, even if other surplus areas expand exports as much as the committee hopes, the gap between available supplies and minimum needs of the food-deficit countries will still be 4,500,000 tons in terms of grain alone. Just about double that amount of wheat, it is estimated, will be fed to animals in this country during the next twelve months. As long as the American public is prepared to pay present prices and maintain its consumption of meat at a level far above the pre-war average, farmers will find it profitable to fatten their beasts on wheat instead of selling it for export. Something like ten pounds of grain—enough to keep a European alive for over a week—is required to "make" a pound of steak or pork chops. If facts like these are sufficiently publicized, many people may be expected to cut down consumption of such foods. Voluntary action of this kind will be all to the good. But we doubt very much whether even the reduced export program advocated by the Cabinet committee will be achieved unless more stringent measures are taken to keep bread grains out of the feeding troughs.

✱

SENATOR TAFT'S FOREIGN-POLICY SPEECH was a remarkably eclectic performance, having in it a fair amount of Hoover, a bit of Wallace, and even a dash of Vishinsky, but with enough in contradiction to all these to leave it essentially a Taft product. Like Hoover, the Senator thinks we have been much too harsh on the Germans, who, within liberal bounds, should be freed at once to develop their economy, with no further denazification nonsense on our part. He believes that "our one justification" for entering the war was the belief that "German success would ultimately threaten our own freedom," but "we face a condition in the world today not much less threatening than existed in 1940." The menace does not come from the Soviet Union, as one might have anticipated. Taft does not believe that "Russia intends, or desires, a conquest by force of arms of additional territory" or that it would "give serious consideration" to a fighting war. The threat comes from communism, from which "we face a curious form of aggression." And how are we to combat it? Not economically. Loans, limited to specific countries and for specific purposes—and to our specific advantage—might be "helpful," but "let us not overestimate the power of money." Neither do we meet the threat by military power. Taft makes a sly dig at potential rival Eisenhower, suggesting in Wallace-like language that our military establishment is already inflated "unless we want to fight the Russian millions in their own backyard." As for the United Nations approach, Taft is for it, but he holds with Vishinsky that abandoning the veto is out of the question. Moreover, "the battle of ideologies" must be fought out "in each country by the people of that country." In the end, then, the Taft foreign policy is twofold: "maintenance of peace so long as conditions do not threaten" our own country, and a showdown on communism here at home, with special attention to the New Dealers, who have been trying "to move our system well over toward that of Russia."

✱

THE FIRST OFFICIAL COMMUNIQUE OF THE Spanish underground, noted briefly in American papers last week, furnishes new evidence that the Resistance movement is gaining impetus in Spain. It spoke of an "engagement with Franco forces in the M. [Madrid] zone in which the latter suffered casualties." According to the full text, this was "the first open battle with government troops." The document was signed by the "Chief of Staff of the Madrid Zone" and ended with an appeal to the United Nations to consider the incident as a new phase in the "fight of the Spanish people to overthrow Franco's fascist tyranny." The Spanish question is again on the agenda of the General Assembly. But should the U. N. fail to take the necessary diplomatic and economic steps to end the Franco dictatorship, the

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things	325
A Moment of Courage	327
Watch Mr. Marshall by Freda Kirchwey	328

ARTICLES

Politics and People by Robert Bendiner	330
Fair and Cooler by J. King Gordon	331
Cartoon: World Serious by Ezekiel Schloss	332
Hunger and Politics in Italy by Mario Rossi	333
The Gary School Strike by Paul L. Klein	335
LaGuardia by Joseph Lilly	336
Everybody's Business: Gambling in Food by Keith Hutchison	338
Marshall Plan vs. Socialism by Del Vayo	339
In the Wind	340

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Peace Without Victory by Ralph Bates	341
The Late Summer. A Poem by Rolphe Humphries	341
Is America Unique? by Keith Hutchison	342
The Mexican Folk by Virginia Mushnun	345
Transatlantic Kitch by Irving Howe	348

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSS WORD PUZZLE No. 231 by Mr. Y	351
---	-----

SUPPLEMENT

Palestine Politics and the Middle East:
An Introduction	353
Power Politics Spells War by Harold J. Laski	355
What Price Arab Oil? by I. F. Stone	358
The Land and the People by W. C. Lowdermilk	360
Egypt's Bid for Power by Maurice Ferro	362
Inside Arab Politics by J. L. Teller	364

Editor: Freda Kirchwey

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo Literary Editor: Margaret Marshall

Associate Editor: Robert Bendiner

Financial Editor: Keith Hutchison

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

J. King Gordon, Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams
Aylmer Vallance, Maxwell S. Stewart, Ralph Bates

Assistant Editor: Jerry Tallmer Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz

Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting

Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Schultz

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1947, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One Year $8; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

Spanish masses are clearly determined to continue the fight alone. At the very moment the Army of Liberation opened fire in the M. zone, the surprising announcement came from London that Foreign Secretary Bevin had agreed to receive an anti-Franco leader. But the surprise was short-lived, for the leader turned out to be Indalecio Prieto. A few weeks ago, Señor Prieto issued a manifesto in which he declared "with deep regret in my heart, I lay down the Republican flag." He defended his cynical renunciation of the Republic on the ground that it would open the way for a government that might win support in London and Washington, and take its place in the Western bloc against Russia. His declaration has aroused a storm of Republican protest that reaches even into his own group; Enrique de Francisco, chairman of the Prieto Socialists, immediately resigned. It will be interesting to see whether Mr. Bevin accepts Prieto's generous offer to sell out the Republic or goes on backing Francisco Franco.

✱

INFLATION IS A THIEF IN THE NIGHT WHO drains the value out of your dollar while you sleep. But the robber can be controlled, even in conditions of scarcity which are supposed to be most favorable to his depredations. The British Information Service recently sent out a report on the cost of living in "Austerity Britain" which is enough to make an American housewife go Socialist. Here are a few prices in American terms:

Beef (British ribs), per lb.	27c
Bread, per 3½-lb. loaf	18c
Butter, per lb.	28c
Eggs, each	3c

According to a mass poll just completed by the Ministry of Food, the average person in Britain today spends only $2.23 for food per week. This figure, in so far as it indicates the scant supply, is pathetic; in so far as it indicates the efficiency with which prices have been kept down, is, to say the least, impressive.

✱

THANKS TO A DETERMINED ARCHBISHOP and to the C. I. O., Negro segregation has received severe jolts in the cities of St. Louis, Missouri, and Gary, Indiana. In both cases, white parents refused to expose their children to the conjured-up dangers of attending school with children of a different color, and, in both cases, organizational discipline was invoked to bring them to their senses. The school strike in Gary was opposed by church groups and others, as Paul Klein points out in his article on page 335, but it was the threat of United Steelworkers union leaders to take action against participating members that broke the back of the movement. Today, the city's mayor, Joseph E. Finerty, boasts that Gary, with a population one-fifth Negro, "does not offer partial citizenship to anyone." The St. Louis affair was confined to Catholics, a number of whom were incensed at a parochial ruling admitting Negro children to diocesan high schools. When these practicing Catholics but non-practicing Christians threatened to enforce their racist ideas by court injunction, Archbishop Joseph Ritter countered with a threat of excommunication. The legal approach has now been abandoned and, in its place, an appeal is being made to the Most Reverend Amleto Cicognani, the Apostolic Delegate to the United States. It will be up to him to rule on the Archbishop's insistence on "the equality of every soul before Almighty God." Should he uphold the Archbishop, the State of Missouri might do well to ponder this novel concept in connection with its public schools, which are strictly segregated.

✱

THE SUDDEN AUTUMN CAUGHT A LOT OF women with their skirts down. It also cut short the silly season, but there are a few silly-season items which should be preserved. There was, for instance, the announcement, on July 27, of a rule prohibiting profanity in the army: It was promulgated by General Jacob L. Devers, commander of Army Ground Forces. By this time, we are sure, he has become a four-letter general. . . . On August 27, when the summer had really become unbearable, the press carried an account of the Three-Corner Bathroom, the latest achievement of the American standard of living. "Father shaves while Susie bathes and mother makes up." No faucets—"water temperature is determined by quick and skilful foot work"—sliding mirrors, and ingenious lighting arrangements. In certain quarters, this was taken as further evidence that, given mirrors and quick and skilful footwork, there would be plenty of room for a third party. . . . The weather had turned when the United Nations Assembly opened. But Pravda's reports by the two journalists, Izakov and Zhukov, of Vishinsky's battle with the warmongers sounded, for all the world, like another episode from the summer's most extravagant movie, "The Secret Life of Walterevich Mittyakov."

A Moment for Courage

PIECEMEAL assistance to Europe, said Secretary Marshall at Harvard on June 5, was a palliative rather than a cure for that Continent's economic ills. Therefore, he summoned the European nations to join together in drawing up an integrated recovery program which would make clear what further American aid was required after all possibilities of self-help were exhausted.

This challenge was accepted with alacrity by sixteen Western European powers and, in a remarkably short time, their representatives have agreed unanimously on a program which is a great deal more than "a shopping list." The report just issued in Paris includes a pledge by the participating countries to mobilize all their resources to reach the production targets laid down in the plan and to cooperate in promoting the economic recovery of the whole group. Specifically, they undertake, jointly and severally, to restore cereal production to its pre-war level by 1951, and to increase other major food crops. Coal output is to be raised to one-third more than the current figure, or 30,000,000 tons above the 1938 level. The plan also provides for an impressive expansion of power-generating and oil-refining capacity, for large additions to inland transport facilities, for the restoration of pre-war merchant fleets, and for an increase in steel production of 20 per cent over 1938.

The report recognizes very frankly that the success of the program depends on restoration of internal economic and financial stability. All the participating countries are suffering from some degree of inflation, though the pressure varies widely. Reduction of the money supply by fiscal and other measures, so as to bring it into balance with the supply of goods, is an urgent need, and the participants pledge themselves to seek this objective by ending deficit financing as soon as possible.

This is a necessary first step toward European cooperation. As the report says, "The instability of any country affects the participating countries as a whole, for it hampers and distorts trade and prevents the affected countries from making their full contribution to the recovery program." Mutual help through the interchange of goods is a vital part of the program, and in Paris considerable progress was made toward meshing the production programs of the different countries. In the field of power, a definite plan emerged for the joint exploitation of hydroelectric resources cutting across frontiers. Provision was also made for encouraging standardization of certain kinds of equipment, for the interchange of information on steel programs, and for exploring the possibilities of a freight-car pool. What is much more important, a tentative approach, at least, was made to the creation of a customs union for Western Europe. This is a logical, we might say inevitable,

The dinner of the Nation Associates on October 13, announced in detail on page 340 of this issue, will deal directly with the clash of policies and interests involved in the Palestine debate. A successful gathering will certainly influence the course of events at Lake Success. Your reservation at $50 per person is your investment in the Nation Associates' campaign for a decent solution in Palestine. We urge Nation readers who can afford it to contribute their money and their presence.

step, if Europe is to survive and prosper. As the report says, in quoting the remarkable declaration of the French government: "In the present state of the world, only economic units sufficiently large to have at their disposal an important home market are able to lower the price of industrial and agricultural production sufficiently to insure . . . an improved standard of living for their people." But strong as are the arguments for the formation of a large free-trade area in Europe, there are formidable obstacles to its realization, such as Britain's commitments to the dominions and the unwavering hostility of the U. S. S. R. to any continental integration not under its auspices. It is something, therefore, that a majority of the sixteen nations have agreed to set up a study group to examine further the possibility of a customs union.

Whatever hopes this step may hold for the future, Europe's immediate need is rescue from the threat of economic collapse. The Paris report shows clearly that every phase of the recovery program is dependent on outside aid. It will not be possible to raise production in accordance with the plan without large imports of food and raw materials. As the report puts it, every element in the program "depends upon the others—mining machinery upon steel, steel upon coal, coal upon food—and in turn depends on the availability of supplies from overseas in the right quantities and at the right times."

THE challenge that Marshall made to Europe comes back, therefore, as a challenge to us. After making all possible allowances for self-help and mutual aid, the sixteen countries prove the need of minimum aid from the United States of $19.31 billion over the next four years, plus more than $3 billion in equipment loans from the International Bank. This is a large sum, in relation to anything but the cost of a war, but the objective to be achieved—the salvation of Western Europe from catastrophe—is surely not of trivial importance to the American people.

Unfortunately, timid and unimaginative leadership is tending to obscure the issues involved. The President, fearful of Congress and with division in his Cabinet, greeted the Paris report as interesting but not urgent, although at the very same time he admitted that there were emergency European economic problems that called for immediate action. In fact, these emergency problems are only the most angry symptoms of the larger ills for which the Paris program offers a cure. They should be treated, but let us remember that such treatment is another palliative. The real cure for Europe will start with a firm commitment by Congress to finance the Paris program; that will help to give the patient the confidence which is the first essential for recovery. Grudging doles may satisfy our charitable instincts and help to keep some Europeans from starvation, but they will do nothing to aid European recovery. They will merely mean continuation of the "piecemeal" policies which Secretary Marshall has so rightly deplored.

Watch Mr. Marshall

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

AS THE debate on Palestine develops in the special committee under the chairmanship of Dr. Evatt, I urge Nation readers to keep their eye fixed on the United States delegation. Nothing that has happened in Jerusalem or Whitehall or the corridors of the United Nations alters the basic realities of the case: they are still what they were last spring when Britain first submitted the issue to the General Assembly. "In the end what is decided about Palestine in the U. N.," I wrote in The Nation of April 26, "will depend upon this country. . . . The rise of America's oil empire in the Middle East has shifted the balance of interest and with it the weight of responsibility. Britain is still there, but the United States has moved in too. And the Truman Doctrine, about to find its first overt expression in Greece and Turkey, applies with equal force throughout the Middle East. Greece is a frontier post, but Palestine is a major bastion of the new empire of oil."

From the London angle, Harold Laski analyzes the situation much the same way in the special supplement published with this issue. Mr. Bevin, he says, will never create a "vacuum" in the Middle East; if Britain moves out of Palestine, it will be because the United States is prepared to move in. For American policy at this moment is easy to define: "All over the world the United States is organizing what forces it can manipulate in an all-out effort to prevent the expansion of Russian power. As part of that effort predominance in the Middle East is essential. . . ."

ONLY with this background clearly in mind can one make sense of the day-by-day maneuvers at Lake Success: Britain's announcement of its intention to surrender the Palestine mandate, America's equivocal silence, the Arab threats, the rumors surrounding Mr. Marshall's private talks with Arab leaders and with the Jewish Agency. An atmosphere of ambiguity and unease hangs over the whole question.

The British statement, delivered by the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Creech-Jones, last Friday, was a gift horse whose every tooth is being minutely examined. It is an almost appallingly shrewd and disarming document, luring the skeptic into traps contrived by his own well-grounded suspicions. Britain, said Mr. Creech-Jones, indorses "without reservation" the proposal of the U. N. committee on Palestine that the mandate should be terminated; Britain will not "try to prevent" a settlement recommended by the Assembly; Britain will put such a recommendation into effect if Jews and Arabs agree to it, but otherwise will plan to withdraw its forces from Palestine at an "early" date and "some alternative authority" will have to carry out the Assembly's decision. Arabs and Jews here and in Palestine registered profound disbelief when they heard the news, and several remarked that Britain's refusal to "impose" a solution in Palestine was at least odd in view of its recent policy of force. But a careful reading of the statement inclines me to accept its literal veracity—interpreted in terms of the world situation and the Truman Doctrine.

Why should Britain, broke and short of man-power, go on supporting the economic burden of a big military and administrative establishment? Why should the Labor government continue to suffer the liabilities resulting from police rule and mounting losses among British troops in Palestine? Why should it invite any longer the attacks of its own left wing as well as the hostility of a large section of American opinion? How much better to deposit the unwanted offspring of Tory imperialism on the doorstep of the U. N., secure in the knowledge that, if necessary, it will be adopted and brought up by the United States, which would never expose the founding to the hazards of Arab politics and Soviet ambitions. Read Laski: there will be no political vacuum in the Middle East. As for Britain's offer to implement any recommendation acceptable to both Jews and Arabs, it carries no penalties; no plan yet suggested has satisfied both peoples.

DOES this analysis of the British proposal imply American collaboration? Has the State Department already promised to adopt the Palestine baby as it did the miserable Greek orphan? Have we agreed to pick up all Britain's by-blows in the eastern Mediterranean? If so, one must assume that Mr. Marshall has fully accepted the views of his chief advisers on the Middle East, George Wadsworth and Loy Henderson, who for years have urged the necessity of winning Arab goodwill through the generous use of loans, gifts, royalties, and opposition to a Jewish Palestine.

Friends of the Secretary have insisted that he favored the Palestine policy of the President; that he believed a solution meeting the legitimate demands of the Jews was fully compatible with American security. His guarded comment on the UNSCOP report was attributed to a desire not to bring pressure on the Assembly. Such an attitude would obviously have found warm support in the White House. Mr. Truman's honest and outspoken wish that displaced European Jews be admitted into Palestine is buttressed by his knowledge of the sure political consequences of an anti-Jewish decision. The anger that would boil up among liberal and Jewish groups over a double-cross by the United States is a fact not likely to be ignored by the Democratic high command.

But today one cannot afford to put too much stock in the preferences of statesmen or even the calculations of candidates. Today, foreign policy is determined by the strategy of "containing" Russia; the decision on Palestine will be based, not on precedent or promises, but on such factors as the reality of the Arab threat to American oil supplies and pipe lines, the possibility of holding the area in case of war with Russia (some military experts believe the oil reserves could not be defended), the question of Russian participation in a U. N.-controlled interim government in Palestine. Today, foreign policy is made in the departments of State and Defense, not in the White House; and it is made mostly by military men and bankers whose interest in the political fate of Mr. Truman and the Democratic Party is scarcely noticeable. Even the public reaction to the Palestine policy finally announced will concern them only so far as it is reflected in Congress when the decision comes up for approval and implementation.

Secretary Marshall's discussions with Arabs and Jews were off the record, but this much is known: he was impressed by the chiefs of the five Arab delegations and very short with the representatives of the Jewish Agency. According to rumor—and Drew Pearson—after his meeting with the Arabs, Mr. Marshall persuaded the President that we could not afford to back a policy which would rouse their antagonism.

Is the story true? If it is, if Mr. Truman and Mr. Marshall have decided to reject the UNSCOP report, we may see a fantastic reversal of roles at Lake Success. The British can step to one side and let the Americans, for a change, defend the claims of the Arabs and the sanctity of oil. They can let our team search for a plan that will satisfy the Mufti and Ibn Saud, command a two-thirds' majority in the Assembly, and entice appropriations from a Republican Congress—while Mr. Bevin comfortably prepares to display almost immaculate hands in the House of Commons. Mr. Churchill himself might approve a liquidation of empire accomplished with such finesse.

The story may be false; it is still a rumor. But one would be quicker to reject it if circumstances did not give it plausibility. To yield to Arab threats is to follow the disastrous but forceful logic of the Truman Doctrine on into the Middle East.

Politics and People

BY ROBERT BENDINER

A FRIENDLY correspondent in Mississippi advises me that Northern newspapers can be of great service to the liberals of that state if they will only refrain from attacking John Rankin as he campaigns for the Senate seat of the late Mr. Bilbo. The wisdom of this counsel is further borne out by John N. Popham, a New York Times reporter, who writes from Jackson that a good part of Bilbo's success at the polls in 1946 was due to "a statewide resentment against 'outside meddling.'" Having no wish to meddle, I hope sensitive Mississippians will not regard it as outside interference if I quote—merely as a matter of public interest and without approval or disapproval—an editorial from their own Jackson Daily News. If Mississippians, that paper says, are "to gain and hold the respect to which [they] are entitled," they must "quit sending to the halls of Congress hysterical rabble-rousers and spouting demagogues."

It cannot be assumed, of course, that just because the Daily News is supporting another candidate it had Mr. Rankin in mind when it spoke those harsh words. As evidence to the contrary, we are assured by Mr. Popham and others that Rankin is so genuinely gone on the mystic doctrine of white supremacy that the very depth of his conviction may lose him the nomination. Mr. Popham reports the view of some Mississippians that "many voters, white and Negro, saw a large measure of the mountebank in Mr. Bilbo and never took his rantings too seriously," while Rankin, on the other hand, "is locally credited with bringing to his white-supremacy precepts a 'sincerity and bitterness' that might well repel many voters who went along with Mr. Bilbo."

I am glad to give further publicity to this tribute to Mr. Rankin, though I fear it may cost him votes that he can ill afford. His Tupelo machine lost every courthouse office in the preliminary primary of the last election, but what is that to a man of principle? The American Federation of Labor is working hard in the current campaign, and it has hopes that Rankin will rate no higher than fourth in a field of five, provided Walter Winchell and Drew Pearson can bring themselves to maintain a discreet silence.

Just in passing, and without editorial comment, I hand along the additional information that Paul B. Johnson, Jr., whose father was a New Deal governor of the state, is thinking seriously of joining the growing Mississippi free-for-all. Without campaign funds Johnson ran up a vote of 112,000 in the last governorship primary almost solely on the strength of his eloquent pleas for social change. Like other Mississippians, he is a determined opponent of "Yankee interference," but he specializes in resenting the activities of outside corporations, like the oil, railroad, and power companies that poured money, rather than free advice, into Mississippi in order to elect their veteran lobbyist, Fielding Wright, to the governorship. State pride seemed curiously unaffected by this particular evidence of alien interest.

SOUTHERN politicians are eagerly awaiting the legal assault on what may turn out to be the last resort of pure-white suffrage. Keenly disappointed over the refusal of a South Carolina federal judge to sanction the "private primary," whereby the Democratic Party was to circumvent the law by becoming a private club, the die-hards have been counting hopefully on a relatively new provision of Alabama's state constitution. Enacted in 1946, the clause provides that would-be voters must not only be able to read and write but also to "understand and explain" any section of the Constitution, with the local board of registrars to be the judges of their performance. No test is specified for the registrars, though it is assumed that they will generally be literate and always white.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People will put this "educational qualification" to a legal test in the near future. Should the verdict go against the NAACP, the Talmadge crowd, devoted as always to high educational standards, will press for a similar amendment in Georgia, and the device will certainly be urged throughout the South. If it is ruled out in Alabama, however, there will be nothing left but the poll tax, and that will be under a raking fire in Congress. The President's Committee on Civil Rights will soon bring in a strong recommendation for anti-poll-tax legislation, and the Republicans will be only too glad to push it, to the embarrassment of the Southern Democrats.

Negro leaders have reason to be hopeful. If they have any doubt that minorities make hay in an election year, they have only to look at the promptness with which Dewey, Taft, and Speaker Joe Martin have indorsed the majority report of the U. N.'s Special Committee on Palestine.

HAMILTON FISH is back and MacArthur's got him. The one-time isolationist leader is returning to what he hopes will be public life by way of a magazine entitled Today's World, of which he is editor and publisher. Fish's maiden editorial is an all-out attack on Thomas E. Dewey. Elsewhere in the magazine Dewey is blamed for Fish's downfall in 1944, when the Governor, it is charged, made a "racial issue" of the Congressman's kindly observation that a majority of New York's Jews would vote for Roosevelt. But in the editorial Fish confines himself to the loftier political argument that Dewey, took no part in the recent war, though, as someone has been unkind enough to remark, at least he didn't oppose it.

Fish's sad experience in predicting has not lessened his prophetic urge. His present forecast is that General MacArthur will be nominated by acclamation at the Republican convention and will sweep the country, carrying all but four Southern states. Among the objectives of Today's World is the purpose "to debunk such radical propaganda sheets as . . . The Nation." To this pastime Mr. Fish is surely entitled, turn-about being, as always, fair play.

Fair and Cooler

BY J. KING GORDON

Lake Success, September 26

THE weather has changed decidedly in the past week. The streaming days of New York's hottest summer have given way to bright, crisp autumn, with blue skies and a touch of frost in the air.

This brief meteorological note is obviously an introduction to the comment that in United Nations affairs the week has been much less hectic. The fervid oratory of the plenary session has given way to the more business-like work of the committees. Even Vishinsky's press conference yesterday and Gromyko's slashing attack on United States policy in Greece this afternoon failed to raise temperatures more than a degree or two.

EARLY in the week one incident occurred that deserves to be put on the record. Vishinsky had made an effective speech in the Assembly in favor of keeping the discussion of the revision of the Italian peace treaty off the agenda. He was followed by the delegate from Ethiopia. The ghost of the League of Nations appeared, the dim, shameful memory of the lonely figure of Haile Selassie as he tried in vain to impress that other assembly with the enormity of the Fascist crimes against his people. Now, in the new world organization, delegates listened in silence while a representative of the Ethiopian people carried them back to those early days of the first Fascist empire. He reminded them that Marshal Graziani, who in revenge for an attempted assassination had had shot down in cold blood five thousand innocent men, women, and children, was still unpunished. The Ethiopian delegate suggested that there were certain unpaid debts that should be attended to before any revision of the recently signed Italian treaty.

THE two committees that held the focus of attention were, naturally enough, the ad hoc committee on Palestine and the Political Committee, in which the Greek issue was the first item of business.

The only important contribution this week in the Palestine committee was the flat announcement by Britain's Colonial Secretary, Arthur Creech-Jones, that Britain intended to end the mandate; that it was not prepared to enforce any Assembly decision which was not accepted by both Jews and Arabs; and that, failing such acceptance, Britain was going to make an early withdrawal of its forces. While some skepticism was expressed about the date of British withdrawal, most delegates tended to take the statement at its face value—as meaning that Britain was through. The issue now appears to be squarely in the lap of the U. N., which must not only adopt a plan for Palestine but decide on the means of implementation. The solemn warning of Justice Sandstrom, when he appeared before the ad hoc committee, that in a sense "the Palestine problem is insoluble: no settlement will be entirely satisfactory to both parties," turned more and more eyes in the direction of the United States delegation. Mr. Marshall's statement in his opening speech that the United States "gave great weight" to the report of the special committee lost some of its early significance when it was learned that the Secretary of State had told both Arab and Jewish leaders that the United States had not yet made up its mind. It has been noticeable, by the way, that in several ballots in the Political Committee the Arab states abstained from voting when the Soviet bloc voted no.

WHEN the Greek question came up in the Political Committee, the American delegate, Herschel Johnson, made a strong attack, and on Saturday the Soviet delegate, Gromyko, counter-attacked. Johnson, after recapitulating the developments in this issue before the Security Council, introduced the resolution which was anticipated in the Marshall speech. The blame for the border incidents was placed squarely on Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, and Albania; the three states were called on to stop their aid to the Greek guerrillas; all four states were urged to cooperate to settle their differences. An Assembly committee was also to be established to see that these recommendations were complied with and to summon a special session of the Assembly if the situation made it necessary.

Gromyko's speech and resolution carried the war back into the American camp. It was the fascist character of the Greek government that was responsible for the border incidents and the civil war in Greece. All freedom-loving Greeks were on the side of the guerrillas.

American military and economic aid was being used to repress democracy and bolster reaction. The Greek government should therefore be called upon to desist from provoking the border incidents; the Greeks should be asked to reconcile their differences peacefully with their northern neighbors; all foreign military forces should be withdrawn from Greece so that an independent democratic government might emerge; and an Assembly committee should be sent to Greece to see that economic aid was properly administered.

Most observers, discounting the greater part of the two speeches as propaganda for one side or the other, ask simply: can this power struggle be stabilized? Admitting that on Greece's northern frontier you have the dividing fence between two hostile giants, can some arrangement be arrived at so that they will not forever be getting into each other's hair. The Syrian delegate managed to shoot in a few sentences on Saturday when he said that everybody was getting pretty fed up with mutual recriminations and couldn't they be forgotten.

TO END on a more hopeful note, this morning Oscar Lange, delegate from Poland, made a significant speech which has been given strange play in the press. It is generally being interpreted as primarily an attack on the Marshall plan and on the tendency of the United States to by-pass the United Nations. It is true that Lange made this attack, and might well have taken to heart Bidault's reminder that Russia and the eastern group withdrew voluntarily from the Paris conference and that the sixteen-nation accord represented a scheme of economic cooperation which might apply to all Europe.

But as a matter of fact, Bidault, Masaryk, and Lange all emphasized the same point—that Europe must find the means for rebuilding its economic life as a cooperative undertaking. Lange stressed the fact that Eastern and Western Europe's economies were complementary and that for one section to attempt to rebuild itself without the other was to labor under an almost unbearable handicap. The Polish delegate pointed out—and it took courage to do so—that Poland had trade relations with all European countries except Greece, Spain, and Portugal, and also traded with England, the United States, Canada, Argentina, and other overseas countries. He said that whereas right after liberation Poland's exports to the U. S. S. R. amounted to 93.4 per cent of its total exports, in 1947 they were only 43 per cent.

In spite of the political conflict, economic logic is so strong that East and West are cooperating. Lange's words have found receptive ears, and many delegates are going to press the question: What more can the United Nations do to meet the needs of hungry peoples?

WORLD SERIOUS

Hunger and Politics in Italy

BY MARIO ROSSI

Rome, September

WITH next spring's general elections in mind, much is being said and written in Italy today about Socialist unity. The Action Party executive's recent decision to conclude an agreement with the Italian Socialist Party for the unification of all Socialist forces in a strong independent movement has highlighted a problem that first received attention when De Gasperi excluded the left from the government and chose to rule with the support of the conservative forces in Parliament. The internal situation has been getting worse ever since, for the government has revealed its intention to favor the well-to-do classes at the expense of the workers through an economic policy which encourages inflation and is completely inadequate to provide food and work.

A clear warning that Italy is heading toward inflation is seen in the fact that paper-money circulation increased from 402 billion lire on June 30, 1946, to 584 billion lire on June 30, 1947, and has now reached 640 billion lire. Discussing these figures, the Communist Umanità points out that "they show one thing only—that in spite of all assurances to the contrary and of the inclusion of well-known technicians in a political Cabinet, the financial policy of the government has simply been one of printing more and more money." The newspaper says further, "Certain well-known interests have nothing to fear from inflation, which will help them to strengthen their political grip on the country."

Never before have Italian liberals felt so strongly that direction of the government must be transferred to a party with a workable plan of economic and political reconstruction. The Socialist Party is thought best fitted for this task, being the most democratic of the three mass parties and the most independent of foreign pressure. But while the Socialists are willing to assume political leadership, they could not form a government at the present moment. The Christian Democrats are still the strongest single party in the Constituent Assembly, and with their extremely flexible policy can always manage to get a majority of votes. To take the initiative away from the Christian Democrats, the Socialists will have to gain a victory next spring at the general elections, and this they cannot hope to do if their forces remain divided.

Imperative as unity is, it will not be achieved without strong pressure from the rank and file. When the split took place in January of this year, it was caused by the personal as well as political antagonisms among party leaders. Saragat and his friends alleged that the Socialist Party was subserviently following the Communist line, thus strengthening communism and weakening socialism. They proposed therefore to form a Socialist Party which, though not anti-Communist, would be free from Communist control. Other leaders had very different ideas. They said that the entente between the Socialists and Communists reflected the will of the working masses, and as proof they cited the last congress of the Italian General Confederation of Labor, at which the Italian Socialist Party received 1,037,866 votes as against 98,064 for the secessionists.

THE working people's thirst for unity is entirely understandable. They know that in a struggle with the left all conservative forces will fight as one man. Those forces are very strong. No division of the left can be tolerated so long as the right offers such a threat to the workers and farmers.

It is because they acknowledge the strength of the opposition that the Socialists have agreed to join all other progressive forces in a "popular front" at the elections, especially in those parts of Italy which are politically backward. In regions still terrorized by the "Mafia" and other gangsters serving the political interests of the land barons, citizens giving their votes to the left parties must always expect reprisals. A popular front would be a show of strength that would persuade the southern farmer he could vote for the party of his choice with impunity. The Communist Party has about two million members, representing with their families about one-fourth of the population. The Socialist Party has fewer members but can count on a large independent vote.

"Saragat's big mistake," a Socialist leader representing the right wing told me, "is to forget that ideologies are worthless if there is no force to back them up. In order to be independent of the Communists we should have to be actually stronger than they are. Recent events provide eloquent proof of what I say. At the Socialist Party congress held in Florence in June of last year the maneuvering and double talk of Saragat and his friends so discredited the party that a considerable number of workers, 100,000 according to Avanti, went over to the Communists. After the Rome congress of January, 1947, the split caused us to lose the presidency of the Constituent Assembly to a Communist and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to a Christian Democrat. The conservative and so-called independent press was overjoyed, and so was De Gasperi, who after two successive Cabinet crises was able to eliminate the left from the government. When a vote of confidence was asked for De Gasperi's 'black' government, nineteen out of fifty-four secessionist Socialist deputies abstained. This was clearly an invitation to De Gasperi to renounce the support of the right and form with them a left-of-center Cabinet which would exclude both the Communists and the regular Socialists. Now the Socialist Party has rallied its forces and is stronger than before the split. And what has Saragat achieved, besides strengthening the Communists and conservatives? His faction was refused recognition at the congress of European Socialist parties held in Zurich last June. And at the meeting of the General Confederation of Labor held about the same time he was repudiated by the workers. Nor has he been able to win the support of the middle class, which is not attracted by Marxist socialism.*

MARIO ROSSI is The Nation's correspondent in Italy.

Drawn from life by Ernesto Valentino
Pietro Nenni

This sharp comment by a man who is certainly ideologically nearer to Saragat than to Nenni reveals the bitter feeling between the two factions.

THE Action Party's decision to conclude an agreement with the Socialists should have far-reaching results. "The ice has been broken," Italians say, and the problem of Socialist unity brought into the open, thus forcing the small parties to state their position.* The decision is all the more important because the Action Party has always been held in high esteem for its contribution to the Resistance and for the high moral and intellectual caliber of many of its members. The party's declaration of its intentions said that "the division of Socialist forces has offered the best opportunity to reactionary designs," and that only "a Socialist force which places itself at the center of Italian public life and assumes the direction of all democratic elements can change the present disequilibrium and give democracy a firm basis." The Action Party, with a few reservations, the statement continued, believes that the Italian Socialist Party is the most fitting instrument for the realization of "a vast and efficient Socialist concentration."

The decision was arrived at after many debates and hesitations. In fact, on January 27, shortly after the Socialist split, the Action Party executive proposed to join forces with the secessionists for the creation of an autonomous Italian Socialist Party. Parleys were immediately initiated and had almost accomplished their purpose when a congress of the Action Party on March 31 unanimously decided that no effective socialist policy could be achieved without the cooperation of the old Italian Socialist Party. Finally, after the Socialist Party had received international recognition and shown evidence of solid support among the workers, the Action Party decided to go over to it.

At the coming congress of the Action Party the decision of the executive will find both supporters and opponents. Some will join the Socialists, others Saragat's secessionists; the rank and file may even go over to the Republican Party. But whatever the result, the leaders of the Action Party had sense enough to understand that the time of small parties is over. A small party must either back one of the mass parties nearest to it ideologically or dissolve. Other small parties have quite understandably been disturbed by the precedent established by the Actionists. Their game has been to eat their cake and have it too: to fight the right but not to support the left. Now most of them realize that the moment has come when they must make their choice.

The secessionists, however, confident of popular support at the next elections, remain intransigent. Socialist unity, they agree, is all very well, provided it is formed around their party. "Without last January's split," Saragat recently wrote, "we would have in Italy two Communist parties and no Socialist Party. The struggle for Socialist unity under such conditions would have had no chance of success: under present conditions it can bank on a solid nucleus represented by our party." To which argument Lelio Basso, secretary of the Socialist Party, retorted, "Politically our party represents in Italy the only Socialist force that has roots in the working classes, and without them there is no socialism. Not to understand this, to admit that there might be a Socialist Party dissociated from the working class, means, according to us, not to be Socialists."

The party that is causing so much agitation, the Communist Party, ended a long period of neutrality in the feud between the two Socialist factions when Togliatti, in his last speech, sharply attacked the secessionists. Clearly, the Communists fear the formation of a De Gas-

* A U. P. dispatch from Rome dated September 24 reported that six leftist parties, including the Communists, had agreed to vote against De Gasperi on a confidence motion in the Assembly; since then the right-wing Socialist leader, Saragat, has modified his stand, and in one of the mildest "opposition" speeches ever heard in Italy announced his whole-hearted support of the Marshall plan. The Communists, majority Socialists, Actionists, and Labor Democrats demand representation of the left—including the Communists—in the government.—EDITORS THE NATION.

peri-Saratag government and would oppose it vigorously. Such a government would be anti-Communist, and yet it would be difficult to label it "reactionary." The Communists would also dislike a Socialist Cabinet, because they are in competition with socialism. The perfect formula for them would be a Government of National Union, where many opposing forces would neutralize one another, thus giving the Communists greater power. They know that they have reached the apex of their strength and are now slowly declining.

The Gary School Strike

BY PAUL L. KLEIN

Gary, Indiana

STEEL sets the pattern"—not only in prices but in segregation. In 1906, when a United States Steel engineer laid out Gary, he thoughtfully plotted separate areas for Negroes and whites, and the Gary Land Company, a Steel subsidiary, enforced the policy. Gary now includes among its 130,000 citizens a higher proportionate number of Negroes than any other city north of the Mason and Dixon Line. Most of them were brought in by the steel companies.

Perhaps U. S. Steel fosters dissension between Negro and white workers in order to weaken the union; perhaps it would like the community to be occupied with racial conflicts while it quietly presses for its requested $10,000,000 local tax cut, which will raise the average family's burden $30 a year. Even if not guilty on these counts, U. S. Steel certainly created and has maintained the separateness and tension which three weeks ago flared once more into anti-Negro demonstrations. Race hatred has again hit the children of Gary. And make no mistake: it was the carefully nurtured property-devaluation boggy that scared up the Emerson School strike here.

White students in Gary have always attended the school in their home district; Negro pupils have been "allowed" to exercise an "option" to attend some other school. Last year the school board announced that, starting this fall, the "option" would be revoked for grammar-school students, and, later, for students of all ages.

As a result of the new policy, Emerson—with 1,800 students, the least crowded of all Gary's schools—was assigned thirty-eight colored children in grades up to the sixth. On opening day the high-school students struck. "No niggers for us!" they shouted. Immediately the school board declared it would stick to its ruling. For the first few days, while a few Negro-hating parents were injecting the children's ringleaders with fools' courage, the school authorities watched and waited; they took no action, but threatened legal steps against the delinquents' parents under Indiana's new anti-hate law and under laws against contributing to truancy. During this period public opinion was being mustered against the race bigots. Urged on by the League of Women Voters and the C. I. O. Steelworkers, most of the civic organizations supported the board. (I was told that the spokesman for U. S. Steel in the Chamber of Commerce tried last year to prevent the chamber from giving its approval.)

It is heartening to note that although individual members of an organization are sometimes opposed to democratic principles, the organizations themselves, under public scrutiny, can be forced to come out for right and justice. This was particularly true of the religious groups in Gary. While many ministers lifted no hand or word against the strikers, the Deanery (Catholic), the Ministerial Association (Protestant), and the Council of Churches all spoke out. Among other groups which stood up to be counted were the Anselm Forum, with members drawn from Gary's fifty-odd nationalities and religions, the Bar Association, the American Federation of Teachers, the A. V. C. (the Legion and V. F. W. were silent), the P. C. A. (there is no local A. D. A.), the Chamber of Commerce, and the Communist Party. Particularly notable was the stand of the Gary Post-Tribune, the town's only daily. In a municipal-election year this Republican voice firmly supported the non-segregation policy proclaimed by the Democratic administration—a fact which forced Steel's Republican candidate also to express his approval. Perhaps highest praise of all should go to Mayor Joseph E. Finerty. When informed months ago that the policy would make political trouble for him, Finerty decided not to run again in November, thus obtaining a free hand to implement his school board's decision.

The strike reached its peak on Friday of the first week. Over the week-end an arrest was made under the state law, subpoenas were issued to the parents of strikers, and by Monday students were beginning to return. During this time the board continued to issue subpoenas. "The policy sticks," it announced, "and you are violating the law by keeping your children out." The parents' strike committee hired a lawyer; he, too, told them they must send their children back. By the following Monday—two weeks after school's opening—attendance was again normal.

PAUL L. KLEIN is a law student at Columbia. He has previously written for The Nation on election issues.

WHAT factor was most immediately responsible for the strike? It is interesting to note that at no time was there any violence against colored pupils; this reinforces the conviction of most observers that fear of property devaluation, not of classroom association, motivated the strikers and their parents. Furthermore, attempts to get other schools to walk out failed.

Somewhere at the root of the disturbance is a man called Louis C. Christopher, now running for mayor. Christopher has a long and unsavory record: he is a leader of the Serbian National Federation, which is allied with the Slovak League, known during the war for its pro-Nazi stand. He is alleged to have instigated the similar Froebel School strike here two years ago. The anti-Negro parents' committee, which has voted to perpetuate itself, is supporting Christopher's campaign for the mayoralty.

But attendance at committee meetings has dwindled, and funds are running low. Christopher seems to have no chance to be elected; nor is it likely that his intrusion into the race, as an independent, will throw the election to the steel industry's candidate. Counter-action has begun: the Steelworkers are about to launch a racial-education program, and other groups have similar plans. Moreover, in a few years the high schools, and later the electorate itself, will be composed of young men and women who are now children in the elementary grades and receiving a democratic, non-segregated education.

The most hopeful sign from Gary is that progressives have united to enforce a liberal policy. Also important, the bigots have been compelled to conduct the fight on the liberals' level, with legal and political weapons. But the fight is not yet won, and Gary cannot afford to relax.

La Guardia

BY JOSEPH LILLY.

IBELIEVE LaGuardia is understood most clearly if he is looked at as a Westerner. His most malleable years were spent as an army kid at a frontier post in Arizona, when Arizona was yet territory and the age of legend was fresh enough to be indistinguishable from truth. Like Westerners he also loved the fight for its own sake, the rougher the merrier. When he was in Europe as a young consular clerk he looked back to Arizona, not New York. New York consciously came later. Though he was born on the lower East Side he seemed to me to love New York as do others who come here pursuing careers—as a prize, precious and wonderful.

So deeply did he feel for the Plains farmer that he was a leader of the farm bloc while still Representative from Manhattan. Last year he was presented to a howling crowd of Minnesota wheat growers by their spokesman as "the best Congressman Minnesota ever had," and everybody there understood and applauded. His big Stetson was a symbol of cow puncher and Congressman combined, whether he intended it so or not.

People often talked about his faults, perhaps because he not only declined to hide his faults but made them conspicuous, sometimes needlessly, deliberately, and wrongly. He wanted to be known accurately for what he was—no false colors. Nor did he conceal his deepest virtues. He spoke frankly of his love of domesticity, quiet, slippered domesticity, and its natural concomitant, children. He loved children unashamedly and without stint—all kinds, colors, and creeds. When he became Mayor the whole city became his paternal responsibility, to be nurtured, taught, developed, educated—and to be whacked when circumstances required. A patriarchal mayor, he hated with terrifying vigor anyone or anything, inside or outside the city, which in his opinion would injure New York or New Yorkers.

He was a bookish as well as a practical student of government, and he believed the final test of the democratic process was offered by the municipalities. When he became mayor, city government was at its nadir; when he left City Hall, not only was New York's pride restored but official capability had been rebuilt in many American cities. The countless physical and administrative transformations the city owes to him were nothing compared to this accomplishment—the result of his will and character.

But LaGuardia liked most being a Congressman. While mayor he often said he was happier in Washington and wished to return there. He was popular among Congressmen, too, and among departmental bureaucrats, which is rare indeed. The Norris-La Guardia Act was his greatest legislative feat, but he was eternally involved in contests. His reelection was always difficult.

JOSEPH LILLY, covered LaGuardia's first mayoralty campaign for the World-Telegram. In 1934 he was appointed assistant to the city comptroller and later president of the Tax Department.

The summit of his career was a defeat. He met it a year ago, at Lake Success, when he failed to persuade the United Nations to replace UNRRA with a simpler, more compact organization that would be financed and operated internationally to reconstruct and feed Europe. Believing profoundly that the situation called for healing, not bickering, he protested bitterly against the use of food as a political instrument. He knew at first hand all the factors in the festering international equation.

An American, but a humanity-loving American, he was convinced that the decision to act nationally instead of internationally would deepen, perhaps irretrievably, the division between East and West. He warned explicitly against what is happening now and asserted boldly that if the nations could not agree on a method of saving the starving victims of the war, they could hardly be expected to agree on less simple matters. His speeches on the subject brought the most frigid diplomats to their feet in applause. Most of these, following instructions, voted in support of his idea, but the United States killed it.

LaGuardia's love for the United States was mature and at the same time school-boyish. I believe he would have undertaken almost any mission that any President of the United States assigned to him. Yet he had the moral courage to stand before the roster of the United Nations, defy his President, and accuse his government of doing exactly what everyone today can see it has done.

He had known in advance what position the United States delegation intended to take, and he fought as he had never fought before, by personal plea and by confidential letter, in public meeting, over the radio, by excitation of pressure groups, by button-holing delegates—in the hope that he could arouse public opinion and compel a change of heart in the State Department. There was a good response, but after two army C-47's were shot down by Tito's airmen, neither the American people nor the government could be wholly reasonable. These addresses of LaGuardia's are classics.

The election last year depressed him greatly, but he saw it also as the reaction that constantly recurs, an expression of post-war and post-Rooseveltian political exhaustion. He thought it would take many years for the liberal side to recover. He seriously considered the notion of an entirely new party, but thought it could not have much strength for a long time. However, his sense of political reality was very acute. He knew the danger of further dividing our people in an international crisis and how great were the technical difficulties of forming an effective third party.

Last year in Europe he was his buoyant, defiant self in every country where he found things amiss. He risked being denied the privilege of seeing the collective farms of the Ukraine and the orphans' homes of Byelorussia, about which he had been most curious, by going into a Kilkenny fight with the Communist high command in Vienna. He had said the Russians should get out of Austria, allowing the other Allies to do likewise, and give the Austrians a chance. The Russians resented this advice, but LaGuardia felt it his duty to give it because feeding the Austrians was his problem.

The Constituent Assembly in Rome listened with close attentiveness to his long lecture on the way to form a democratic regime. He met banqueting Russians toast-for-toast in Kiev and managed to praise what he considered good in them in one end of a sentence that at its other end carried a bare-knuckled reply to a remark he thought unfriendly to Uncle Sam. He came home very tired, then plunged into his great fight.

Hard-boiled, hard-bitten, rasp-tongued, he gloried in being considered a very tough guy, a ruthless fighter; yet he was the most sentimental, kindly, and gentle of men. When the pressure was on he thought little of keeping waiting important men whom he had dragged to come to his office, but he would drop everything to talk to a little girl about things that interested her. Whenever he went on trips he never failed to telephone his wife and their children. He hated to waste money on a needed new suit for himself, but he insisted upon his official right to pick up the check when he was out with people.

In his last active year, when he was in Washington pouring out his remaining energy in a herculean and hopeless effort to feed, clothe, and give material hope to several hundred million human beings who were victims of the war, he occasionally would complain of feeling old, which was quite unlike him. He rarely left his hotel suite at night—his family being in New York—and after the last messages and phone calls he would sometimes drowse off to sleep from sheer fatigue while he listened to a radio concert.

But in the morning he was the same old tiger, eyes narrow and blazing, demanding the impossible, insisting that it be done immediately, damning the enemies of his purpose, impatient that every assigned task was not accomplished at once. He knew no friend when the public interest was to be served.

Caricature by Seligson

LaGuardia in Action

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Gambling in Food

IT WOULD be unfair to assign the sole blame for the recent spurt in food prices to the commodity speculators, but the effect of their operations has been to supercharge an inflationary motor already running at racing speed.

The fundamental trouble, of course, is an unbalanced supply-demand situation for which basic responsibility must be divided between the war and the weather. Frost, flood, and drought beating on European fields long starved of fertilizer have had a devastating effect on crops. According to the latest reports, prospective wheat production on the Continent, excluding Russia, is below one billion bushels—20 per cent less than the yield of the poor 1946 harvest. And in many countries the important supplementary crops, such as potatoes, are proving disappointing.

The United States has reaped a record wheat crop, but spring floods and summer droughts have severely curtailed corn production, and further damage is threatened by early frosts. That means a shortage of feed at a time when home demand for meat, butter, eggs, and other animal products is far above pre-war levels. High prices for such commodities encourage farmers to hold their grain off the market and to divert wheat from human to animal consumption. Consequently, the price of wheat, despite the large crop and a 20 per cent reduction in allotments for export, has moved upward as rapidly as that of scarce corn. It appears that the total food supply in sight just isn't enough to satisfy American appetites at present income levels and to provide for Europe's minimum requirements. The answer may be that Americans should "eat less" as Senator Taft has put it, but with all controls abandoned, the only way that end seems likely to be achieved is rationing by price. That has two consequences: (1) the burden of reduced consumption is placed on the low-income groups, whose diet is already below full health standards; (2) foreign nations, competing for grain against American purchasers of steak, find their scarce dollars exchanging for smaller and smaller quantities of food.

This tragic situation has not been made by speculators, but it is made for them, and in taking advantage of it they render it worse. The classic defense of speculation in commodity futures is that it tends to moderate the swings of the market. Under normal conditions that is possibly true, but in times of either marked glut or severe famine the activities of the commodity gamblers lead to a gross exaggeration of price movements. When the bears beat down prices, producers are apt to become panic-stricken and to throw their commodities on the market for fear they will become worthless; when, as today, the bulls are in the ascendancy and bidding quotations up and up, farmers are tempted to hold back their produce, causing a further shrinkage in visible supplies to serve as an excuse for still higher prices. So, while in the long run speculation may not greatly affect average prices, in the short run it causes distortions in the supply-demand picture and places heavy strains on the whole economy.

It is now twenty-five years since the passage of the Commodity Exchange Act, which provided for federal regulation of commodity markets. In that period certain former abuses have been ended, or at least checked. The more flagrant varieties of price manipulation have been outlawed, and limitation of commitments and other restrictions on large traders have made the "cornering" of markets nearly impossible. But as J. M. Mehl, head of the Commodity Exchange Administration, remarked recently, federal regulation "does not extend to such important matters as margins and price fluctuation limits, even though these may constitute an effective means of curbing excessive speculative activity and unwarranted price movements."

In the stock markets margins are fixed by the Federal Reserve authorities and since early in 1946 have stood at 75 per cent of the purchase price—a rate which has certainly served to discourage gambling. The commodity markets, however, determine their own margins, and they have been kept relatively low. On September 11, following criticisms by Republican Senators and others, the Chicago Board of Trade raised requirements on corn and wheat but only from 35 to 45 cents a bushel. Thus by putting up $4,500 a speculator can still buy for future delivery 10,000 bushels of wheat valued, as of September 24, at over $26,000. No wonder that gamblers who have been frozen out of stock trading by the present stiff margin rules have flocked to the commodity markets.

Seeking mitigation of "the ravages of the speculative fever and the chills and shakes that follow," Mr. Mehl has requested—he cannot order—the Chicago Board of Trade to raise margins on grain deals to at least one-third of the selling price. His plea has been echoed by Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson, and Senator Flanders, chairman of a Congressional subcommittee investigating prices, has demanded 100 per cent margins. More recently members of this same group wired the President urging the Administration to use every means in its power to restrain commodity speculation, which "is accentuating market fluctuations instead of decreasing them." They added: "It is incredible that so large operations in the necessities of life should be permitted on such small cash margins."

It is indeed, but the directors of the Chicago Board of Trade have so far shown no sign of taking action. They know that without further legislation the Administration is powerless, and they are fully aware that Congress is not anxious to interrupt its vacation for this or any other reason. For instance, on September 13 Senator Irving M. Ives declared (1) that unless "the wild speculation in grain and other food stops, the Administration or Congress or both will have to take some action; (2) that he saw no reason for a special session. As long as our legislators take so lackadaisical a view of their duties, we are unlikely to see any voluntary action to curb gambling in food taken by the commodity exchanges, whose members profit handsomely from boiling markets."

A Special Supplement of ^{THE}Nation

PALESTINE and the MIDDLE EAST

Power Politics Spells War

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

What Price Arab Oil?

BY I. F. STONE

Egypt's Bid for Power

BY MAURICE FERRO

Inside Arab Politics

BY J. L. TELLER

The Land and the People

BY W. C. LOWDERMILK

PALESTINE'S FIRST FILM DRAMA

"It is a story as wonderful as a fairy tale as inspiring
as a fight against hopeless odds... telling a greater story than any movie palace
in

New York City."

—ARCHER WINSTEN
N. Y. Post

plus: "ASSIGNMENT: TEL AVIV" narrated by QUENTIN REYNOLDS presented by UNITED PALESTINE APPEAL

Now at the

PALESTINE EXHIBIT

of the PALESTINE FOUNDATION FUND

Telling graphically the story of Jewish achievement in Palestine

MUSEUM OF SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY

R.C.A. Building—ROCKEFELLER CENTER

Adults 40c—Children 21c (plus tax)

Continuous from 1 P.M. — Last Showing 9:00 P.M.

Palestine and the Middle East

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE PROBLEM

A LOOK at the map on this page puts the Palestine issue, now before the General Assembly of the Nations, in its true context. There you see a small sliver of land wedged between the sea and the immense territory that comprises what is conveniently if rather inaccurately known as the "Arab world." The sliver is Palestine, and its future will be determined by the pressures and interests that dominate the eastern Mediterranean and the Arab states. To understand the fierce debate that has centered on Palestine for the past twenty-five years and is reaching its culmination at Flushing Meadow Park this week, one must go far beyond the claims and counter-claims of Zionists and Arabs. It is necessary to understand something about the political and economic development of the whole Arab world and above all to grasp the meaning of the struggle for power in the Middle East. The fate of Jews and Arabs alike depends upon the balance of forces and the strategies employed in that struggle.

Persons unacquainted with the Middle East are likely to apply to the area political concepts to which they are accustomed at home—concepts of sovereignty, of party and class, of constitutional structure. This tendency has led to many misconceptions. It has, for example, inclined Westerners to give too much weight to arguments based on national divisions, too little to those arising from communal relationships. It has overemphasized the sovereign identity of states; minimized the importance of religious minorities or of tribes or classes which may be moved less by a sense of nationality than of kinship or a common faith. One of the most important facts to realize is the absence, in the Arab world, of any dominant sentiment of unity. So-called Arab "nationalism" is a force, but it is not nationalism at all in the Western sense—since it may lead Syrian tribesmen to raid Jewish settlements in Palestine—but rather an emotion that can be aroused in opposition to supposed infringements by outsiders of religious or communal rights and traditions.

Throughout the Middle East the chief unifying factor in Arab affairs has been the pressure of external interests; while the social, economic, communal, and sectarian organization of Arab life has consistently made for division and even conflict. In fact, the divergences in religious belief, in tradition, and in economic activity have done more to separate the Arab peoples than their language has served to unite them. Sometimes the differences are so great as to make impossible a stable society within a single political framework.

The failure of the pan-Arab movement generated during the First World War was variously ascribed to the "divide and rule" policy of Great Britain, to Zionism, and to the rivalry between France and Britain. This was fortunate for the Arab leaders since it absolved them from the necessity of searching for the causes of failure within the movement itself. The truth is that England and France did more to unify the Arabs, whether purposely or not, than to sow dissension among them. The unity was, one must admit, mainly of a temporary and artificial character, furthered for reasons of expediency, but the resulting organization of Arab forces, unstable as it is, has created the illusion of an integral Arab nationalism.

Under Turkish rule the Arab world was never a self-contained area. Variations of climate and geography gave rise to very different economies which produced different religious and political orders. Bedouins were spread over three-quarters of the Ottoman Empire; they still form a large part of the population of Iraq, Syria, and Transjordan and a majority in Saudi Arabia. Among these nomad peoples themselves one finds diversity, but the Bedouin way of life has certain common characteristics that have influenced the whole area. Sharper contrasts developed between Bedouins and the people settled in towns or on the land, contrasts more striking than the similarities of religion and speech.

Even in the cultivated areas are groups maintaining a separate entity based upon tribal ties. The persistence of the feudal relationship among families and tribes of the Nuseiris, Isma'ilis, Matawalis, and Druzes, for example, has led to their continued existence in the settled parts of Syria as self-contained communities. So too the Christians, especially the Maronites in the Lebanon, have produced societies whose religious and political organization, education, and standard of living set them apart, not only from the Bedouins and the more primitive elements among the peasants and townfolk, but from their own social counterparts in such typically Arab cities as Homs, Hama, and Damascus. In many respects those ancient towns have maintained their character as "caravan cities," natural centers of a regional economy marked by a slow cultural development. By contrast, the Zionist enterprise in Palestine has not only re-created the historic Jewish character of that region, but has given a new direction and speed to its evolution.

The continued dominance of communal and tribal ways of life largely control the political behavior of the Middle East. Divided by national boundaries—often foreign-made—organized as kingdoms or republics, the Arab world is still ruled mainly by religious or family hierarchies whose power is not related to the formal constitution or geographical limits of the state.

AGAINST such a background, what is the prospect of a successful, progressive pan-Arab movement, such as the members of the League of Arab States like to picture? Clearly no real unification can take place until economic changes modify existing social contrasts and level up the general standard of life. As long as the economy of the region remains so backward in its overall development, as long as the divisions among the Arab peoples prevent common action for any end, we must expect the survival of government by local notables and tribal leaders—a mixture of theocracy and feudal oligarchy. Only something like social revolution will make possible a real integration of the Arab peoples.

The hope of such fundamental change rests not with the Mufti and other Führers of the Arab League but with those men who have made the blueprints for an economic renaissance of the Middle East through the development of its natural resources. Almost inevitably this development must find its start in Palestine, where the Jewish pioneers have already shown the way toward social and political regeneration. The zeal and scientific intelligence which have brought life to the arid hills of Judea and the desert of the Negev can be applied with equal effect to the huge areas to the east and north. Water and modern techniques are what the region needs to lift its peoples out of apathy and ignorance and the primitive political systems that breed in economic stagnation.

But all the fruitful plans of reclamation will founder if the great Western nations, in pursuit of power or security, continue to subsidize the greedy ambitions of Arab politicians. This is a formula for preserving decadence in an area that desperately needs to be brought into the modern world. So in the end we come back to the overshadowing fact of power politics, the struggle for dominance in a strategic area. In this struggle the happiness of peoples becomes a side issue.

The prospect of a solution that rises above considerations of power to a broader concept of peace and stability rests now with the United Nations. The report of the U. N. Special Committee on Palestine provides a sober and judicious basis for decision. It is a high responsibility of the General Assembly to study the recommendations of the committee in the context of the whole situation in the Middle East—the prospect of a slowly emerging democratic society, the possibility of economic and agricultural development, the needs of the Arab peoples as opposed to the demands of their rulers, and finally the rights of the Jews, both those established on the land of Palestine and those still detained in the dismal camps of Germany and Austria.

Power Politics Spells War

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, September 16

WHILE the overriding principles of policy in Southeastern Europe and the Middle East have not changed save in detail, a different pattern of rivalries is now to be found there. French influence in the Levant has been largely destroyed; Italian colonial ambitions have been broken to pieces; and it is a reasonable assumption that, for the next decade at any rate, the German Drang nach Osten has no possibility of revival. Now it is Great Britain and the United States on the one side and Soviet Russia on the other which maneuver for predominance in this vital area. When the professional rhetoric of the statesmen and the diplomats has been penetrated, the objectives remain what they were before 1939—the strategic positions which permit the effective use of air and sea power, for attack or for the defense of communications, and which insure the control of oil.

Mr. Bevin's policy in this area has turned solely upon these two considerations. Apart from some declamatory phrases about democratic institutions in Greece and the need to raise the standard of living in Arab countries, at no point has he made a decision which would have enabled the observer to infer that he was Foreign Secretary in a Socialist government elected by an overwhelming majority of the people of Great Britain to carry out a Socialist policy. On the contrary, had his decisions in this area been made by a Tory Foreign Secretary, they would surely have been denounced in the House of Commons by the men who are now his colleagues.

The person at the head of the Foreign Office has changed; the foundations of the policy have remained unchanged for fifty years. Keep a friendly Greece so as to dominate the eastern Mediterranean. A friendly Greece is necessary as a safeguard of Malta and Cyprus, both of them vital air and naval bases, and to protect Egypt, which is the gateway to the Suez Canal and therefore the keystone of the arch of British eastern communications. On control of this region depend access to the oil of the Middle East and the significance of the Persian Gulf as a dagger directed at the heart of Caucasian Russia. That is why Mr. Churchill may be said, for all serious purposes, to have invaded Greece. That is why Mr. Bevin has maintained an army of occupation there. That is why, as economic pressure and Socialist opinion have forced Mr. Bevin to withdraw British troops, President Truman is beginning to take over his responsibilities. Under cover of democratic formalities reaction is maintained in power lest the Greek government fall into Communist hands and Greece become another Russian satellite in Southeastern Europe. The new Sophoulis-Tsaldaris government was manufactured by the unwearied efforts of the American Minister to Athens and Mr. Loy Henderson of the State Department. None of us knows what kind of government the Greek people really want. What they are going to get is a government approved in Downing Street and Washington, with the understanding that America now accepts financial responsibility for its safety and may have to accept military responsibility, too.

It was inevitable that the Second World War should reopen the issue of Anglo-Egyptian relations. What is at stake is not merely the British right to maintain troops in the canal zone but the future of the Sudan. It is difficult, however, to see why Great Britain should now feel any concern about the canal; obviously air power makes it virtually useless for shipping if the enemy can attack in serious strength. The problem of the Sudan is far more complex. There is a theoretical Egyptian sovereignty. There is no satisfactory evidence either way of what the inhabitants of the Sudan would themselves prefer. But I believe it is certain that Egypt, under the government of an ambitious and semi-fascist king and a corrupt oligarchy of rich effendi who have shown no interest in the condition of the Egyptian masses, would undo what good the British have attempted to do in the last fifty years. The British have, by treaty, the right to maintain their present position until 1986; and there is, I think, no reason to suppose that the Foreign Office will move beyond the offer—on the whole a reasonable one—which led Egypt to go before the Security Council.

THE other Arab countries raise far clearer issues. They have probably the richest known oil deposits in the world, and these are all worked under concession by British or American companies which pay subsidies to Arab princes. The oil is fundamental to both air and naval power. Great Britain or America or both must have military control of the region, partly to guard the pipe lines and partly to be in a position to move against Russia directly—as a major power astride the Middle

HAROLD J. LASKI, professor of political science at the University of London, was formerly chairman of the Executive Committee of the British Labor Party. This is the first of a series of articles written exclusively for The Nation. It will be followed by "America—World Power No. 1"; "Europe—Is It Done For?"; "Russia—Fact and Fancy."

East could do, especially if Turkey should prove friendly. Military control of the Middle East is, moreover, the only way in which Anglo-American interests in Persian oil could be protected from Russian attack.

That is why Great Britain, under Mr. Eden, called into being the Arab League, which is a method of assuring British predominance in the external relations of the Arab states; Britain was to give them military defense against possible attack from without and against any internal disturbance which might jeopardize the oil concessions or the pipe lines. That is why the Chamberlain government, in the spring of 1939, sacrificed the whole purpose of the British Mandate in Palestine to the policy of appeasing the Arabs. That is why Mr. Churchill's government, during the war, maintained the status thus announced, despite Arab treachery in Iraq and Syria. That is why Mr. Bevin persuaded his Labor colleagues, with one minor variation, to break every pledge they had made to the Jews up to polling day in the general election of 1945.

The alliance of a technologically advanced power with reactionary interests in a medieval country is one of the best-known examples of the imperialist pattern. Almost every argument that Mr. Bevin has advanced in defense of his policy in Palestine is plainly nonsense as soon as it is seriously examined. It is nonsense to say that to carry out Labor's pledges to the Jews would throw the Arab states into the arms of Russia. No one knows better than the Arab ruling classes that their authority would be completely destroyed as soon as they came under Russian patronage, quite apart from the fact that Russia could only move in as their protector after being victor in a major war; Great Britain and the United States would not allow themselves to be evicted from these oil fields without fighting. It is nonsense to say that fulfilment of the pledges to the Jews would mean an Arab rising of important dimensions. First of all, such deep disagreement divides the Arab states that they would not effectively cooperate. Secondly, not one of them has the equipment for modern warfare that would enable it to last for a fortnight against Great Britain. Thirdly, though there might well be an émeute in Palestine, and even armed infiltration into it from other Arab territories, the whole thing would be nothing more than a big police operation if the Palestinian government, under its British aegis, handled the situation firmly and admitted that the Jews had the right to defend themselves. The argument, fourthly, that fighting in Palestine might affect either or both of the new dominions of Pakistan and India is adequately answered, by saying that both these dominions have sufficient problems of their own to handle without taking on the troubles of the Arab states.

The truth is that Jewish immigration into Palestine on any large scale means material progress there. This has repercussions over the whole of the Middle East; and it will in the long run produce a situation fatal to the functionless Arab lords whom Great Britain maintains in power as the easiest form of insurance for its oil supplies. That in the process the Arab masses are condemned to be a mainly illiterate, poverty-stricken, and disease-ridden sacrifice is excused by the fact that outside Palestine itself the Arab states are now theoretically sovereign—and members of the United Nations—and therefore it would not be fitting for Great Britain to interfere in their domestic affairs. The main thing is to be sure of the oil. The present pattern of power makes Great Britain sure of the oil. Anything else is of minor importance.

LET me say here with emphasis that behind this British pattern is the profound conviction of American support. I know that American public opinion has been deeply and sincerely hostile to Mr. Bevin's policy in Palestine and its tragic consequences. I know, too, that President Truman has consistently asked for the admission of 100,000 Jewish refugees from Europe into Palestine. Nevertheless, it is important to bear two things in mind. First, as Bartley Crum has pointed out, any American action in behalf of the Jews, whether under President Roosevelt or President Truman, has always been followed by private assurances from the State Department to the Arab rulers that such action was merely a gesture to which they need attach no serious importance. And, secondly, America has now so vital a stake in Middle Eastern oil that the State Department and the Defense Department in Washington are as haunted by Russian ghosts as their opposite numbers in Whitehall. Mr. Bevin likes to say that if Great Britain withdrew from the Middle East, there would be a large vacuum which someone must fill; he wants the British public to feel the proper Kiplingesque shudder at the prospect of Russia filling it. The simple truth is that nothing except complete breakdown would compel Great Britain to create the vacuum; and if it did, it would have made arrangements for the United States to fill it.

The situation at which we have arrived is, in its large outlines, a simple one. All over the world the United States is organizing what forces it can manipulate in an all-out effort to prevent the expansion of Russian power. As part of that effort predominance in the Middle East is essential; that is why there is so large an American fleet in the Mediterranean. (The United States appears to hope to base this fleet in Italian ports if agreement from the Italian government can be obtained, which is likely if the De Gasperi government remains in power.) In this area it has the full cooperation of Mr. Bevin. The Truman loans to Greece and Turkey are an integral part of this policy; their purpose is to strengthen the two states as barriers against a Russian approach to the Mediterranean. This effort must in its turn be fitted into the Marshall plan, which seems likely to offer long-term aid to the Western European states on condition that they stand firm against any understanding with Russia and accept the desirability of rebuilding western Germany on the basis of "free enterprise." The real effect of the policy is the division of the world into two groups, with the United States containing Russia and its allies from bases on every side of the Soviet sphere of influence.

THE report of the United Nations Committee of Inquiry on Palestine leaves both the United States and Great Britain in a very difficult position. The minority plan would for all practical purposes make the future of the Jewish "national home" impossible; an attempt to carry it out would be resisted, intelligently enough, by Haganah as a betrayal of the pledges made in the Balfour Declaration of 1917. The majority report offers real prospect of a solution, but at the price of ill-will toward Great Britain and the United States on the part of the Arab ruling class, a good deal of Arab rioting, and a threat not only to the existing oil refineries and the pipe lines but to the continuance of the present leases, especially in Saudi Arabia and Iraq.

These are troubled waters in which, at the Assembly, the Russians have the chance of fishing with great enjoyment. If the majority report is accepted, Mr. Bevin clearly loses whatever is left of the reputation he so fanatically staked on his ability to solve the Palestine problem. He has to evacuate some eighty to ninety thousand troops in a brief period; and in the face of Arab hostility he has to work out where British troops are to be placed in the Middle East to fill that "vacuum" which he so fears. The American government must balance delicately between a public opinion which quite rightly thinks that the Jews have been treated with grave injustice by Mr. Bevin—his decision to take the 4,400 Exodus refugees to Germany is the unbelievable climax of his errors and prejudices—and its own anxiety about the future of the oil supplies in these richest of known reserves.

This is what power politics have led the world to face. Every human reality in the Middle East has been neglected in a vast and dishonest jockeying for strategic preponderance and oil. The continuance of power politics is bound to bring continuing deterioration in international relations. The United States will aid anti-Communist efforts everywhere in order to weaken Russian policy in this region. Russia, in return, will create as many difficulties as possible for the United States. In its endeavor to check the spread of socialism, which it regards as hardly distinguishable from communism, America may break the Labor government by offering it economic assistance on impossible terms and cause divisions in France and Italy so deep that civil war must follow.

YET there is another way, and I may be permitted to emphasize that it is an American way. That way is, through the medium of the United Nations, to organize the whole of the Middle East, including Persia, in gigantic and related systems built upon the model of the TVA, with modifications suggested by the Lilienthal plan for atomic energy. There would be, to give three examples, a Persian Authority, a Jordan Valley Authority, and a Euphrates Valley Authority. Each of them would be governed by a commission, appointed by the United Nations, on which Persia, the Arab states, and the Jews would have their appropriate representation. To these commissions would be transferred the oil concessions which are the core of the present difficulties. Each would be in charge not only of the oil in its area but also of irrigation and power schemes. Each would pay a fixed annual sum of reasonable proportions to those who own the concessions, like Ibn Saud, and would sell oil freely to any customer able to buy it. After the payment of administrative charges the profits would be devoted to the modernization of the Middle East.

Courtesy of Ha'aretz (Jerusalem)

I am aware that this will be a blow at the immense power of the small class which lives richly from the exactions of Arab feudalism; the answer surely is that nothing less will make it possible for the exploited masses to emerge from their misery. I am aware, too, that it will be a blow to the complex of oil interests which now, under the patronage of their respective governments, are the major source of the reaction and unrest in this area. The obvious answer, again, is that it is far more important to take steps to safeguard the peace of the world than to protect a form of predatory capitalism which has had an almost continuously ugly and evil history. If it be said that such an approach invades the sovereignty of half a dozen states, some of them members of the United Nations, the plain answer, as every honest man knows, is that their sovereignty is a hypocritical pretense; they are simply a theater for the maneuvers of the three great powers for predominance, and their poverty-stricken masses are the outstanding victims of those maneuvers.

As the Assembly's debate comes into view, the Middle Eastern question, with that of Greece, which cannot be separated from it, is the test of whether the United Nations has some reality or is the fig leaf used by governments to conceal their hypocrisy from their weary people. It is useless to talk of a universal passion for peace if no government takes any steps to organize the conditions in which peace is possible. "Absolutely everybody is in favor of peace in general," wrote Lenin in 1915, "including Kitchener, Joffre, Hindenburg, and Nicholas the Bloody, for everyone wishes to end the war." That is very much the situation in the world today. Everyone wants peace and understanding—provided it is on his terms.

What Price Arab Oil?

BY I. F. STONE

UNTIL the Gromyko speech on Palestine at the United Nations last May, the principal boggy trotted out against a pro-Jewish solution in the Holy Land was that it would drive the Arabs into the arms of the Soviet Union. Now that the Soviet Union is also on record for partition—if a bi-national state is rejected—and the satisfaction of Jewish national aspirations, the new boggy is that in the event of such a solution the Arabs would refuse to sell us their oil. Firmly imbedded in American thinking at the moment is the notion that Arabian oil is necessary to national safety. The corollary is that to offend the Arabs is to lose the oil.

That the shrewd Pashas and acquisitive merchant capitalists of the Middle East might commit themselves to Stalin and Marx in sheer self-destroying pique, inviting in the social revolution, rather than see a small strip of Middle Eastern littoral go to the Jews puts a considerable strain on credulity. It is equally fantastic to believe that native ruling classes and monarchs would give up a rich source of funds for similar reasons. What would they do with their oil? Use it as lubricant for camels?

Little is known of the extent to which oil interests have determined State Department attitudes on Palestine. The strategic situation of the Middle East makes it a crucial area in world politics irrespective of oil, and the general undercurrent of State Department policy toward Jewish aspirations in Palestine would be hostile even if there were no oil in the area. One suspects that oil is rather an additional argument than a conclusive factor within the department.

Some light is thrown on intra-departmental fears and controversies by Herbert Feis's "Seen from E. A.," a wryly philosophic memoir of the author's work as adviser on international economic affairs in the department. Feis says at one point: "Arab opposition to further Jewish immigration into Palestine might express itself in a repudiation of existing American and British rights and a search for Russian protection in such measures." But what the Arab rulers want is dollars, not socially hazardous "protection" from Moscow, and Feis concludes that such a move is "highly unlikely."

Just how unlikely it is may be seen from the dispatches sent back to the New York Times last year by C. L. Sulzberger, one of the very few American newspaper correspondents ever to visit Saudi Arabia. In the Times of November 28, 1946, cabling from Dhahran, Sulzberger reported that although Ibn Saud "has been irritated with the question [of Palestine], the King told one Aramco [Arabian-American Oil Company] executive that rumors that he might withdraw the oil concessions because of American support of the Zionists were 'hot wind.'" On December 4, in a cable from Hadda, Saudi Arabia, Sulzberger, after seeing the King, told of Ibn Saud's correspondence with President Truman and said, "Despite the differences that have arisen in their respective points of view over Palestine, however, King Ibn Saud has never even considered canceling or voiding the oil concessions that are being developed in this country by United States companies."

It is also interesting to note a bit of history disclosed by Feis. He says that in the late autumn of 1945 Ibn Saud was offered but rejected a $25,000,000 advance from the Export-Import Bank. The reason was not American support of Zionism but a far more cagy and practical matter, "a phrase in the contract drawn up by the lawyers of the bank that Ibn Saud construed as requiring a pledge of oil royalties toward repayment." The following spring came the report of the Anglo-American Commission on Palestine and widespread American support of its conclusions. "These," Feis says, "did not deter the arrangement in August of a ten-million-dollar credit 'to modernize Saudi Arabian transport and agriculture.'" This reluctance to let anti-Zionist principles impede profitable monetary transactions may explain the significant vagueness of the Arab Office spokesman in London who on September 22 threatened "a complete economic and cultural break" with Europe and America if the United Nations should attempt to partition Palestine. When asked whether this might mean withdrawal of American and British oil concessions, the spokesman said only that it "might." One suspects that in Arabic, as in Latin, pecunia non olet.

THAT Middle Eastern oil is cheap and plentiful is not to be doubted. That money is to be made on its exploitation is clear. That the United States faces an oil famine without Arabian sources of supply is, however, more than dubious. An oil-famine scare was drummed up after the last war to enable American companies to muscle in on Iraq oil, and a similar scare has accompanied the more recent move into Saudi Arabia. As far back as 1916 Mark L. Requa, later general director of the oil division of the United States Fuel Administration, warned in a report to the Senate that our oil resources would be exhausted within a decade and that the United States was threatened with "commercial vassalage" for lack of petroleum. But after two world wars and the mass production of the automobile, the United States today has higher proved reserves than ever before in its history. The Committee on Reserves of the American Petroleum Institute reported recently that "in each and every year since 1936, with the single exception of 1943, the total of new additions to reserves has exceeded production during the same year. In 1943 we drew on our reserves for 1¼ per cent of total production." At the end of 1945 estimated proved reserves were 59.4 per cent higher than in 1936. Reserves were 12½ per cent greater after the war than in 1939.

The United States is a long way from an oil famine. There is much progress to be made in the rate of extraction; until recently the industry got little better than 20 or 30 per cent of the oil in any field; today at least 50 per cent can be obtained, and in some fields the yield is as much as 80 per cent. Petroleum yields about 40 per cent of gasoline, but newer cracking processes can step this up to 80 or 100 per cent if necessary. By hydrogenation—the addition of hydrogen—it is possible to obtain more than one gallon of gas from a gallon of petroleum. There is a wide margin of quality improvement possible. And, finally, much oil prospecting remains to be done. At present we have developed about 8,000 square miles of oil fields. Wallace Pratt of Standard Oil, one of the country's foremost geologists, estimates that there is an area of about 1,700,000 square miles in which geological considerations make it reasonable to assume that oil may yet be found. Past experience leads geologists to believe that at least 1 per cent of this vast territory should provide oil. That would add 17,000 square miles to the 8,000 square miles already in production.

The experience of the last war, when the rich oil-bearing lands of the Dutch East Indies fell in one swoop to the Japanese, and Hitler almost succeeded in seizing the oil territories of the Soviet Union and the Middle East, should have taught us the danger of depending on distant sources of supply. From all I can gather in Washington today, military planners are operating on the reasonable assumption that in the event of a war with the Soviet Union we should be unable to hold the oil regions of the Middle East. The best we could do would be to damage the fields as much as possible before withdrawing. It would be far cheaper and safer to develop sources of petroleum at home than to stake too much on distant sources of "cheap" oil that is cheap only when one does not consider the cost of their protection.

The last annual report of the Secretary of the Interior on the progress of the liquid-synthetic-fuels program of the Bureau of Mines shows how close we are to commercial exploitation of coal or shale for gasoline. The report said that new research developments now place the cost of producing gasoline from coal or shale at from 7½ to 9½ cents a gallon, only a few cents higher than current costs of extracting gasoline from petroleum. The figures do not include profit or interest on investment but neither do they reflect large-scale operations. "At the present rate of research progress," Dr. R. R. Sayers, director of the Bureau of Mines, declared, "production of synthetic petroleum products on a commercial basis is possible within a few years." An investment of far less than will be spent on sea and air forces to protect Middle Eastern oil could bring this about at any time.

The Department of the Interior estimates, encouraging as they are, have already been made obsolete by a recent discovery. Dr. Gustav Egloff, research director of the Universal Oil Company, told the petroleum division of the American Chemical Society in New York on September 17 of a startling new development. It appears that shale contains 200 grams of uranium a ton, or a ton of uranium oxide to each 5,000 tons of shale. Sweden is already extracting both uranium and oil from shale and has spent $35,000,000 on a commercial plant. The possibility of obtaining uranium from shale means that oil may turn out to be a by-product obtainable at a price less than that of gasoline from petroleum. American shale deposits are estimated to contain 100 billion barrels of oil, or five times present proved reserves of petroleum in the United States and four times those in the Middle East. The uranium-shale development indicates that oil will grow more plentiful and cheaper in the United States as we come closer to the age of atomic power, which will ultimately make gasoline a subsidiary fuel.

